Bush offered his audience a dose of Energy 101, asserting early in his speech: "We live in a global world. When the demand for oil goes up in China or in India, it causes the price of crude oil to rise. And since we import about 60 percent of the crude oil we use, it causes our price to go up as well, which means the economy becomes less competitive."

"And then, of course, there's the national security concern for oil," Bush added. "Why? Well, we get oil from some countries that don't particularly care for us."

Bush's speech was interrupted by a protester who yelled, "No blood for oil! Out of Iraq now!" But the president pressed on, saying his administration has made hydrogen and fuel-cell technology a priority.

"And we will continue to research to make sure America's less dependent on foreign sources of oil," he said.

Bush trumpeted solutions to future U.S. energy needs that included "solar roofs that will enable the American family to be able to generate their own electricity" and hybrid cars that will run the first 40 miles on electricity and won't "look like a golf cart."

"I believe wind power has got the opportunity to help," Bush said. "All we need is to put a couple of windmills right there in Washington, D.C., and we'll be less dependent on foreign sources of energy," he said to laughter from the audience.

Bush promoted continued use of tax credits to encourage alternative energy sources, increased drilling for oil and natural gas in the Gulf of Mexico and expansion of nuclear power generation.

"Nuclear power is renewable, and there are no greenhouse gases associated with nuclear power," he said. "One of the problems we've had is that nobody wants to build any plants. They're afraid of the cost of regulation and the litigious nature that surrounds the construction of nuclear power plants."

At the end of the speech, Bush told his audience he had to leave to "get my limousine filled up by hydrogen."

He was on his way to Chicago to campaign for two Illinois Republicans -- businessman David McSweeney and state senator Peter Roskam -- who are running for House seats now held by Democrats.

The event at the Chicago Hilton will mark the first time Bush has appeared publicly with House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) since former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) resigned over disclosures that he sent sexually explicit messages to teenage male pages. Hastert has faced criticism over how he dealt with the Foley matter.

Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.), a member of the House energy committee, said late this afternoon that Bush's speech addressed only part of the nation's dependence on imported oil.

"Unless we mandate stronger fuel economy standards, biofuels by themselves will not be effective in helping us curb America's dependence on imported oil from the Middle East," Markey said in a statement. "Unfortunately, the President again failed to announce any new initiatives to improve motor vehicle fuel efficiency standards today."

Bush Urges Push For Alternative Energy (SLPD)

By Jeffrey Tomich

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, October 13, 2006

President George W. Bush on Thursday said the push to develop alternative sources of energy and wean the nation off foreign oil shouldn't be slowed by falling gasoline prices.

"Gasoline prices are down, and that's good news," he told hundreds of people attending a renewable-energy conference at America's Center. "My worry is that it will make us complacent about our future when it comes to energy."

Crude oil has dropped by $20 a barrel in the last two months, dragging gasoline lower. At some stations across the St. Louis area Thursday, signs advertised self-serve regular unleaded for less than $2 a gallon.

Still, consumers are paying twice as much for gasoline than when Bush took office, winter heating bills have risen sharply and electric rates probably are headed higher in Illinois and Missouri next year. All of it has meant that energy prices have become a key campaign issue.

Bush spent most of his 25-minute speech repeating key points of his energy initiative unveiled eight months ago in the State of the Union message, when he declared that the United States is "addicted to oil."

The president wants to replace 75 percent of the nation's oil imports from the Middle East by 2025, and said tax credits and subsidies can help kick-start the adoption of alternative technologies such as hybrid cars and ethanol from corn, switch grass or wood chips.

Longer-term, Bush envisioned families would power their homes with rooftop solar panels, and presidential limousines would run on hydrogen, he said.

Critics, however, contend that funding for alternative energy research in the 2005 energy bill and this year's Advanced Energy Initiative is inadequate. They also say the administration has done too little to emphasize energy efficiency.

Improving the fuel economy of the nation's auto fleet is the "easiest way to protect the country from vagaries of the oil markets and the environmental impacts of our oil addition," said Nathanael Greene, an energy policy analyst with the Natural Resources Defense Council. "It's sort of inexcusable that no administration since the late 1980s has taken this issue on."

Bush was momentarily interrupted by a woman who stood up midway through the speech and chanted, "Out of Iraq now" and "Our troops are not renewable." Police removed her from the hall. The protester later was identified as Laurie Ann Meier, 30, of the 700 block of Limit Avenue in University City.

President's speech on renewable energy sources

The brief interruption didn't stop the president from citing the phenomenal growth of the renewable-energy industry in the past two years -- a point made by many of the speakers throughout the two-day conference, including three Bush Cabinet members and executives from a handful of Fortune 500 companies.

Production of ethanol has tripled since the start of the decade, to about 5 billion gallons a year, and there are now 100 plants making the fuel, with 40 others expected to begin operation next year. And while ethanol makes up just 3 percent of the nation's gasoline pool, it will account for 30 percent of the increase in consumption this year, said Thomas Dorr, undersecretary for rural development at the Agriculture Department.

Though the focus of the two-day conference was energy from renewable sources, such as the sun, wind and crops, Bush emphasized the need for oil and natural-gas exploration in the Gulf of Mexico and more terminals to receive shipments of liquefied natural gas from overseas to run power plants. He said also that America needs to utilize its 250-year supply of coal in ways that don't foul the environment.

The president repeated a desire to see development of advanced nuclear plants to help meet the country's need for electricity while helping reduce emissions of greenhouse gases.

Bush Touts New Energy Initiatives (KCS)

By Steve Kraske

The Kansas City Star, October 13, 2006

ST. LOUIS | Invoking the image of America's pioneers, President Bush on Thursday told a conference of energy entrepreneurs that the nation is moving rapidly toward independence from foreign oil.

Even the recent drop in gasoline prices won't stem the tide, the president told the "Advancing Renewable Energy" conference.

"It won't dim my enthusiasm for making sure we diversify away from oil," said the former Texas oilman.

Bush enthused over a host of new technologies — including ethanol, hydrogen, solar and even new uses of soybeans — and suggested that with each one, new markets are at hand and even ready to explode.

"Ethanol is coming," he said, a refrain he used repeatedly about different technologies.

Critics, though, complained afterward that Bush's push for renewable energy has proceeded too slowly. America, they said, is ready to move even quicker.

Kate Johnson of the U.S. Public Interest Research Group cited one specific example: mileage standards for new cars and trucks. That's one of the easiest ways to reduce reliance on foreign oil, yet "unfortunately, the administration and Congress have not taken action."

The new American car fleet averages about 21 miles a gallon, she said. That's worse than even 10 years ago. Her group would like to see manufacturers pushed to boost it to 40 miles a gallon by 2018.

Bush's visit to St. Louis was quick. He made only the one stop at America's Center to speak at the energy conference, jointly sponsored by the U.S. Energy and Agriculture departments. In attendance was Republican Sen. Jim Talent of Missouri.

"These are exciting times," Bush said. "People are beginning to take advantage" of new technologies.

The new ideas not only wean us off foreign oil, they are good for the environment, the president said.

Solar energy may soon be common in American homes, Bush said. And wind power has huge potential.

Bush talked in strong terms about hybrid vehicles and building lighter and more powerful car batteries.

He spent the most time promoting ethanol, the corn-based fuel additive. The president pointed out that more than 5 billion gallons of ethanol would be sold this year. In 2000, just 1.6 billion gallons were sold. Next year, 40 more ethanol refineries are expected to go on line.

He talked about "cellulosic" ethanol, a fuel made from agricultural waste products, such as wood chips and corn stalks.

Bush did not include a fundraising stop for Talent's re-election campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0080200

That job was left to first lady Laura Bush, who was to make a separate visit to St. Louis that included a private fundraiser for Talent as well as a tree-planting ceremony and a stop at the Gateway Arch to commemorate Breast Cancer Awareness Month.

Bush Touts Ethanol (FWST)

By Dan Piller

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, October 13, 2006

ST. LOUIS — President Bush warned the country Thursday not to let the drop in gasoline prices divert attention from developing new forms of renewable energy, particularly corn-based ethanol.

"Gasoline prices are down, and that's good news," Bush told a conference on renewable energy co-sponsored by the U.S. Agriculture and Energy departments. "My worry is that the low prices will make us complacent about renewable energy."

Bush, who worked in the Texas oil industry before moving into politics, reiterated that the country must cut its heavy reliance on oil.

"Let me put it bluntly: We're too dependent on oil," he said. A similar declaration in his State of the Union message touched off a national focus on ethanol, now used as an environmentally friendly extender in almost half of the gasoline sold in the United States.

When Bush spoke in January, the country was reeling from gas prices that had peaked at about $3 a gallon after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita took about 30 percent of U.S. oil production out of service for months.

As recently as July 28, the average price of gasoline in Texas was $2.92 a gallon, according to AAA Texas. But large inventories and slack demand have caused prices to drop. This week's AAA Texas survey shows an average price of $2.10 a gallon in Tarrant County, $2.13 statewide and $2.25 nationwide.

The high gas prices have boosted interest in alternative and renewable energy sources. Corn-based ethanol has emerged as the leading renewable fuel for automobiles. For the first time, it was blended into gasoline sold to North Texas drivers this year.

In 2006, about 4.6 billion gallons of ethanol will be burned in U.S. automobiles, compared with 140 billion gallons of gasoline. A similar drive for soybean-based biodiesel is in the works for trucks and other diesel engines.

Several obstacles to wider ethanol use have been solved, such as the amount of energy needed to produce it. But America would likely have to import sugar cane from Brazil, for example, to radically increase ethanol production.

Bush said the government is promoting ethanol, popular not only among corn growers in the Midwest but also among environmentalists, by a 51-cents-per-gallon tax credit passed on to consumers and other tax credits for investments in ethanol-production plants. The 100 ethanol plants in the Corn Belt will be increased by about 40 within a year.

"A lot of smart money is moving into ethanol," Bush said, adding that the government is funding research into the next generation of ethanol, which could be made from sugar cane, wood chips or grasses.

Bush spoke enthusiastically about E85, a gasoline blend that is 85 percent ethanol and is sold primarily in the upper Midwest where ethanol is popular politically. Most blends, including that of the North Texas market, are 10 percent ethanol and 90 percent gasoline.

"It doesn't take much investment to convert a car engine to be able to use E85," Bush said.

Support of E85 puts Bush mildly at odds with Big Oil. Red Cavaney, the president of the American Petroleum Institute, told the convention Wednesday that while Big Oil supports the 10 percent ethanol blend, it draws the line at E85 because of the potential for upsetting supplies and distribution.

But Bush also had reassuring words for his longtime friends in the oil industry. "I think we can drill for oil and gas in environmentally protected areas," he said. He spoke glowingly of a new oil find in deep waters of the Gulf of Mexico, announced two months ago, that could increase U.S. reserves.

Bush's speech was interrupted by applause several times by the crowd of more than 1,500 gathered in the St. Louis convention center. Most conference attendees are investors, renewable-energy advocates or representatives of agribusiness groups that stand to benefit from the emergence of renewable fuels.

One protestor, shouting, "Oil is not renewable, out of Iraq now!" was hustled from the hall as the audience applauded Bush's remarks. The president did not interrupt his speech during the incident.

The Natural Resources Defense Council, a leading group of scientists and environmental advocates, gave Bush lukewarm praise for his speech.

"The president is right to focus on the vast potential of biofuels, wind and solar energy," said Nathan Greene, a senior policy analyst with the council. "But to truly end our national oil addiction, we also need to turn to solutions already available today, like stronger fuel economy performance standards for all vehicles."

Bush: Don't Get Complacent On Energy (AP)

AP, October 13, 2006

President George W. Bush warned Americans on Thursday against becoming complacent about supporting alternative sources of energy just because gasoline prices are falling at the pump.

"I welcome the low gasoline prices," Mr. Bush said. "However, it's not going to dim my enthusiasm for making sure we diversify away from oil."

Lower gasoline prices helped bump up the president's slumping poll ratings in recent weeks, but with congressional and statehouse elections nearing in November, a sexually tainted e-mail scandal involving a Florida Republican congressman's messages to a teenage page has tarred other Republicans in the eyes of many middle-of-the-road voters.

Mr. Bush spoke at a conference en route to a fundraiser in Chicago with House Speaker Dennis Hastert to help two fellow Illinois Republicans in tough races.

The president has been backing Hastert as he fends off calls for him to resign over his handling of the congressional page scandal. Democrats claim Hastert and his staff knew of the e-mail scandal for months and did nothing about it until it was reported by ABC News.

The president on Wednesday called Hastert "very credible" and last week, a "father, teacher and coach who cares about the children of this country."

The political event in Chicago to benefit David McSweeney and Peter Roskam, two candidates for Congress, marks the first time the president has publicly appeared with Hastert since former Florida Rep. Mark Foley resigned in disgrace over sexually explicit messages he sent to teenage male pages.

Hastert insists he was not aware that the Florida congressman was sending the messages until Foley resigned two weeks ago. With less than a month to the Nov. 7 election, the White House is doing its best to prop up the speaker. White House press secretary Tony Snow plans to appear at a fundraiser with Hastert on Saturday.

Democrats need to gain 15 seats to take control of the House of Representatives and six to take power in the Senate. All 435 House seats are up for election, as are 33 of the 100 Senate seats.

In St. Louis, Mr. Bush spoke to a conference of hundreds of businessmen and women, scientists and government officials, including Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman and Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns, who are discussing ways to fast-track the commercialization of renewable energies.

Echoing his State of the Union message that America must end its addiction to foreign oil, Mr. Bush said that by providing new sources of energy to the market, the United States can decrease overall dependence on resources abroad and power the U.S. economy with clean energy produced in the United States.

Energy is a topic that transcends the top two issues in this year's election: the economy and national security.

"We get oil from some countries that don't particularly care for us," he said.

During Mr. Bush's speech, a woman in the crowd stood up and started chanting, "Out of Iraq now" and "Our troops are not renewable." Bush did not recognize her, but continued speaking as the crowd applauded him.

Event officials pulled her out of the audience by her jacket sleeve, and she shouted louder and louder with her fist in the air as she was escorted out of the room. "What are you doing? You're killing us!" she shouted at the president, as he continued with his speech.

The high costs of oil and gas have given new momentum to the push to develop alternative fuels and alternative energy sources. The efforts are especially visible in America's heartland, where a boom in ethanol is expanding.

Six years ago, there were 54 ethanol plants in operation, Johanns says. Today, those numbers have doubled to more than 100 plants, and an additional 44 plants are under construction.

Ethanol, however, is far from a cure-all for the nation's energy problems, according to various studies. It is not as environmentally friendly as some supporters claim and would supply only 12 percent of U.S. motoring fuel — even if every acre of corn were used.

Rep. Edward J. Markey, a senior Democratic member of both the House Energy and Commerce and Resource committees, said that that while biofuels have great promise, they are only part of the solution to the problem of America's dependence on imported oil.

"Unless we mandate stronger fuel economy standards, biofuels by themselves will not be effective in helping us curb America's dependence on imported oil from the Middle East," Markey said. "Unfortunately, the president again failed to announce any new initiatives to improve motor vehicle fuel efficiency standards today."

President Renews Call For Energy Alternatives (HC)

By Julie Mason

Houston Chronicle, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush warned on Thursday that while gasoline prices are coming down, America shouldn't get complacent about energy.

Bush's Advanced Energy Initiative, first detailed in his State of the Union address earlier this year, set a goal of replacing 75 percent of domestic oil imports from the Mideast by 2025.

The public push for new energy policies has waned as fuel prices have fallen. But even with gasoline prices around $2 a gallon, Bush said it's not the time to ease up on the search for alternatives.

"My worry is ... that a low price of gasoline will make us complacent about our future when it comes to energy, because I fully understand that energy is going to help determine whether or not this nation remains the economic leader in the world," he said in St. Louis at a government-sponsored conference on renewable energy.

Alternatives Bush supports include ethanol, a corn-based fuel additive; wind and solar generation; and hybrid vehicles.

"We envision a day in which light and powerful batteries will become available in the marketplace so that you can drive the first 40 miles on electricity, on batteries, and your car won't have to look like a golf cart," Bush said.

"That's not going to help rural Missouri or rural Texas, but it's certainly going to help those who live in the cities."

Jim Connaughton, chairman of the White House Council on Environmental Quality, told reporters on Air Force One that he drove a plug-in hybrid last week that got 156 miles to the gallon.

"All of these technologies will enable a switch to renewable fuels, initially ethanol, increasingly biodiesel, and then ultimately, consistent with the president's State of the Union initiative, cellulosic ethanol, that can be made from a wide variety of plant materials and plant waste materials," he said.

Bush also called for making tax credits for energy research permanent.

"There's a research and development tax credit that's on the books," Bush said. "The problem is, it expires every year, on a year-by-year basis, which means you've got to come back to Congress on a year-to-year basis, which also means there's unpredictability in the tax code, and that's not wise."

Democrats responded to Bush's speech by noting the former oilman's ties to the industry and calling his proposals a "token" effort.

"Despite the rhetoric, President Bush's energy policy is centered on doing what's good for his cronies in big oil rather than addressing the needs of hard-working Americans," Democratic National Committee Press Secretary Stacie Paxton said. "Why else would he have put his friends in big oil in charge of writing our nation's energy policy, a policy that has made us more dependent on foreign oil?"

The Energy Mandate (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

DOJ_NMG_0080203

James Carville, the legendary Clinton campaign adviser who coined the slogan, "It's the economy, stupid," knows a gut issue when he sees one. So when Mr. Carville contacted me the other day to tell me about the newest gut issue his polling was turning up for candidates in the 2006 elections, I was all ears.

"Energy independence," he said. "It's now the No. 1 national security issue. ... It's become kind of a joke with us, because no matter how we ask the question, that's what comes up."

So, for instance, the Democracy Corps, a Democratic strategy group spearheaded by Mr. Carville and the former Clinton pollster Stan Greenberg, asked the following question in an Aug. 27 survey of likely voters: "Which of the following would you say should be the two most important national security priorities for the administration and Congress over the next few years?"

Coming in No. 1, with 42 percent, was "reducing dependence on foreign oil." Coming in a distant second at 26 percent was "combating terrorism." Coming in third at 25 percent was "the war in Iraq," and tied at 21 percent were "securing our ports, nuclear plants and chemical factories" and "addressing dangerous countries like Iran and North Korea." "Strengthening America's military" drew 12 percent. Mr. Carville also noted that because their polls are of "likely voters," they have a slight Republican bias — i.e., they aren't just polling a bunch of liberal greens.

"When we lay out different plans for how to deal with Iraq, any plan that also includes energy independence tops any other plan that doesn't," said Mr. Greenberg, who added that people are not expressing this view because they are worried about price, but because they are starting to understand that our oil dependence is fueling a host of really bad national security problems. "There is frustration that leaders have not taken it up," he added. "There is a sense that the public is ahead of the leaders, and there is actually a sense of relief when anyone talks about [energy independence] with any seriousness."

Mr. Greenberg said he started noticing this during this year's re-election campaign by Ed Rendell, the governor of Pennsylvania. When his Republican challenger, Lynn Swann, first jumped into the race, public polls showed the two candidates in a dead heat. Governor Rendell eventually pulled far ahead in the polls, though, and among the key issues that helped to separate him, said Mr. Greenberg, was the governor's stressing of alternative energy, and his "PennSecurity Fuels Initiative" to lessen dependence on foreign oil and grow the state's clean energy market.

What this means for Democratic Party candidates, argues Mr. Carville, is that it's no longer enough to have "energy security" as part of a 12-step plan for American renewal. No, it needs to become a defining issue of what Democrats are all about.

It should "not be part of an expanding litany, but rather a contracting narrative," explained Mr. Carville. "It can't just be that we are for a woman's right to choose, and education and energy independence. This is the thing we need to get done above and beyond everything else." People should associate "energy security" with Democrats the way they associate "tax cuts" with Republicans, he argued. "This is not something to add to the stew — this is the stock."

The best way for a party that is often viewed as weak on national security to overcome that deficit is to be for energy independence, he noted. Indeed, nothing would be more potent for Democrats now than to capture energy security and all the issues that surround it — from improving our trade deficit by not importing more oil to improving the climate to improving U.S. competitiveness by making us leaders in alternative fuels.

So does this mean the public would accept a gasoline or B.T.U. tax? No, said Mr. Greenberg. The public wants government to impose much higher auto mileage standards on Detroit and much more stringent energy codes on buildings and appliances. People want a tough regulatory response, à la California.

Remember, Mr. Carville and Mr. Greenberg are professional campaign advisers. They get paid to get people elected — not to offer feel-good nostrums. So when they tell you that their polling and focus groups around the country show that "reducing dependence on foreign oil" is voters' top national security priority, you know that this issue has finally arrived. The party that captures it most credibly will be rewarded.

Hello? Anybody listening?

Mr. Reid's Nondisclosure (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0080204

THE BEST CASE for Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) is that he was sloppy about financial disclosure rules in accounting for a real estate deal on which he made a $700,000 profit. The more unattractive case is that the senator's inaccurate description of the investment was an effort to disguise his partnership with a Las Vegas lawyer who's never been charged with wrongdoing but whose name has surfaced in federal investigations involving organized crime, casinos and political bribery since the 1980s. As of now, the evidence points toward sloppiness; Mr. Reid's friendship with Jay Brown isn't exactly a secret in the state. But either way, an Associated Press report about Mr. Reid's dealings doesn't cast the senator in an attractive light. Neither does his response to the AP story, which indicates a casual disregard for the importance of accurate reporting of lawmakers' financial affairs.

Mr. Reid bought undeveloped property on the outskirts of fast-growing Las Vegas for about $400,000 in 1998 -- one parcel outright and a second jointly with Mr. Brown. In 2001, Mr. Reid sold the land for the same price to a corporation he co-owned with Mr. Brown, who in the meantime was getting the land rezoned from residential to commercial use. But the senator didn't report the sale on his annual financial disclosure form. When the new company sold the land to developers in 2004, yielding $1.1 million for Mr. Reid, the senator did not accurately list the transaction or go back and fix the previous forms to reflect the new arrangement.

"Everything I did was transparent," Mr. Reid said at a news conference Wednesday, after the story broke. "Everything is fully disclosed to the ethics committee and everyone else. As I said, if there is some technical change that the ethics committee wants, I'll be happy to do that."

Mr. Reid's professions of transparency and full disclosure are transparently wrong. His investment was not reported in a manner that made clear his partnership with Mr. Brown. It's true -- under the inadequate financial disclosure rules -- that even if Mr. Reid had listed the newly formed corporation, Patrick Lane LLC, that wouldn't have by itself demonstrated Mr. Brown's involvement. Nonetheless, that Mr. Reid no longer owned the land, but instead had sold it for an interest in the Patrick Lane corporation, was not some mere "technical change," as the senator would like to brush it off. It's an essential element of financial disclosure rules, the purpose of which is to know how and with whom public officials are financially entwined.

Bush Confounded By The 'Unacceptable' (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

President Wields Word More Freely as His Frustration Rises and His Influence Ebbs

President Bush finds the world around him increasingly "unacceptable."

In speeches, statements and news conferences this year, the president has repeatedly declared a range of problems "unacceptable," including rising health costs, immigrants who live outside the law, North Korea's claimed nuclear test, genocide in Sudan and Iran's nuclear ambitions.

Bush's decision to lay down blunt new markers about the things he deems intolerable comes at an odd time, a phase of his presidency in which all manner of circumstances are not bending to his will: national security setbacks in North Korea and Iraq, a Congress that has shrugged its shoulders at his top domestic initiatives, a favorability rating mired below 40 percent.

But a survey of transcripts from Bush's public remarks over the past seven years shows the president's worsening political predicament has actually stoked, rather than diminished, his desire to proclaim what he cannot abide. Some presidential scholars and psychologists describe the trend as a signpost of Bush's rising frustration with his declining influence.

In the first nine months of this year, Bush declared more than twice as many events or outcomes "unacceptable" or "not acceptable" as he did in all of 2005, and nearly four times as many as he did in 2004. He is, in fact, at a presidential career high in denouncing events he considers intolerable. They number 37 so far this year, as opposed to five in 2003, 18 in 2002 and 14 in 2001.

Through a spokesman and then in a televised statement, he declared North Korea's claimed nuclear test "unacceptable" before and after it occurred Oct. 9. But he could also be heard on Jan. 9 lecturing students at an elementary school in Glen Burnie, Md., that their recent scores on math and reading proficiency tests were "unacceptable."

Having a president call something "unacceptable" is not the same as having him order U.S. troops into action. But foreign policy experts say the word is one of the strongest any leader can deploy, since it both broadcasts a national position and conveys an implicit threat to take action if his warnings are disregarded.

Bush's use of the term "reflects in some ways his frustration with a world that doesn't seem as amenable to his policies as he would like them to be," said Stanley A. Renshon, a political scientist at the City University of New York. Bush "has strong views; he believes in doing what is right. All of those things give an emotional force to his response" to events he often sees and describes without nuance.

Renshon, who wrote a mostly-favorable book in 2004 about Bush's psychology, said the president's declarations are in keeping with his apparent self-image as a Jeremiah, "railing against the tides" and saying what "people ought to be doing something about."

As such, charting the ebbs and flows of Bush's proclamations of "unacceptability" provides clues to trends in presidential irritations. It also demonstrates that Bush's most intense grievances -- like his attention -- have moved offshore, as evidenced this year by his eight declarations about "unacceptable" events in Iraq, and his 11 declarations about unacceptable behavior by Iran.

As a presidential candidate and in his early presidency, Bush was more apt to denounce domestic events. His assertions that school performance and achievement gaps between white and black students were unacceptable account for almost a third of his usages of that term since 2000.

Bush's targets expanded from 2003 to 2005 to include nine condemnations of "unacceptable" actions by Iraq and Iran, as well as the Social Security system and the administration's own response to the Katrina hurricane. This year, he has hurled the term "unacceptable" at actions by Iraqi insurgents and police, at supporters of a withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq, and at a U.S. law making the degrading treatment of detainees a war crime.

North Korea's planned firing of a missile was unacceptable, Bush said June 29; after Pyongyang fired several missiles July 4, Bush again labeled the action unacceptable on July 7 and July 10. He also deemed unacceptable the country's starving of its people, its use of concentration camps and its claimed nuclear test.

Using such a categorical term is not that surprising after a policy setback, according to Steven Kull, a political psychologist who directs the University of Maryland's Program on International Policy Attitudes. Some people deal with failures, Kull said, "by intensifying an authoritarian posture and insisting that their preferences are equivalent to a moral imperative."

Asked at a news conference on Wednesday whether Washington risks looking feckless in making such categorical statements without taking decisive action, Bush said: "It's very important for the American people and North Korea to understand that that statement still stands. . . . I know this sounds [like] just saying it over and over again, but it's -- rhetoric and actions are all aimed at convincing others" to join Washington's effort to impede that country's weapons ambitions.

Bush's predecessor, Bill Clinton -- often pilloried by Republicans as irresolute -- also labeled many events "unacceptable" or "not acceptable," particularly after the political tables turned against him. When Democrats controlled Congress in 1994, for example, he used those terms four times, according to transcripts of his public comments. In 1995, after his party lost control of both houses, Clinton used the terms 20 times; his annual usages thereafter fluctuated between eight and 22, but they totaled only 86 percent of Bush's usage in a comparable six-year period.

Clinton's peeves were different from Bush's, and a quarter of his uses of the "unacceptable" label after 2004 were aimed at providing leverage in his budget battles with the Republican-led Congress. Clinton also used the label in denouncing poverty, crime, discrimination against women, inadequate health care, school violence, racial disparities and the actions of medical insurance companies. Abroad, he labeled as unacceptable the behavior of Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein unacceptable on four occasions.

MoisÃ©s NaÃ-m, the editor in chief of Foreign Policy magazine, said there is a relationship between "how strident and extreme" the language of many leaders is and how limited their options are. For Bush, NaÃ-m said, "this comes at a time when the world is convinced he is weaker than ever."

Many foreigners think the United States is losing Iraq and are no longer in awe of U.S. military might, NaÃ-m said, and at home, Bush is so weak that Republican candidates are wary of appearing with him. "The world has noticed," NaÃ-m said. "What is happening is that a lot that was deemed unacceptable [by Bush] now has become normal and tolerable."

Bush's proclamations are not the only rhetorical evidence of his mounting frustrations. One of his favorite verbal tics has long been to instruct audiences bluntly to "listen" to what he is about to say, as in "Listen, America is respected" (Aug. 30) or "Listen, this economy is good" (May 24). This year, he made that request more often than he did in a comparable portion of 2005, a sign that he hasn't given up hope it might work.

Book: Bush Aides Called Evangelicals 'Nuts' (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A new book by a former White House official says President Bush's top political advisers privately ridiculed evangelical supporters as "nuts" and "goofy" while embracing them in public and using their votes to help win elections.

The former official also writes that the White House office of faith-based initiatives, which Bush promoted as a nonpolitical effort to support religious social service organizations, was told to host pre-election events designed to mobilize religious voters who would most likely favor Republican candidates.

The assertions by David Kuo, the former No. 2 official in the faith-based initiatives program, have rattled Republican strategists already struggling to convince evangelical voters to turn out this fall for the GOP.

Some conservatives lamented Thursday that the book, "Tempting Faith: An Inside Story of Political Seduction," also comes in the midst of the scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley's interest in male congressional pages, another threat to conservative turnout in competitive House and Senate races.

The book is scheduled to hit stores Monday, but the White House responded to its assertions Thursday as excerpts began leaking out.

In the book, Kuo, who quit the White House in 2003, accuses Karl Rove's political staff of cynically hijacking the faith-based initiatives idea for electoral gain. It assails Bush for failing to live up to his promises of boosting the role of religious organizations in delivering social services.

White House strategists "knew 'the nuts' were politically invaluable, but that was the extent of their usefulness," Kuo writes, according to the cable channel MSNBC, which obtained an advance copy.

"Sadly, the political affairs folks complained most often and most loudly about how boorish many politically involved Christians were. ... National Christian leaders received hugs and smiles in person and then were dismissed behind their backs and described as 'ridiculous' and 'out of control.' "

It is unclear whether Kuo identifies any specific official as using the dismissive language.

The book says that before the 2002 elections, then-White House political director Ken Mehlman issued "marching orders" to use the faith-based initiative in 20 House and Senate races, according to MSNBC. To avoid appearing overtly political, Mehlman said his staff would arrange for congressional offices to request visits from the faith-based program officials.

Throughout the 2002 and 2004 campaigns, faith-based officials would meet with lawmakers in some places in an effort to generate publicity for them, while also hosting conferences in battleground states attracting hundreds of pastors and community activists eager to learn how to apply for federal grants.

A spokeswoman for Mehlman, who is now chairman of the Republican National Committee, said he did not recall the directives mentioned by Kuo. As political director, she said, "it was Mehlman's job to both engage outside groups and inform decision makers in the White House about support for the president's agenda."

Kuo is scheduled to appear Sunday on CBS' 60 Minutes program as part of a rollout arranged by his publisher, Simon & Schuster, which shares a corporate parent with CBS. Despite a publisher-enforced embargo, a copy of the book was purchased early at a Manhattan bookstore by a producer for MSNBC's "Countdown," a spokesman for the cable channel said. Program host Keith Olbermann began reading excerpts on his Wednesday show.

Kuo's descriptions could do political damage to a Republican Party that has staked its formula for success on motivating the conservative base.

"Here we go again," said Paul M. Weyrich, a leading religious conservative with close ties to the White House, referring to the avalanche of negative factors that he predicted would keep "embarrassed Republicans" from voting, just as the Watergate scandal did in the 1970s. "If Republicans win, it will prove God is a Republican, since it will take a miracle."

Weyrich said Kuo, while still a White House official, told him of frustrations that the faith-based program had become entangled in politics. The initiative had been a signature proposal by Bush in the 2000 campaign but lost momentum amid partisan battles on Capitol Hill and the intense focus on security following the Sept. 11 attacks.

Weyrich said that Bush and many of his aides were genuinely interested in the program. But, he added, "I don't have any illusions about Rove. I think that he advocates conservatism because he believes it's the way to win."

The White House denied Kuo's account with help Thursday from two former officials popular among the evangelical base --former speechwriter Michael Gerson and former faith-based initiative director Jim Towey.

Gerson called Kuo's account "laughable," while Towey cited a December, 2002, e-mail from Kuo expressing positive feelings about the program's progress in promoting "compassionate conservatism."

"He doesn't seem to have been working at the same White House where I worked," Towey said. "I had marching orders from the president to keep the faith-based initiative non-political, and I did."

Still, neither Gerson nor Towey denied Kuo's assertion that politics did factor into the initiative.

"Ken Mehlman was doing his job, which was to worry about races," said Towey, who left the White House this year to become president of St. Vincent College, a Catholic school in Pennsylvania.

NSC Spokesman Leaving (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

Frederick Jones, the chief spokesman for the White House's National Security Council, is leaving the high-pressure post this month. Jones, a career Foreign Service officer who was named spokesman after Bush's reelection, has spent 3 1/2 years at the NSC.

Jones said that he will return to the State Department and that he plans to spend time with his wife, who is expecting a baby in January. But Jones said he also will explore other options, in case it is "time to enjoy the fruits of this robust economy."

Gordon Johndroe, director of strategic communications and planning at the State Department, was named yesterday as Jones's replacement. Johndroe has been with the Bush administration since the beginning, including a stint as Laura Bush's press secretary.

Medicare Drug Plan Stability Disputed (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, October 13, 2006

Medicare leaders misled seniors last month when they said premiums for Medicare drug plans would remain about the same in 2007, Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., said Thursday.

Waxman says his staff's analysis shows an average 13.2% increase for next year. But Medicare officials Thursday stuck to their estimate that rates will remain about the same — so long as beneficiaries are willing, in some cases, to drop traditional Medicare and sign up for an alternative, such as an HMO.

The back-and-forth comes about a month before seniors and the disabled begin enrolling in plans for next year and provides new insight into how Medicare officials calculate drug plan premium estimates.

“The only thing everyone can agree on is seniors will need to go out and carefully reassess their options for 2007, because there are fundamental changes in the marketplace,” says Dan Mendelson, president of Avalere Health, a consulting firm in Washington.

In a letter to Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt, Waxman says monthly costs for stand-alone drug plans will rise on average from $25.69 to $29.09 a month.

Rates for the lowest-cost plan in each state will rise an average of 44%, to $13.58 from $9.46. Increases will affect 77% of seniors who remain in the same plan as they chose this year, Waxman said.

By contrast, the Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services issued a press release Sept. 29 saying that the "monthly premium beneficiaries will pay in 2007 will average $24 if they stay in their current plan, about the same as in 2006."

Who's right?

It all depends on what you include in the premium calculations.

"The congressman's analysis is incomplete and misleading … measuring just one of the plan options beneficiaries can use to get their prescription drugs," says Medicare chief Mark McClellan in a written statement.

Waxman's staff looked at premiums for stand-alone drug policies only, which were offered for the first time this year.

Those plans cover about 16 million Medicare members, who get other medical care through the traditional program.

The government's estimates include premiums for Medicare Advantage plans, which offer a full range of health services, including drugs, as an alternative to traditional Medicare. Such plans cover about 7 million members. They include types of managed-care plans, which limit choices of doctors and hospitals, as well as plans that allow a wider range of choice.

Karen Ignagni, president of America's Health Insurance Plans, says seniors should look at the full range of choices.

"There's no doubt that Medicare is providing valuable benefits for seniors, and costs are far less than what was expected at the time legislation passed" creating the new drug benefit, Ignagni says.

Democrat Disputes Medicare Prescription Drug Plan Calculations (WP)

By Christopher Lee

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) says Medicare officials have a problem with their math.

The Bush administration said last month that beneficiaries who stay in their Medicare prescription drug plan will pay an average of $24 a month in premiums next year, the same as this year.

But according to Waxman, average prescription drug premiums in what is known as Medicare Part D will rise to $29 a month in 2007. He cited an analysis by the Democratic staff of the House Government Reform Committee, on which he is the ranking minority member.

"The department's numbers appear to be wrong, and they disguise significant increases in premiums for Medicare drug plans," Waxman wrote in a letter to Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt yesterday. "The release of erroneous information about the cost of premiums -- whether deliberate or not -- is a disservice to millions of seniors and a discredit to the department."

Mark B. McClellan, the head of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, stood by the administration's estimate. He called Waxman's analysis "misleading" and said it might discourage the 23 million people enrolled in the Medicare drug benefit from evaluating all options.

The discrepancy arises from the different ways that the two sides calculated average premiums. The administration average is based on both stand-alone Medicare plans that cover drugs only and heavily subsidized, HMO-style "Medicare Advantage" plans that offer a broad range of health care and do not charge a separate premium for drug coverage. Waxman's staff focused on the stand-alone plans, since 90 percent of seniors enrolled in the drug benefit choose such plans.

"The congressman's analysis is inaccurate and misleading because it is selective, measuring just one of the plan options beneficiaries can use to get their prescription drugs," McClellan said in a statement.

Waxman said Medicare officials are being "unrealistic" by putting the Medicare Advantage plans on the same footing as the more popular drug-only plans.

"The only way the Administration's numbers can possibly add up is by including artificial estimates of the costs of drug coverage in Medicare managed care plans," he said in a statement. "Most seniors won't abandon traditional Medicare just to keep the costs of their drug coverage from going up, nor should they have to."

He said the assertion that premiums will remain nearly flat in 2007 was reminiscent of the administration's assurances to Congress in 2003 that the drug benefit would cost $400 billion over 10 years -- even though federal actuaries at the time were estimating the true cost as more than $500 billion.

McClellan said the estimated cost of the benefit has dropped lately as the insurance companies that offer the federally subsidized drug coverage have charged lower-than-expected premiums while competing to lure seniors to their plans.

McClellan plans today to announce improvements to the CMS Drug Plan Finder, a tool available on the Medicare Web site to help beneficiaries choose a drug plan. Open enrollment for 2007 will begin Nov. 15.

Medicare Drug Premiums Will Rise For Many (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — Two weeks after the Bush administration announced that Medicare prescription premiums would stay about the same next year, a new analysis by congressional Democrats indicates that for a majority of middle-class seniors, rates will jump 13% — well above the overall inflation rate.

In a sternly worded letter to Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt, Rep. Henry A. Waxman, D-Los Angeles, accused the administration of "deceptive advertising."

Medicare Administrator Mark B. McClellan fired back with a statement calling the analysis by Waxman's Government Reform Committee staff "inaccurate and misleading."

But several independent experts said it is true that seniors using the most popular type of Medicare prescription coverage — a stand-alone drug plan — will face significant premium increases next year unless they switch to more economical plans that often come with more restrictions. The prescription drug benefit is overseen by the government but delivered by private insurance companies that offer a variety of plans with differing features and premiums.

"If you look at the plans where most seniors are now enrolled, many are increasing premiums," said Tricia Neuman of the Kaiser Family Foundation, who oversees Medicare policy for the nonpartisan research group.

"What was the best deal last year may not be the best deal next year," said James Firman, president of the National Council on Aging.

The argument over how much seniors will pay for prescription drug insurance next year comes in the home stretch of a campaign in which Republicans and Democrats are working hard to attract the votes of older Americans. The announcement that premiums would remain essentially unchanged may have been welcome news to many seniors, but Waxman argued that Medicare officials based that claim on "three-card monte," a reference to a card game favored by con artists.

The claim that premiums would stay flat was based on the average of expected costs for all Medicare participants, including about 6 million who get coverage through managed-care plans that are heavily subsidized by the government and generally do not charge a separate monthly premium for their prescription benefits.

Waxman, however, excluded the managed-care beneficiaries and focused on the 16 million seniors with traditional, fee-for-service Medicare, who have enrolled in stand-alone drug plans. These plans offer prescriptions only, unlike the managed-care plans that also provide hospital and doctors' care. Premiums for the stand-alone plans are projected to rise significantly.

For example, monthly premiums for Humana's popular low-price plan will rise from an average of about $10 to around $15, the company confirmed — an increase of 50%.

"The dollar amounts may not be so great, but premiums are nonetheless on the rise," Neuman said.

Even with the increases, Humana still expects to have the lowest-cost plan in 38 states. "We still feel like we're the low-cost plan overall," spokesman Dick Brown said.

Another Humana offering, the PDP Complete plan, this year covered brand-name drugs in the so-called doughnut hole, a coverage gap Congress and the administration built into the benefit to save money. Next year, that plan will not cover brand-name drugs in the doughnut hole. And monthly premiums will rise from an average of about $58 to about $80.

The Democratic analysis concluded that the average premium for all Medicare stand-alone plans would rise from $25.69 per month in 2006 to $29.09 in 2007.

A Medicare news release issued Sept. 29 said: "The monthly premium beneficiaries will pay in 2007 will average $24 if they stay in their current plan — about the same as in 2006."

The changing premiums portend a new reality for Medicare beneficiaries, said healthcare market analyst Dan Mendelson. Until now the program offered a standard government-issue benefit for all. With the expanding role for private insurers, that's not the case anymore.

"Seniors are going to have to constantly reassess their coverage relative to their own health status and relative to what choices are being offered in the marketplace," said Mendelson, president of Avalere Health, a consulting firm. "These are commercial plans that change from year to year based on their experience, and the only way for seniors to navigate the marketplace effectively is to constantly reassess their options."

For 2006, seniors had six months to pick a drug plan. But for 2007, the open enrollment period will be about six weeks, from Nov. 15 through Dec. 31. Medicare's computerized Plan Finder, which allows seniors to compare costs and coverage for plans, will have information on the 2007 offerings starting today. It is on the Internet at http://www.medicare.gov .

"Choosing a plan may not be fun, but plans are changing," Neuman said. "I think seniors will be well advised to go back to the drawing board and revisit the decision they made for 2006."

Firman, of the group on aging, said Medicare should consider releasing the premiums for stand-alone plans separately. "There is a value in more detail being provided to people," he said.

Council Debates Ways To Divvy Up '07 Pay Raise (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The government's advisory group on federal pay yesterday backed an across-the-board 2007 salary increase of 1.7 percent for federal employees, but left open how additional funds for the raise should be split among big cities and other areas.

The annual pay raise for the government's white-collar employees has two components: a national increase for all workers, and a raise that varies by locality. In most years, the Federal Salary Council, an advisory group that includes White House appointees and union leaders, has recommended a formula for setting the locality portion of the raise.

The council's staff had prepared a proposal that would have sent more of the money available for locality pay to some big cities where federal salaries lag the most behind the private sector.

But the council pulled back from approving the proposal after a union president raised questions about it and said such a change would be premature until more data are available to compare salaries in the federal and private sectors.

Colleen M. Kelley , president of the National Treasury Employees Union, pointed out that most federal employees outside large metropolitan areas would have received a raise of less than 2 percent under the staff recommendation.

The council signed off on a compromise offered by Kelley that urged the White House to designate 1.7 percent of the 2007 pay increase as an across-the-board raise, in keeping with a 1990 pay law. The remainder of the increase, Kelley proposed, "would be split between locality areas according to administration recommendations, with each locality pay area getting some portion of the funds available for locality pay increases."

The council's work was more difficult this year because Congress has not settled on how much of a raise to provide the government's 1.8 million employees.

Spending bills before Congress would provide the civil service with a 2.7 percent raise next year. But Congress has voted for a 2.2 percent raise for the military, raising the prospect that House-Senate negotiators will lower the federal employee raise to that amount.

After Congress and the White House agree to an overall average raise, a portion is parceled out among 31 metropolitan areas and a catch-all category called the "Rest of the United States."

In 1990 Congress approved variations in federal pay, based on changes in wages for local labor markets, in hopes of closing a "pay gap" between federal and nonfederal employees. The staff paper prepared for the salary council said "it is not feasible" in 2007 to close the same proportion of the pay gap in each locality area as the law envisions. The staff proposed an alternative approach in hopes of helping employees in high-cost big cities where pay gaps are the largest.

Under the staff's recommendation, if Congress approved a 2.2 percent raise, employees in the "Rest of the United States" would get a 1.81 percent pay increase and those in the Washington area 2.64 percent. In contrast, under the traditional allocation method for a 2.2 percent increase, RUS employees would get raises of 2.03 percent and Washington area employees would receive 2.4 percent.

Federal officials have been working to improve the methodology for comparing federal jobs with those in the private sector and in state and local governments. The staff paper indicated that the revised methodology found a bigger pay gap than previously calculated. The average pay gap this year was 18.4 percent, according to the paper, up from 13.4 percent last year.

The paper suggested that the gap may have grown because of an increase in the number of supervisory jobs covered by new salary surveys, as well as other statistical adjustments. They also noted that more changes in the methodology will take place over the next three to four years, making it difficult to form judgments on how federal salaries stack up against the private sector.Talk Shows

Air Force Seeks $13 Billion To Start Replacing Tankers (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

WASHINGTON, Oct. 12 — Air Force officials said Thursday that they were seeking $13 billion over the next five years to replace their aging fleet of aerial refueling aircraft, a process that will take decades and could grow into one of the service's largest procurement programs.

In a meeting with reporters, Air Force Secretary Michael W. Wynne and Gen. T. Michael Moseley, the Air Force chief of staff, said that they hoped to award a contract by next summer and that the current timetable calls for the first planes to be delivered by 2011.

General Moseley said that the Air Force intended to buy 10 to 15 planes a year, ending up with a total fleet of about 450 aircraft. Some analysts have said the cost of replacing the tankers could total more than $100 billion over the next three decades.

"It's important to get started" on replacing the fleet of 579 tankers, most of them over 40 years old and still playing a vital role in refueling fighters, bombers and other aircraft flying every day over Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere, General Moseley said.

Loren B. Thompson, an analyst with the Lexington Institute, a military policy research group in Virginia, said the Air Force worried that an accident involving any of the current tankers could force the entire fleet to be grounded.

"The Air Force is extremely concerned that because nobody has ever operated a fleet of jets this long, some design deficiency, like metal fatigue, will ground the fleet making it impossible for them to get places they need to go," Mr. Thompson said.

In January, the Pentagon canceled a $23 billion deal to lease 767 tankers from Boeing after the disclosure that a former Air Force procurement officer, Darleen Druyun, was found to have favored Boeing in contracts before being hired by the company.

The competition is likely to be between Boeing and a joint venture of the Northrop Grumman Corporation and the parent company of Airbus, the European Aeronautic Defense and Space Company.

"Darleen Druyun's impact has something to do with the desire to get an open acquisition process," General Moseley said. "That is absolutely fair and required."

Initially, the Air Force intends to purchase tankers derived from successful commercial airliner designs as replacements for the current KC-135, a midsize tanker built in the late 1950's and early 1960's. About 100 of the 520 KC-135's are set to be retired by 2010. The Air Force also flies larger KC-10's bought in the 1980's.

By opening the contract for competition, the Air Force is hoping to put the scandal behind it, the officials said. But it will also have to persuade Congress, which over the last two years has prohibited the Air Force from retiring any KC-135 tankers, to support replacing the tanker fleet at a time of increasing pressure on the military budget.

The Pentagon will include the request for the $13 billion to begin buying the tankers in its budget proposal for the fiscal year 2008, which will be formally presented next February.

This year, the Bush administration sought $36 million in advance financing for the tanker production, along with $204 million in research and development, but Congress provided no production funds and cut the research money to $70 million.

Mr. Wynne said Thursday that the Air Force had elevated the tanker replacement program to its top procurement priority. The tanker program "is a little bit, if you will, less sexy than funding for fighters and bombers," he said, but it is the "underpinning of America's strategic capabilities."

'Every Reason To Be Proud' (WSJ)

By Lawrence B. Lindsey

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

The government has just closed the books on the 2006 fiscal year and released the figures for revenue collected. It has also been five years since the first of the Bush tax cuts began to help the economy and consumers' wallets, so it is a natural time to look back and evaluate their economic and budgetary effectiveness.

We now know that economic activity first began declining in the third quarter of 2000, although the data at the time didn't show it; and 2001 was a rough year, with growth moving back and forth around the zero mark. In August most American families received the first part of their tax cut -- a check, typically for $600. But this was overshadowed by 9/11. In the weeks following the attacks the economy began to gradually shut down. The stock exchanges and New York bond markets were closed, while air travel and transport stopped in an economy where over half a million business travelers flew every day and 25% of trade by value arrived and left by air. Uncertainty paralyzed the business community.

President Bush gave numerous speeches to rally the nation to return to normal; administration officials fanned out across the country to urge Americans to spend. The private sector did its part: Auto companies began zero percent financing and some companies made promotions based directly on the tax cuts. Far from being the disaster most forecasters (including me) had feared, the fourth quarter showed the biggest consumer-led surge since 1992. As business inventories were drawn down, production could expand again.

Mr. Bush followed up with an investment-oriented tax cut proposal in his 2002 State of the Union message. But by mid-year, with growth returning but only at a modest clip, we began working on a proposal to accelerate the multiyear tax cuts of 2001 to take full effect in 2003. We also began developing proposals to improve investor psychology through a long-overdue reduction in the double taxation of dividends. The final bill was enacted in May 2003.

The tax-cut program was not particularly novel or out-of-the-mainstream: It just combined some very sensible supply-side oriented reforms to make the tax code less burdensome with some much-needed demand-side relief. The focus of the early tax cuts was on families with children, people with high propensities to spend. A typical middle-class couple with two children got a minimum of $1,600 in relief -- equivalent to a 4% increase in their real take-home pay, or two years' worth of real pay raises in the 1990s.

Nor did Mr. Bush propose the tax cut by accident. He unveiled it in December 1999 in Des Moines, Iowa, at the height of the stock market bubble, when everyone was feeling a little giddy and some economists were arguing that we had repealed the business cycle. So it took great courage for him to say, "Yet I also believe in tax cuts for another practical reason: because they provide insurance against economic recession. . . . I hope for continued growth -- but it is not guaranteed. A president must work for the best case, and prepare for the worst." He was well-prepared; and as Alan Greenspan said, the tax cuts were "extraordinarily well timed from the point of view of the economy." * * *

While the good positive effects of the tax cut on the economy are relatively non-controversial, their effect on the federal budget stirs a great deal of controversy. The just-released figures on tax receipts in 2006 allow us to shed some light on this debate.

First, a look back at 2002 shows that it was the collapse of the bubble and the effects of 9/11 that were mainly responsible for the decline in tax revenue and the rise of the budget deficit -- and not the tax cuts. As a baseline for comparison, consider the economic and revenue projections the departing Clinton administration prepared as background for the FY 2002 Budget. That projection was based on continued solid growth and no tax cuts, although growth had in fact already begun to decline. As a result, the Clinton FY 2002 budget projected revenues of $2.210 trillion; but only $1.853 trillion was actually collected. This provided a FY 2002 shortfall of $357 billion, the result of both the tax cuts and the drop in economic activity.

The Joint Committee on Taxation estimated that the FY 2002 revenue loss of the first Bush tax cut was $38 billion and $51 billion from the second Bush tax cut -- $89 billion in all. This leaves $268 billion of the shortfall to be attributed to the effects of the collapse of the 1990s bubble, the attacks on 9/11, and other economic drags. Swings in economic activity, not discretionary tax changes, drive the great majority of the swings in federal revenues, and were the cause of the deficits of the early part of the decade. Since then, it has been a matter of fiscal "catch-up."

The data suggest that process of "catch-up" has been far more successful than official estimates thought possible. In August 2003 the non-partisan CBO forecast tax revenue in FY 2006 at $2.276 trillion (which excluded $53 billion of tax relief passed subsequently). That forecast included the effects of the slowdown, a return to more rapid growth, and the 2003 tax cuts. But the data just released showed FY 2006 revenues of $2.407 trillion, $131 billion higher than CBO projected after the tax cuts were accelerated and $624 billion higher than the FY 2003 revenues. For perspective on that $131 billion of extra revenues, the total 2006 revenue loss from all of the president's tax cuts was only $193 billion.

There were two reasons for the revenue feedback. First, after the tax cuts were passed the economy expanded more rapidly than most projected at the time. Second, more taxes were collected from each dollar of GDP than expected. When an economy of a given size produces higher-than-expected revenue after a tax change, it must mean that the tax code has become a more efficient revenue generator. Lower tax rates, particularly on dividends and entrepreneurial income, provide incentives for people to give up some of their previous -- economically distorting but tax-efficient -- behavior.

This response is underscored by the distribution of receipts, which have shifted decidedly up the income scale. Although critics endlessly call the Bush measures tax cuts for the rich, the share of income taxes paid by the top 1%, 5% and 10% of taxpayers has moved up. These people were most affected by higher rates of the past, and have the greatest ability to reorient their economic behavior when rates are reduced.

While economists will argue about how to divide up the extra revenue between the demand-side and supply-side responses, the more interesting question is what would have happened without an aggressive fiscal policy response. In Japan, five years after its bubble burst, tax receipts were still 14% below their peak because the economy was so weak; in the U.S. they are 19% higher than in 2000. Evidence suggests that monetary policy, though helpful, was not the lone cause of the recovery. Consumption spending turned up sharply in the third quarter of 2003, coincident with reduced tax withholding in paychecks. Nearly every important macroeconomic variable, including the unemployment rate, started improving noticeably in the second half of 2003, the first time the full impact of the tax cuts hit the economy. Moreover, consumption spending turned up in advance of the housing boom, whereas in Australia, New Zealand and the U.K. the increase in home prices clearly led an acceleration in consumption growth.

Mr. Bush has every reason to be proud of his tax cuts. Granted, he shouldn't expect a chorus of bipartisan praise based on the numbers just released. But he should rest assured that economic historians will credit the tax cuts as having been a model of the successful application of economic theory to the real world.

Mr. Lindsey, president and CEO of the Lindsey Group, was President Bush's chief economic adviser from 2001 to 2002.

Deficit Diversions (WP)

AND THEN WHAT? That's the question everyone should be asking in the wake of Wednesday's announcement that the 2006 federal budget deficit came in at $247.7 billion, the lowest in four years. President Bush trumpeted the good news, saying that not only had the administration met its goal of cutting the deficit in half but that "we've done it three years ahead of schedule."

Forget the tussle over whether that's much of an achievement: Deficits tend to go down during periods of economic recovery, and cutting the deficit in half has always been something of an arbitrary target and the product of a puffed-up estimate at the outset -- the $512 billion the administration projected for 2004, at a time when the Congressional Budget Office forecast was $477 billion.

The important question, which is to say the question that the president and his congressional enablers aren't facing, is where things go from here. And the answer is, nowhere good. The trend line goes up, starting as early as next year, when the CBO projects a deficit of $286 billion. Over the long term, the outlook is bleak. Assuming that Congress makes the president's tax cuts permanent and continues to adjust the alternative minimum tax, deficits will total almost $3.5 trillion over the next decade and average $349 billion a year, according to calculations by the liberal Center on Budget and Policy Priorities. And that's the good decade: After that come the really steep costs of the retirement of the baby boomers and exploding entitlement spending.

There is no indication in either party of any willingness to come to terms with this reality. Lawmakers balked this year at any cuts to entitlement programs. The only two appropriations bills that Congress has managed to approve so far increase spending. According to the CBO, spending in the fiscal year that just ended grew by 8.7 percent, "the fastest rate of increase since 1990." A big chunk of that, about $50 billion, was one-time outlays for hurricane relief. But another worrisome factor was the rising cost of interest payments, which jumped $45 billion, or 24 percent, making it the fastest-growing category of federal spending.

Mr. Bush pledged to return to the subject of Social Security and entitlement spending after the election. "The fundamental question facing the government in Washington, D.C., is will we have the will necessary to deal with these entitlement programs, to leave behind a better budget picture, to deal with the unfunded liabilities and the mandatory programs for future generations," he said.

Nice words -- as nice as words like them sounded last year, and all the years before that. Unless Mr. Bush shifts course and gets realistic about putting both revenue and spending on the table, and unless Democrats shift course and get realistic about the fact that current promises to beneficiaries are unsustainable, it's those "future generations" that are going to pay the price for today's irresponsibility and inaction.

Faster FDA Cures (WSJ)

Whoever controls Congress next year, the Food and Drug Administration is sure to be a political battleground. The controversial Prescription Drug User Fee Act of 1992 is scheduled for reauthorization, and the conventional political wisdom holds that the FDA is too "cozy" with Big Pharma and thus overeager to rubber-stamp dangerous new drugs.

So allow us to draw attention to an important and undernoticed study, "Assessing the Safety and Efficacy of the FDA," published by the National Bureau of Economic Research. Its surprising conclusion is that the FDA does a pretty good job managing "the central speed-safety trade-off" involved in drug approvals -- and might even do well to move faster.

The authors looked at 662 drugs approved between 1979 and 2002, a period that included the passage of the Prescription Drug User Fee Act that allowed drug companies to help fund the FDA budget in exchange for faster reviews. They found that the resulting modest gains in drug review times have produced unambiguous public benefits.

In monetary terms, the authors estimate that the law improved consumer welfare by as much as $19 billion. But more importantly, they found that more rapid access to beneficial drugs saved between 180,000 and 310,000 "life-years." By contrast, assuming that every risky drug withdrawn in that period was the fault of the Prescription Drug User Fee Act produces an upper-bound estimate of only 56,000 life-years lost.

This study deserves a lot more attention than it's been getting, since the Washington debate is dominated by bad ideas about how to make FDA regulation much more onerous. In particular, a recent report from the National Academy of Science's Institute of Medicine (IOM) is being spun as evidence that the FDA is somehow "broken" and in need of fundamental reform.

We've looked at the IOM report in detail, and it's hardly as damning of the FDA as media reports suggest. For example, the report explicitly rejects the idea that high-profile drug withdrawals -- such as Vioxx -- "represent de facto failures of the drug safety regulatory system. . . This is not so." The IOM also rejects the basic idea behind legislation sponsored by Senators Chuck Grassley and Chris Dodd that the FDA should have a drug safety office separate from the office that approves drugs in the first place: "Risk and benefit cannot be considered in isolation from one another."

But despite these sensible observations, the IOM still wants more regulation. Among its recommendations are vastly increased levels of post-approval safety monitoring. That might make sense if the goal is making regulators comfortable with the idea of approving drugs more quickly. But that doesn't appear to be what the IOM and its cheering section want.

The IOM also proposes draconian restrictions on new-drug advertising and tighter conflict-of-interest standards for FDA advisory panel members. This despite the fact that the most qualified scientists and doctors have substantial sources of private income, and despite a study by the Naderite Public Citizen group that failed to find one instance of a panel recommendation that would have changed if allegedly conflicted members had been excluded.

Most fundamentally, the IOM presents little evidence that there is even a problem to remedy. By contrast, the National Bureau authors at least attempt to put some real facts on the table. They note that the absence of other attempts at hard, quantitative analysis in the great FDA debate is "somewhat paradoxical, since despite the agency's strict adherence to evidence-based evaluation of products overseen, there is less evidence on its own safety and efficacy. Put differently, no product application would pass the FDA approval process with the quality and type of evidence that currently exists for evaluating the FDA policies themselves."

The upshot of the economists' report is that the 1992 Prescription Drug User Fee Act deserves reauthorization. But the evidence also suggests Congress should probably be looking for other ways to make FDA approvals still faster. Despite the high-profile Vioxx panic, the FDA is far more likely to kill by depriving you of a drug than allowing you to take a dangerous one.

Fed Reports Resilience In Economy (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

Maybe the sputtering housing market will not be that big of a drag on the economy after all.

Falling gas prices are leaving Americans with more money to spend, and inflation has become less of a threat in recent weeks, according to a report released yesterday by the Federal Reserve.

Wall Street reveled at the news. Stock prices — already buoyed by a series of strong corporate earnings announcements from companies like McDonald's and Costco — surged even higher after the Fed's report, the beige book, came out yesterday afternoon.

The benchmark Standard & Poor's 500-stock index jumped to its highest close in more than five and a half years. The Dow Jones industrial average, which last week broke a record high that had stood since 2000, climbed past 11,900 to close fewer than 53 points short of 12,000. The Nasdaq composite gained more than a point and a half.

A separate report showing that the nation's trade deficit reached a record high in August was apparently an afterthought for investors. The Commerce Department said that on a seasonally adjusted basis, Americans imported $69.9 billion more than they exported, up 2.7 percent from a $68 billion deficit in July. That increase was in large part a result of near record petroleum prices.

While the beige book was hardly a glowing picture of the nation's economy, it did strike a generally optimistic tone. It described a "widespread cooling" in residential housing but noted that growth in commercial real estate activity was picking up some of the slack.

And there were a handful of areas where residential home sales "showed signs of resilience," the report said. Manhattan, Houston and Sioux Falls, S.D., were among these pockets of strength.

"It seems like things are still stable," said Marisa DiNatale of Moody's Economy.com. "There may be moderating growth, but it's certainly not a drastic slowdown."

Other potential problem spots in the economy — rising prices and slower consumer spending — do not appear to be much of a problem at all in many areas of the country, the report said. Consumers spent freely, taking vacations and shopping for back-to-school items. Wage growth was described as generally "modest." And there were few signs of pressure from higher prices as the cost of gasoline dropped.

Economists said falling fuel prices should be reflected in the next trade deficit report. Energy costs were the major reason for the widening trade gap in August, with the deficit in petroleum-related products accounting for nearly all of the $1.9 billion increase. The amount Americans spent on foreign-made household appliances and electronics also rose.

"The trade balance should improve significantly soon," Dimitry Fleming, an economist with ING, said in a research note. "August, however, was never going to be the starting point, with the lagged effects of higher oil prices."

The growing trade imbalance with China was another major factor in the ballooning trade deficit. The unadjusted trade deficit for August was $79 billion. Nearly a third of that, $22 billion, represented the gap in trade between the United States and China.

The numbers defied expectations. Economists who were surveyed before the numbers came out predicted that the overall deficit would fall in August, but it rose, seasonally adjusted, by $1.9 billion from July.

When the gap hit a record in July, economists said they believed that the numbers were nearing a peak. But as energy prices remained high this summer, the deficit continued to swell. Still, many economists said yesterday that they now believed that the turning point was near.

"This is probably as bad as it gets," wrote Paul Ashworth, senior United States economist with the economics research firm Capital Economics.

Yesterday, the Chinese reported their own trade numbers, which showed a surplus of $15.3 billion for September. China's trade surplus hit a record $18.8 billion in August.

While American reliance on foreign goods is showing no signs of weakening, exports also remained strong. After declining in July, exports grew in August by 2.3 percent, to $122.4 billion. But that rate of growth was not strong enough to offset the rise in imports, which reached $192.3 billion in August. That was an increase of 2.4 percent.

Peter Kretzmer, senior economist with Bank of America, said such strong import growth was a sign the economy would expand at a faster rate in the final months of the year. "We've been surprised by how strong import growth is," he said. "This strong domestic demand may be a bit of a harbinger of a strong domestic economy going into the fourth quarter."

Pressures Exist Amid Expansion, Fed Survey Says (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

Job markets are tightening across the country, but that hasn't yet produced a notable acceleration in wages, the Federal Reserve's latest survey of economic conditions has found.

The Fed's "beige book" also found sharply slowing housing activity but no sign yet that consumer spending has broadly slowed. Falling energy prices have provided some relief while not yet leading to notably lower consumer prices, it said. (Read the report1)

"Economic activity continued to expand," according to the report, which is prepared a few weeks in advance of each policy meeting of the central bank. Four of the Fed's 12 districts reported that business activity "firmed," a couple said it "cooled" and others said growth was "moderate or mixed."

The Fed's next meeting is scheduled for Oct. 24-25. It is widely expected to leave its short-term interest-rate target at 5.25% as it waits for inflation to moderate.

The survey found labor shortages spreading beyond skilled and technical positions. The Fed's Kansas City district said most contacts "continued to report some kind of labor shortage," in some cases for entry-level workers.

Despite that, employers didn't report much pressure to raise wages. "Despite tight white-collar labor markets, only a couple of firms are budgeting for higher average pay raises in 2007 than in 2006," the Boston district reported.

Both housing and automobile sales were reported as weak across the country, with the Philadelphia district noting a growing number of small car dealerships going out of business and half of the homebuilders contacted in the Cleveland district having reduced their work forces. A real-estate agent in Washington, D.C., called that area's market "horrible."

However, other consumer spending remained firm. The manager of a chain department store in Charlotte, N.C., said sales were "going strong" as local factory employment expanded.

Companies tried, with mixed success, to pass on prior increases in raw-material prices to consumers, but there were signs the pressure had peaked.

In the Dallas district, "lower energy costs have halted the rise in selling prices and not yet resulted in price declines." In the same district, some producers of construction materials "report that some large publicly traded builders have sent letters asking for price reductions to help them achieve quarterly income projections. This has led them to become wary about doing business with these builders."

Meanwhile, Michael Moskow, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago, gave an upbeat message on the economy and a warning on inflation. "Outside of housing, there do not appear to be any imbalances that would foreshadow" large pullback in spending elsewhere in the economy, he said in a speech to a real-estate group in Chicago. Inflation, he said, "has been too high" and while it should "gradually come down...there are substantial risks to that forecast." If expectations of inflation increase, the Fed should raise interest rates, he suggested.

Economy Keeps Growing, But Housing And Inflation Look Problematic (USAT)

USA Today, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — The economy grew at a mixed or moderate pace in much of the nation from late August through September, with “widespread cooling” in housing, the Federal Reserve said Thursday.

In its beige book, an anecdotal look at the economy named for the color of its cover, the Fed said wage and price pressures were mixed.

The beige book will be used for the Fed's Oct. 24-25 meeting.

The Fed expects slower growth to gradually reduce inflation. But minutes of the Fed's Sept. 20 meeting, issued Wednesday, said officials saw a “substantial risk” their forecast might not pan out. USA TODAY economics reporters Sue Kirchhoff and Barbara Hagenbaugh looked at the beige book.

1st District:

Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Vermont, most of Connecticut. Business was “somewhat mixed.” Factory costs eased but were above a year ago. Houses in Massachusetts are now on the market an average 110 days, up a month from 2005.

2nd District:

New York, northern New Jersey, Fairfield County, Conn. Business showed signs of “strengthening.” Hiring was steady to stronger. New York City tourism was robust. Housing markets in New Jersey and Upstate New York kept weakening with some falloff in home renovation.

3rd District:

Delaware, southern New Jersey, eastern Pennsylvania. Growth seems to have slowed. Manufacturing dipped, retail sales were up, though the auto sector lagged behind. Mortgage lending fell. Wages have been rising a bit faster than at the same time in 2005.

4th District:

Ohio, eastern Kentucky, western Pennsylvania, northern West Virginia. Growth was modest, with businesses worried about the slowing auto and housing sectors. Commercial builders called business strong, but worried inquiries were “beginning to taper off.” Trucking and shipping service demand softened.

5th District:

Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, southern West Virginia, District of Columbia. Activity expanded moderately, with retailers and manufacturers doing better and housing doing worse. Labor markets were generally tight, with skilled workers tough to find.

6th District:

Alabama, Florida, Georgia, eastern Tennessee, southern Louisiana, southern Mississippi. Activity was mixed. Housing trended lower in Florida and other areas. Labor shortages caused wage pressures in some areas, and firms were seeing cost increases related to energy and raw material prices.

7th District:

DOJ_NMG_0080218

Iowa, northern Indiana, northern Illinois, southern Michigan, southern Wisconsin. Consumer spending rose "modestly," with retailers calling the back-to-school season "nothing stellar." The recent fall in gas prices gave sales of non-gasoline items a small boost. Manufacturers continued to see a shortage of skilled workers.

8th District:

Arkansas, southern Illinois, southern Indiana, western Kentucky, northern Mississippi, eastern Missouri, western Tennessee. Manufacturing expanded, with several firms planning to open plants. However, the auto parts industry planned to lay off workers and cut production. Permits for new home construction posted double-digit declines in the Louisville, St. Louis and Memphis areas.

9th District:

Minnesota, Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, upper Michigan, northern Wisconsin. The job market tightened a bit. Wage increases were "moderate." Tourism was up a bit from a year ago; one official in South Dakota said the pheasant-hunting season held promise. The alternative energy industry was expanding rapidly.

10th District:

Colorado, Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, Wyoming, western Missouri, northern New Mexico. The rate of hiring outpaced layoffs, and "most contacts" reported labor shortages, particularly for skilled and specialized workers. Still, wage pressures eased a bit. Consumer spending firmed, with weakness in home furnishings.

11th District:

Texas, northern Louisiana, southern New Mexico. Imported, fuel-efficient cars outsold domestic vehicles. Although some rain fell in September, drought conditions persisted. Cotton production could be off 35% from last year. A sharp drop in natural gas prices led to industry caution.

12th District:

Alaska, Arizona, California, Hawaii, Idaho, Nevada, Oregon, Utah, Washington. Inflation "remained modest." Pay rose more rapidly for workers in short supply, such as those in health care, finance and construction, and in such regions as Idaho and Utah. The pace of home sales, construction and price growth slowed.

US Trade Deficit Hits All-time High (FT)

By Krishna Guha

Financial Times, October 13, 2006

The US trade deficit hit a record high for the second successive month in August, accentuating concerns about global imbalances and raising fresh doubts about the strength of US third quarter growth.

Economists were on Thursday revising down their estimates of growth in the quarter, which some now expect will fall below 2 per cent.

Meanwhile, the Federal Reserve issued its latest beige book, which suggested that consumer spending firmed in September and early October, but characterised growth overall as "moderate or mixed."

It said "nearly all districts reported that housing market conditions continued to soften" with rising inventors and additional incentives for buyers.

There was little anecdotal evidence to support the notion – advanced by some Fed officials - that housing activity may already be close to its trough.

The beige book reported that "the majority of districts characterised price pressures as contained."

Labour market conditions were described as "taut" with skilled workers in short supply in some areas. Some regions faced shortages of professional, scientific and technical workers, for example.

Wage growth was "generally modest".

The vast services sector "generally strengthened across districts since the last report," the Beige Book said, while manufacturing activity remained "generally strong.

DOJ_NMG_0080219

The August trade deficit hit $69.9bn, equivalent to an annual rate of nearly $840bn, figures released yesterday by the Department of Commerce showed.The somewhat balanced tone is consistent with the Fed remaining on hold for an extended period as it seeks to verify that inflation is easing as expected.

Part of the increase was driven by oil prices, which continued to rise in August before falling sharply into September.

However, the volume of oil imported also rose, and imports more generally were strong.

Exports remained healthy, growing at 2.3 per cent in August against 2.4 per cent for imports, but with imports starting from a much larger base, the net effect was a widening deficit.

Haseeb Ahmed, an economist at JP Morgan, said "it was a bit of a surprise, in the sense that imports were much stronger than the market was expecting." He said this boded well for inventories, which should partly offset the drag on growth.

JP Morgan still looks to a recovery in net trade to support US growth next year.

Most economists predicted a rapid turnaround in trade in the current quarter due to lower oil and other commodity prices, which would in turn boost fourth quarter growth.

"The narrowing of the nominal trade deficit will be substantial this quarter," said Peter Kretzmer, an economist at Bank of America Securities.

However, continued strength in US consumption could slow the longer term adjustment.

U.S. Trade Gap Widened In August (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

The U.S. trade deficit jumped to a record $69.86 billion in August, powered by strong imports of consumer goods from China and the steep cost of imported oil.

The 2.7% increase from July kept the nation on track to shatter its record annual trade gap of more than $700 billion in 2005, the Commerce Department said yesterday. However, the data released yesterday offered some glimmers of hope that the trade picture might be poised to improve over the next few months.

"While the sharp rise in the August deficit is a little disconcerting, this should be the high-water mark for the deficit this year," said Brian Bethune, an economist with Global Insight, an economic forecasting firm.

Mr. Bethune said the recent decline in oil prices could reduce the nation's monthly bill for imported oil, which totaled $27.2 billion in August. That trend should begin to be reflected in the September trade numbers, setting the stage for a broader easing of the trade deficit by the end of the year, he said.

The price of imported oil has fallen to about $57 a barrel from the $66.12 average reported for August.

Outside the petroleum sector, the monthly deficit for trade in goods has been on a downward track since peaking in January. In the first eight months of the year, U.S. merchandise exports have been growing at a faster clip than imports -- 13.7% compared with 10.3%.

Ultimately, exports would have to grow at a much faster rate to make a significant dent in the overall deficit. But the underlying trend is giving some economists hope that an improvement could be on the horizon.

An expected softening in the nation's domestic demand, possibly including a decline in spending on imported consumer goods, could also help narrow the trade deficit in coming months. But for now, the American consumer's appetite for foreign-made goods -- from artwork and antiques to appliances and footwear -- appears undiminished by high energy prices and a cooling property market at home.

U.S. imports totaled $192.28 billion in August, with shipments from China accounting for a big share of the monthly increase. The surge in imports from China helped push the U.S. trade deficit with China up 12% to a record $21.96 billion for the month, three times as wide as the U.S.'s trade gap with Japan, according to Commerce Department figures.

U.S. exports for the month grew to $122.42 billion, helped by increased shipments abroad of U.S.-made capital goods and industrial supplies, among other things.

The unexpectedly high August trade deficit, which followed a revised July deficit of $68 billion, prompted many analysts to scale back their expectations of how much trade contributed to the nation's third-quarter economic growth. Paul Ashworth, a senior economist at Capital Economics, estimated the weak trade performance knocked 0.6 percentage points off GDP growth for the quarter.

"That reinforces our view that GDP growth slipped further to an annualized pace of around 2.0%, down from 2.6%" in the second quarter, he said.

Critics say the bloated U.S. trade deficit, which is fueled in large measure by foreign financial flows, is unsustainable over the long-term. If foreign investors ever decide to pull back, critics warn, the U.S. could be in for an economic shock, leading to falling stock values and higher interest rates.

U.S. Trade Gap Grew To New High In August (WP)

By Howard Schneider And Nell Henderson

The U.S. trade deficit rose to a record $69.9 billion in August, driven by high oil prices, a growing trade gap with China and rising consumer demand for imported goods from antiques to appliances, the government said yesterday.

The trade deficit was 2.8 percent bigger than in July, despite strong growth in exports, led by sales of agricultural products and aircraft, the Commerce Department reported. American companies sold $122.4 billion worth of goods and services overseas in August, an increase of $2.7 billion over the previous month.

American companies and consumers bought far more from abroad, however, with imports rising to $192.3 billion. That included $20.8 billion worth of crude oil, as demand remained strong through the summer despite prices that exceeded $77 per barrel in July.

The widening trade deficit is a further drag on U.S. economic growth, which has slowed sharply this year, in part because of a downturn in the housing market.

The trade report prompted several analysts to lower their estimates of recent economic growth to an annual rate of about 1 percent in the July-through-September period, or less than half of the 2.6 percent pace of the previous three months.

Such forecasts bolstered financial-market expectations that Federal Reserve policymakers will keep interest rates steady through the end of the year as they watch how the economy evolves. They hope the economy slows just enough this year to dampen inflation without sliding into a recession.

The latest trade-deficit figure "gives the Fed further reason to keep rates on hold," Jason Schenker, an economist at Wachovia Corp., said in an analysis for clients.

Schenker was among several analysts who think the trade deficit narrowed in September and is likely to shrink further in October because of the recent declines in oil prices and a drop in gasoline demand after the summer driving season. Oil settled at $57.86 yesterday on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

"While the sharp rise in the August deficit is a little disconcerting, this should be the high-water mark for the deficit this year," wrote Brian Bethune, a U.S. economist at Global Insight, a financial forecasting and analysis firm.

Even so, the trade deficit for 2006 appears on track to set another new high, surpassing last year's record $716 billion. Through August, the country had spent $523 billion more on imports than it sold abroad.

Democratic leaders, contending that theft of American ideas overseas is one factor in the trade deficit, sent a letter to President Bush yesterday, urging him to take immediate steps to protect American intellectual property. In a statement, House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi of California argued that lax enforcement of copyrights and patents is costing the U.S. economy $250 million a year.

"The president's failed economic policies have resulted in another month of record trade deficits, once again highlighting the need for a new direction," Pelosi said. "We must pursue an aggressive trade enforcement agenda so that U.S. businesses and workers do not pay the price for countries that refuse to play by the rules."

Bush said this week that his administration understood that problem and was working on it; Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. raised the concern in recent meetings in China.

Politically, the new figure from the Commerce Department highlights the continued trade gap with China, which widened to a record $22 billion, a 12 percent increase over the month before.

The mismatch in trade between the two countries has led to pressure from the Bush administration for China to let its currency rise in value against the dollar, which would make Chinese-made goods more expensive in world markets -- and American-made goods more competitive.

The trade gap is not entirely welcome news for China. The country reported yesterday that its September trade surplus was $15.3 billion, the second highest on record, after August, and a sign that efforts to tame the country's runaway economic growth are not taking hold quickly.

The flood of money into China has increased inflation and raised concerns about the overvaluation of real estate and other assets. China's leaders fear if they do not slow economic growth to a manageable pace, they risk a financial meltdown that could lead to social unrest.

Dow's Close Puts 12,000 Within Reach (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

NEW YORK, Oct. 12 -- The Dow Jones industrial average broke through 11,900 to close at a new high Thursday, boosted by optimism over the health of corporate earnings.

It was the fifth record close in two weeks for the Dow, which also set a record intraday high.

The Dow rose 95.57, or 0.81 percent, to 11,947.70. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 12.88, or 0.95 percent, to 1362.83. The Nasdaq composite index rose 37.91, or 1.64 percent, to 2346.18.

The Dow's advance put the 12,000 mark within close range for investors. The previous high was 11,867.17 on Tuesday. The intraday high set Thursday was 11,959.63, eclipsing an earlier trading high of 11,872.94 set on Monday.

The markets were upbeat Thursday, with investors focusing on positive news from well-known consumer brands and on economic data that indicated the economy was holding its own even as it slowed.

Oil prices, which remain near lows for the year, also boosted the mood on Wall Street. An Energy Department report said inventories were higher last week and raised doubts about whether OPEC's members would be able to soon agree on a production cut.

Investors got a look at the state of the economy with the release of the Federal Reserve's "beige book," which summarizes regional economic activity. The report found that economic growth appeared to be moderate or mixed. The findings seemed to reassure investors looking for the economy to slow at a moderate pace.

Kevin Logan, chief U.S. economist at Dresdner Kleinwort, said the book's tone was more optimistic than the one issued in August. "They didn't say there was much of an inflation problem," he said. "Investors saw this as confirmation that the Fed is on hold."Movers

Rally Puts Dow On Cusp Of 12000 (WSJ)

By Peter A. McKay

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

Not many investors seem to be heeding cautionary words about whether the Dow Jones Industrial Average can continue its recent run to fresh record highs.

Less than two weeks after the blue-chip average broke a more than six-year-old record, it is already flirting with another headline-grabbing number: a close above 12000. The Dow jumped 95.57 points yesterday, or 0.8%, to a new high of 11947.70, up 11.5% on the year. The average was led by rallies in its components Boeing, which announced strong aircraft orders, and McDonald's, which forecast strong earnings. Both companies' shares rose more than 2%.

Analysts say the rally in the Dow has been driven by an odd, delicate mix of aversion to risk and optimism regarding the economy. Nearly every day, investors and big Wall Street firms alike have welcomed low unemployment rates, forecasts of strong corporate profits and the Federal Reserve's decision, starting in early August, to hold its key interest-rate targets steady.

But many investors are so antsy about whether those conditions can last much longer that they are sticking to big-name companies they think can withstand rougher conditions, if they develop. The result has been what investing pros call a "rotation" away from smaller, more speculative companies that until earlier this year had been beating the large-cap Dow industrials.

"I don't see a lot to be gained from taking a lot of risk in the equity markets right now," said strategist Mark Keller, of A.G. Edwards & Sons.

Mr. Keller said in recent months he has been recommending that clients buy stocks in companies with large market capitalizations, like the ones in the Dow. But he adds: "Frankly, I'm surprised at how well it's worked."

The outlook for consumer spending has been a major catalyst behind the recent strength in the Dow and other major stock indicators. In particular, a pullback in energy prices has buoyed hopes that consumers can keep up their purchases of various goods and services now that they don't have to spend as much at the pump.

Crude-oil futures edged up 27 cents yesterday, to $57.86 a barrel, but have declined over the longer term amid robust supplies and easing geopolitical concerns in several oil-producing states. Oil contracts for November delivery are down about 25% from their summer highs close to $80, and are off 5.2% on the year.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index climbed 1%, or 12.88 points, to 1362.83, up 9.2% on the year but still 12% off its record close in 2000. The index's retail components were especially strong, up 1.4%, helped in part by a 7.7% jump in shares of Costco Wholesale, which announced better-than-expected profit for its fiscal fourth quarter.

The Nasdaq Composite Index gained 1.6%, or 37.91 points, to 2346.18. On the year, however, that index, which includes many small technology stocks, has lagged behind the S&P and Dow, up just 6.4%. It is still at less than half of its record.

Leo Kamp, chief investment economist at the asset-management firm TIAA-CREF recently cautioned clients that the Dow's rally may not last much longer. He conceded in an interview that it could cross 12000 in the short term, but he doesn't think the blue-chip average can make a sustained run higher until the Fed begins to ease rates, perhaps about halfway through 2007.

Economic news yesterday was mixed. The Commerce Department announced the U.S. trade deficit hit a record $69.86 billion in August. Wall Street had expected the deficit to decline.

The Fed's "beige book" report portrayed the U.S. economy growing at a modest pace, tempered by weak housing prices and auto sales.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose; bond prices were mixed. The 10-year note gained 1/32 point, or 31 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.778%. The 30-year bond fell 2/32 to yield 4.910%.

The dollar weakened. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 119.40 yen, compared with 119.72. The euro rose to $1.2554, compared with 1.2524.

Wall Street Higher On Strong Earnings (FT)

By Anuj Gangahar In New York

Financial Times, October 13, 2006

US stocks rallied strongly on Thursday as the market welcomed a batch of strong earnings reports from companies including McDonald's and Harley Davidson and oil prices hit their lowest level this year early in the session.

In the previous session, stocks recovered after a brief sell-off in mid-afternoon after a plane crash in Manhattan. Subsequent reports confirmed the crash was not an act of terrorism, as had initially been feared.

Stocks were buoyed as oil prices were at their lowest this year in advance of the US government's weekly report on fuel, which was issued on Thursday morning.

McDonald's, the world's largest restaurant chain and a Dow component, said on Thursday that its preliminary third quarter profits rose to 68 cents per share, ahead of analyst estimates. The company also reported an 8.4 per cent rise in system-wide sales, better than the 7 per cent gain in revenue forecast by analysts. Its shares rose 2.38 per cent, or 98 cents, to $42.23.

PepsiCo said third quarter profit rose nearly 71 per cent, helped by strength in its international business, non-carbonated drinks and salty snacks. The beverage and snacks company also lifted its forecast for the year. In spite of this, PepsiCo shares fell 1.58 per cent to $62.85.

The S&P 500 closed up 0.95 per cent, or 12.87 points, at 1,362.82. The Nasdaq composite was up 1.64 per cent, or 371.91 points, at 2,346.18 at the close. The Dow Jones Industrial Average closed at a new record high of 11,948.26, up 0.81 per cent or 96.13 points for the day, the first time it has closed above the 11,900 barrier.

The US trade gap rose to a record level in August. US imports outstripped exports by $69.9bn in August, according to the commerce department, up from the previous record of $68bn set in July.

Alfred Goldman, of AG Edwards, said the upward movement of stocks was in spite of certain factors that may have been expected to have more of a negative impact recently. "This market has been ignoring several good excuses to go lower , such as North Korea's nuclear test," he said.

He added that the Dow was up 10 per cent in the past two and half months, saying the market should be careful of going too far too fast.

Early on Thursday, wholesale retailer Costco reported better-than-expected results and said it did not expect to restate results following a review of its stock option programme. Costco shares rose 7.65 per cent, or $3.83, to $53.90.

Harley Davidson, the motorcycle maker, said its earnings climbed 18 per cent in the most recent quarter, beating Wall Street forecasts. Its shares climbed 2.7 per cent to $64.88.

Shares in Systemax, the computer parts and hardware distributor, plunged after the company said it would delay reporting of its second quarter results because it needed more time to complete the process. Shares in the company were down 21.54 per cent, or $3.24, at $11.80.

Wal-Mart Loses Pennsylvania Suit On Rest Breaks (WSJ)

By James Covert

Wal-Mart Stores Inc. knowingly violated Pennsylvania labor laws by forcing employees to work during rest breaks and off the clock, a state jury found.

The Bentonville, Ark., retailer, increasingly under fire for its labor practices, faces paying minimum damages of $62 million according to state labor statutes, and the total could easily exceed $100 million, plaintiff's lawyer Michael Donovan said in an interview. The Pennsylvania jury is slated to hear arguments on damages early today, he said.

During the six-week trial, former Wal-Mart workers testified they were pressured to skip breaks or cut them short by store managers who had been promised bonuses for cutting costs.

Wal-Mart's attorney, Neal Manne, argued that Wal-Mart had paid its employees properly and said the lead plaintiffs were part of a small group of disgruntled workers. Wal-Mart spokesman John Simley declined to comment on the verdict until the jury had ruled on damages.

The jury agreed with plaintiffs that Wal-Mart didn't show "good faith" in protecting workers' rights for rest breaks and improperly forced them to work off the clock. But it ruled in Wal-Mart's favor on a separate charge that it denied workers meal breaks.

Wal-Mart was sued by two former employees on behalf of 187,000 current and former hourly Wal-Mart workers. The lawsuit covers labor practices at Wal-Mart and Sam's Club stores in 1998 to 2001.

"Today's decision is another harsh indictment of Wal-Mart's pattern of disrespect for its workers and disregard for state law," said Andrew Grossman, executive director of Wal-Mart Watch, a union-backed critic. "For years it has been obvious that Wal-Mart is willing to cut corners when it comes to its employees."

Wal-Mart is facing similar suits around the U.S. The company still faces at least seven other major class-action lawsuits in the U.S., including a federal sex-discrimination suit filed in 2000 on behalf of 1.6 million former and current female workers.

Wal-Mart Workers Win Wage Suit (WP)

By Amy Joyce

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

Wal-Mart Stores Inc. violated Pennsylvania labor laws by forcing hourly employees to work through breaks and beyond their shifts without overtime pay, a jury decided yesterday.

Lawyers for the employees said the decision could result in $62 million or more in damages.

The lawsuit, brought by two employees on behalf of almost 187,000 current and former Wal-Mart employees, claimed that the company made workers in Pennsylvania miss more than 33 million rest breaks from 1998 to 2001. At least 57 other wage-and-hour cases have been filed across the United States against the world's largest retailer, and many of them are awaiting class-action certification, according to company filings.

"I think this proves that Wal-Mart's sweatshop mind-set persists," said Chris Kofinis, a spokesman with WakeUp Wal-Mart, a United Food and Commercial Workers Union-backed group. "There is some point where Wal-Mart will have to listen and it's got to treat its workers with respect and fairness."

Michael Donovan, a lawyer for the employees, would not comment until damages are awarded. He expects that to happen today. In court, the lawyers argued that the company denied breaks to cut labor costs and increase productivity.

"We take matters very seriously when associates say they have been mistreated in any way. However, because the jury is still in deliberation, it would not be appropriate to comment on the matter until a final decision has been made," said Sarah Clark, a spokeswoman for Wal-Mart.

Neal Manne, Wal-Mart's attorney, argued that the company properly paid its employees and that the lead plaintiffs were among a small group of disgruntled workers, according to the Philadelphia Inquirer's coverage of the trial.

Company officials said records appeared to show that workers who did not have breaks did so because they chose not to, or did not sign out, according to news reports.

The company has been trying repair its image after critics cast negative light on the company, claiming it pays poverty wages and offers few benefits.

The case is one of several class-action wage-and-hour suits against the company to go to trial. In December, a jury awarded $172 million to about 116,000 current and former Wal-Mart and Sam's Club workers in California who claimed that they were illegally denied lunch breaks. Wal-Mart is appealing the verdict.

In 2002, a federal jury in Oregon found that Wal-Mart employees were forced to work off the clock and awarded back pay to 83 workers. In 2004, Wal-Mart settled a similar lunch break case in Colorado for $50 million.

One of the pending cases, which accuses the company of paying men more than women nationally, is the largest private employer civil rights class action in history. Wal-Mart has asked an appeals court to overturn the class-action status of the case.

The Pennsylvania case is larger than the California case in that it covers more employees and involves off-the-clock work, missed rest breaks and missed meal breaks. The jury in the six-week trial in the Court of Common Pleas in Philadelphia found in favor of Wal-Mart on the missed-meal claim.

Employees said they were pressured by managers to cut meals short and skip breaks. Two cashiers said they were locked in the store after it closed to restock merchandise.

US May Bequeath Bush A Hostile Congress (FT)

By Holly Yeager And Edward Luce

Financial Times, October 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0080225

Republican party leaders in the US have lately been making it on to the television talk-show circuit not as guests but as jokes.

A year ago it was President George W. Bush's "Brownie, you're doing a heck of a job" praise for Michael Brown, the subsequently disgraced head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Variations on that Hurricane Katrina blunder kept audiences entertained for weeks.

Then, last week, America's late-night comedians got another windfall when staff of Dennis Hastert, Republican speaker of the House of Representatives, described as merely "over-friendly" the lewd e-mails sent by Mark Foley, a congressional colleague of Mr Hastert's, to teenagers who worked on Capitol Hill. Some have charged that Mr Hastert had known of this behaviour long before the story broke.

Given that at least one-third of the Republican vote comes from self-described evangelical Christians, and given Mr Hastert's dogged refusal to resign as speaker amid plummeting public confidence in his party, that choice of words could look even more inept following polling day next month.

According to the first opinion polls taken since the Foley scandal hit the front pages, the Democrats lead the Republicans by between 11 and 23 percentage points in the campaign for midterm congressional elections on November 7, a significant increase over previous weeks.

In a troubling sign for the Republicans, who have controlled the House since 1994 and the Senate since 2002, the Democrats are now ahead on all the Republicans' traditionally strong issues – most notably on national security and the "war on terror" but also on taxes and the economy. One poll even showed the Democrats leading on "moral values", one of the foundation stones of modern Republicanism.

The Democrats need to gain just 15 seats in the 435-member House to win control. Two of these seats are already in effect won, since the Republican incumbents (one of whom is Mr Foley) remain on the ballot paper but have withdrawn from the race. The Democrats also need to add six seats in the Senate, where 33 of the chamber's 100 seats are being contested.

"After looking at the news for the past 10 days or so, I have to wonder how Democrats can possibly fail in their efforts to take both the House and the Senate," says Stuart Rothenberg, editor of the Rothenberg Political Report, a Washington newsletter.

The picture in the American heartlands, where the fiercest electoral battles are being fought, suggests the Democrats are on course for victory. The latest analyses show about 40 House races in which Republicans are fighting to retain seats, while Democrats have focused their defensive efforts on fewer than a dozen races.

Most worrying for Republicans, these include seats where their incumbents have won easy re-election in the past. Among these are Tom Reynolds, leader of Republicans' House campaign effort, who is facing questions about whether he failed to act on early concerns about Mr Foley's conduct. Polls show him trailing in his upstate New York district by 15 points. Hoping to reverse that slide, his campaign released a television advertisement this week in which Mr Reynolds apologised: "Looking back, more should have been done, and for that I'm sorry."

In Pennsylvania, Curt Weldon, a 10-term congressman representing a district near Philadelphia, faces a surprisingly strong challenge, after winning re-election last time by a 19-point margin. "Six months ago, no one thought that race would be competitive," says Terry Madonna, director of the Keystone Poll at Franklin and Marshall College in Lancaster, Pennsylvania.

In Senate contests, several incumbent Republicans find themselves struggling to hold on to their seats. They include Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, a close social conservative ally of Mr Bush, as well as Conrad Burns in Montana, Mike DeWine in Ohio, Jim Talent in Missouri and George Allen in Virginia.

Many struggling Republicans have been beset by scandals over ties between some in their party and Jack Abramoff, a lobbyist who this year pleaded guilty to corruption. Sheer ineptitude has also been a problem. For example, in August Mr Allen baffled many when he described a young Indian-American Democrat, who had been trailing him with a video camera, as a "macaca", which turned out to be a genus of monkey in north Africa. In spite of Mr Allen's tortured explanations, many assumed his slur to have been racial.

Across the country the Republicans have been prone to gaffes and slip-ups. "You get the feeling that a big negative wave is about to hit the party," says Frank Luntz, a leading Republican pollster. "And there's virtually nothing they can do about it."

More significantly, the Democrats have benefited from Mr Bush's growing difficulties in Iraq, in spite of a failure by the opposition party to produce a coherent alternative either to the president's "stay the course" or to calls for an almost instant withdrawal of US forces.

But most voters appear to understand that the Democrats would have little influence anyway over the course of the war in Iraq even if they won both houses of Congress. "Our candidates can say what they want about Iraq, because the American people, more or less, believe that it hasn't added to our security, that our policy is not working, and because they recognise that no one knows exactly what to do," Bill Clinton, Mr Bush's Democratic predecessor, told the Financial Times in an interview last month.

In addition to Iraq, the Democrats have benefited from widespread voter anxiety over the economy – spanning rising healthcare and education costs, median wage stagnation and fears over the growing impact of competition from China and India. Again, the Democrats have few answers to the complexities of globalisation. But almost two-thirds of Americans tell pollsters their country is headed in the wrong direction.

Such is the Democrats' lead that even diehard Republicans expect defeat. Few would disagree with George Will, a conservative columnist, who wrote in the Washington Post: "If, after the Foley episode – a maraschino cherry atop the Democrats' delectable sundae of Republican miseries – the Democrats cannot gain 13 seats, they should go into another line of work."

Since the Democrats are notoriously bad at winning elections – and the Republicans have a well-deserved reputation for squeezing every possible vote out of their national database on polling day (see below) – a Democratic victory next month cannot be taken for granted. But should it happen, it would further complicate life for Mr Bush during his remaining two years in office.

Under normal conditions a president finds it tough to set the agenda during the last two years of his final term. Mr Bush faces the additional problem that the White House will have no candidate to field next time – since Dick Cheney, vice-president, will retire alongside Mr Bush. The 2008 contest will be the first time since 1952 that the White House has not provided a candidate.

In addition, Mr Bush has found it difficult enough to push his domestic agenda through a Republican-controlled Congress – having watched his most cherished goals, including the revamping of pensions and an overhaul of America's porous immigration system, fall by the wayside in the last 18 months.

A Democratic Congress would almost certainly block any further Bush initiatives, to deprive Republicans of legislative accomplishments in the build-up to the 2008 contest. "Regardless of who controls Congress, the wind will be out of the president's sails," says Sarah Binder, senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, a Washington think-tank.

However, the Democrats would use control of Capitol Hill to push through long-promised reforms. Nancy Pelosi, the San Francisco Democrat who is poised to become the first woman speaker of the House if her party wins, said this week she would use the first 100 hours of a Democratic majority to increase the minimum wage, reduce interest rates on student loans, expand federal funding for stem cell research and require the government to negotiate with pharmaceutical companies to lower costs for the Medicare prescription drug programme.

If the Democrats take the Senate too, they may be emboldened to tackle more difficult areas, such as reforms of education and healthcare. But Mr Bush will still possess his presidential veto, which he has used only once in his six years working with a Republican-controlled Congress.

There is also intense speculation among liberals that Democrats might even push to impeach Mr Bush for misleading the public into believing there were weapons of mass destruction in Saddam Hussein's Iraq. But any such efforts would almost certainly be stymied by the presidential ambitions of several Democratic senators, most notably Hillary Clinton. Anything that looked like vengefulness could rebound badly on her presidential ambitions.

"My hunch is that we'll be facing two more years of stalemate," says Ms Binder. In other words, the quality of American politics is still likely to generate jokes.

Party arsenals feature duelling databases

By Caroline Daniel

Saul Anuzis, chairman of the Republican party for the state of Michigan, opens his laptop over lunch. At his fingertips is a voter database. Pulling up his own file he scrolls through more than 100 pieces of information, including his support for an assisted-suicide prohibition bill, his boat licence, sports interests and Catholicism.

His profile is part of a database called Voter Vault, which will be critical in the Republican midterm election campaign. Using basic voter information, with data analysis derived from polls of up to 50,000 voters and consumer databases, the party hopes to apply algorithms to predict how groups of people intend to vote and craft a message that appeals to them.

The technique, known as "micro-targeting" on the right and "modelling" on the left, is a sign of how far modern political campaigning has become a marketing exercise, with techniques that were traditionally used in broadcast advertisements applied to political communications. Nowadays political consultants tout "turnout scores", "clusters" and "micro-targeted messages".

In the US, generic electoral constituencies such as "soccer moms" and "Reagan Democrats" are broken down into even more forensic clusters. There are different algorithms to weigh cultural differences between West and East Texas. Strategists target finer demographic slices such as "high-income, God-respecting, terrorism-fearing Republicans" or "white women aged 35-45 with college educations, who are Catholic or Protestant and pro-life, with median incomes over $35,000 and live in $150,000-plus homes".

During congressional elections in 2002, for example, Republicans used statistical analysis successfully to target "downscale white men" in Georgia with a message invoking the Confederate flag, which led to higher than expected turnout among that group. In West Virginia in 2004, they modelled "older white women churchgoers" in traditional Democratic strongholds and encouraged them to vote Republican with an anti gay-marriage message.

The US is far from the only democracy where science has been applied to democratic elections on such an unprecedented scale. One of the originators of the art is Lynton Crosby, a poll guru versed in precision targeting from his native Australia. In the British general election last year, the Conservative party used the Voter Vault database in a campaign masterminded by Mr Crosby, though his efforts failed to prevent Labour, which had its own targeting software, from achieving a third successive poll victory.

In the US, Republicans have been at the forefront of applying such techniques, led by Karl Rove, the chief political strategist for President George W. Bush.

The Republican National Committee boasts a unified voter file, systematically updated by volunteers, which rigorously tracks progress, such as how many pieces of new data were added to the system. In Michigan the data will be used to craft 12 different messages as part of the effort to get out the vote. "If you have a better 'cookie cutter', you're going to make more cookies or votes," says Mr Anuzis.

As one Democratic consultant concedes: "The world changed in 2004. The rules used to be that if voter turnout was high, that meant a progressive win. But in 2004, we had the highest voter turnout since the civil rights era – we didn't win. Why? The Republicans found new ways to find new voters."

The Republican effort was led by necessity – Democrats have long had advantages in the more primitive "geography-based" targeting because more of their voters were in urbanised, centralised precincts, making it easier for them to organise large turnouts. But the base precincts for Republicans – where 80-90 per cent of those who voted did so for them – were typically rural, and smaller, with 100 rather than 10,000 votes.

This put a premium on winkling out individual voters likely to vote Republican in largely Democratic areas. In 2004, it was used in New Mexico to target Hispanics. Rather than a generic message, Republicans focused on the 20 per cent of Hispanics who supported Mr Bush's education policy, No Child Left Behind. Their Hispanic vote rose 12 per cent compared with 2000.

Democrats acknowledge they are several years behind. In 2004, state parties continued to operate eclectic voter files with different formats that were hard to scale to a national level. It was too complex to interrogate the data about which groups might respond to a certain message.

At the Democratic National Committee there was an effort to catch up under Terry McAuliffe, former chairman, who created a unified voter database – yet it was largely used as a fundraising not an electoral tool. "While progressives tried doing modelling in 2002, their approach was to try it nationally, which doesn't work. Put simply, a Texas Democrat and a Vermont Democrat are quite different Democrats," says one Democratic strategist.

The DNC under Howard Dean has yet to embrace scientific modelling on such a scale as the Republicans. It will run just six micro-targeting projects this year, though independent groups on the left, such as the AFL-CIO, are filling the void. They are tapping into a new for-profit voter database operated by Catalist. The company, created this year, received funding from George Soros, the billionaire financier.

Outside groups, such as Emily's List, pay Catalist to use their data for micro-targeting projects. The lessons – such as how to target voters who are most interested in the minimum wage – are then shared via America Votes, a grassroots voter-mobilisation operation that seeks to co-ordinate progressive groups in the 2006 elections and eliminate wasteful overlap in how they talk to voters.

Maggie Fox, president of America Votes, says her aim is to get progressive groups to work more closely and share electoral strategies, using micro-targeting to identify which organisations should be targeting which constituents. The group will spend $1.3m (£700,000, €1m) on micro-targeting projects in five key states, including Ohio and Michigan. "When we started doing it it was a bit like asking people to undress in public," she says.

Yet she acknowledges the focus is on learning lessons that can be applied in 2007 and 2008, rather than making a big difference this year.

Donald Green, professor of political science at Yale University, remains sceptical of some of the claims made by advocates of micro-targeting. He agrees that it helps voter identification. "As a short cut way of identifying your supporters it is unassailable." Yet he doubts some of the statistical inferences drawn from the data about partisanship, saying the evidence is more anecdotal than analytical.

Adrian Gray, director of strategy at the RNC, acknowledges the distinction, but says their advantage comes from having "the better message than our opponent, knowing where we send it, how many times we send it and through which medium it is sent".

Yet in an election where macro issues such as Iraq dominate, it is hard to weigh the importance of mechanical techniques over the daily pounding from the news. "The difference between politics and the commercial marketplace is we have one day to measure success," says Mr Gray.

GOP Redirects Funds From Faltering Races (WP)

By Dan Balz And Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

Faced with a deteriorating political climate, Republican Party officials are hoping to keep control of the House and Senate with a strategy aimed at shoring up enough endangered incumbents to preserve their majorities, while scaling back planned spending on races that now appear unwinnable.

In recent days, the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) has given back television time it had reserved in Democratic-held districts in West Virginia, South Carolina and Ohio -- apparently concluding that those races are beyond reach unless something dramatic changes the national political environment in the 25 days before the Nov. 7 election.

The Republican National Committee, which is using its substantial resources to supplement the party's Senate campaign committee, has spent virtually all of its television money in just three states -- Ohio, Missouri and Tennessee -- hoping to build a levee strong enough to save those seats and the Senate majority.

But recent events, among them the problems facing Republican Sens. George Allen in Virginia and Mike DeWine in Ohio, make that task even more difficult, GOP strategists privately concede.

Democrats, meanwhile, are juggling pleas for financial assistance from candidates in House districts once considered second-tier opportunities. The Democrats have ordered up polls in a dozen or more of these long-shot districts and now face a critical choice: whether to place bets on a few of these districts in the hope of expanding the field of competitive seats, or concentrate advertising dollars as planned on the roughly 20 to 25 districts where the odds appear most favorable.

Linda Stender has been pressing party officials to pour money into her uphill race against Rep. Mike Ferguson in New Jersey's 7th District, touting a new poll that shows her within striking distance. So far, those officials are balking.

"The challenge right now is for the DCCC to assess all the information as it is coming that show which races are competitive," Stender said. "If anything, what is toughest is there are so many seats that are competitive now."

Bill Burton, spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC), said the party will look carefully before jumping in. "We're going to be polling, and we're going to look at the political dynamics and the strength of candidacies," he said. "No decisions have been made at this point."

Democrats need to gain 15 seats next month to recapture the House. Strategists believe the goal is now attainable, because of high disapproval ratings for both the Republican-controlled Congress and for President Bush, as well as public dissatisfaction over Iraq and the fallout from the Mark Foley page scandal.

Some top Republicans privately talk about losing a minimum of 12 seats, leaving them with a barely workable majority, and as many as 25 or 30 seats. Democratic strategists see the range of potential pickups in almost identical terms.

The two House campaign committees are pouring most of their money into independent expenditure ads -- most of them negative -- on behalf of their candidates. As of early this week, Democrats had spent or reserved about $49 million in advertising time; the Republicans had spent or reserved $56 million to $60 million. In some races, there may be no more television time to buy.

A summary of advertising dollars spent to date by the candidates, the national party committees and major outside groups, produced by a media firm called TNSMI/CMAG and obtained by The Washington Post, shows that the bulk of television money has gone into 35 House districts.

Among those where spending is heaviest are three races in Indiana, where Republican incumbents are running scared. More than $4 million had been spent there as of the beginning of the week. Other races where money has flowed freely include two districts in Connecticut -- another state where Republicans are on the defensive -- and districts in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Kentucky, New Mexico, New York and Virginia.

"We're seeing relatively safe House districts with candidates up on the air five weeks out," said Evan Tracey, chief operating officer of TNSMI/CMAG. "They would have been on two to three weeks out at the earliest in past elections. . . . No one is safe."

The two committees are closely tracking spending patterns, and at this point in the campaign there is a certain amount of gamesmanship in their public explanations of what the other side is up to.

Democrats noted gleefully that Republicans had spent money on a poll in Indiana's 3rd District, where incumbent Rep. Mark Edward Souder (R) won reelection with 69 percent of the vote in 2004 and Bush carried with 68 percent of the vote. Souder has not been on anyone's endangered list.

NRCC spokesman Carl Forti said the committee polled the district out of precaution because Souder's opponent had invested several hundred thousand dollars in advertising. Forti said the poll showed Souder in no danger.

NRCC officials noted that Democrats scaled back ad buys in Phoenix and Denver and said that meant the opposition is giving up on two House incumbents. Not so, say Democrats, who say the Republicans are misreading their movements.

This jousting will continue into the final days, but what is clear at this point is that Democrats are playing very little defense in the House and the Senate. They are spending money on a small number of seats held by Democrats, most notably Rep. Leonard L. Boswell in Iowa and Melissa L. Bean in Illinois. In the Senate, Democrats worry most about Robert Menendez of New Jersey, whose seat they can ill afford to lose.

Even Republicans in districts dominated by conservative voters are picking up high levels of unease. Colorado's 5th District, for instance, has never elected a Democrat since it was created 34 years ago. But retiring Rep. Joel Hefley (R) has refused to endorse the party's nominee, Doug Lamborn, charging him with having run a "sleazy" campaign, and a new poll by the Denver Post found him tied with Democrat Jay Fawcett with a quarter of the electorate undecided.

Republican officials said the race is not that close but acknowledged that the political environment is more difficult than expected. "Everyone in the country is seeing some disenchantment with Republicans," said Lamborn campaign manager Jon Hotaling.

The DCCC sent word to Fawcett on Wednesday that they will now invest modestly in his race. "It has been a pointed discussion all along about whether we were reading things right out here," Fawcett said. "We thought something was going on. Slowly but surely we have banged away at it, and finally Washington is noticing."

Republicans seem more concerned about one of their Colorado incumbents, Rep. Marilyn Musgrave, who appears potentially vulnerable. She required a last-minute lift from GOP officials in Washington in 2004. The NRCC is coming to her aid again against state Rep. Angie Paccione; Democrats this week scaled back plans for advertising in the district, suggesting that Musgrave's standing might be improving.

Republicans are also increasingly nervous about the seat held by Rep. David G. Reichert (R-Wash.). Darcy Burner, a former Microsoft executive, has pounded Reichert for voting with the GOP majority in Washington, hoping to capitalize on widespread frustration there. In a sign of nervousness, the NRCC recently increased its spending on television ads in the district.

Burner wants help from the DCCC. "Anytime you spend millions of dollars communicating with voters, it is going to have an impact," Burner said.

But some races require more money than others to have the same impact. In New Jersey, Stender might fall victim to the cost-benefit analysis of betting on House seats in the very expensive New York media market. With limited funds, the DCCC is likely to roll the dice on seats where television ads are cheap.

Rove Makes Good On $5 Million Pledge (AP-Y)

By David Espo

AP-Yahoo, October 13, 2006

Call it a political challenge grant — you raise $5 million, and a big benefactor will kick in another $5 million.

That's the pledge that White House political strategist Karl Rove made this summer to Rep. Tom Reynolds, the head of the House Republican campaign committee, according to several officials. The arrangement was deemed so sensitive that no public announcement was made.

Under the plan, House Republicans agreed to increase the target for their so-called "Battleground" program, in which incumbent GOP lawmakers are prodded to donate or raise money for use in races other than their own. This year's program is run by Rep. Eric Cantor (news, bio, voting record), R-Va., and the money goes to the National Republican Congressional Committee, which pays for television commercials, political mailings and other activities in the country's most competitive races.

Originally, Cantor was given a goal of $17.5 million, and met it.

The target was then raised to $22.5 million as part of an understanding that Rove would kick in $5 million on top of it, according to officials familiar with the details. The program has generated roughly $21 million in pledges so far.

The officials who described the arrangement did so on condition of anonymity, saying they were not authorized to discuss it publicly.

One official said the pledge money was to come from funds remaining after President Bush's 2004 re-election campaign, but a spokeswoman at the Republican National Committee said that was not true.

"The Bush-Cheney campaign has not made any contributions to the NRCC and has no plans to do so," said Tracey Schmitt.

Through a spokesman, Cantor issued a statement that said, "We are pleased to announce that today we have broken the battleground records for amount raised."

It was not known whether a similar arrangement exists between Rove and Senate Republicans, who lagged well behind Democrats in campaign cash heading into the final weeks of the campaign.

When Rep. Brian Bilbray won a special election last summer in place of a jailed former lawmaker, Randy (Duke) Cunningham, relieved Republicans said it was a sign that Democrats had been hyping their prospects for the fall.

Now it looks like the GOP is getting nervous again.

The party's campaign committee, which focuses its efforts on races that are competitive or may become so, recently commissioned a poll of the San Diego-area district and spent money for mass mailings. Bilbray's opponent on Nov. 7 is Francine Busby, the woman he defeated in June.

Republicans also show signs of concern over several other districts that have not generally been on either party's lists of competitive seats.

Among the lawmakers are Reps. Jean Schmidt of Ohio, Mark Souder of Indiana and John Sweeney of New York. The national Democrats are advertising in the Sweeney race, and Republicans customarily would follow suit in such a situation.

Democrats are showing unease about one of their own, Rep. Darlene Hooley (news, bio, voting record) of Oregon.

The party's campaign committee recently pitched in for an ad that accuses her opponent, Mike Erickson, of lying about her record "in a time of war." Republicans, too, are giving the race a late look. They recently paid for a poll in the district.

Democrats must gain 15 seats to win a House majority on Nov. 7

Florida Democrat Tim Mahoney is the equivalent of a politician who was hit by lightning. Two weeks ago, he was running a hopeless race. Then his opponent, Rep. Mark Foley (news, bio, voting record), quit over sexually explicit computer messages he sent to teenage male pages.

Now Mahoney has an ad running that seems like a who's who of the ethically challenged among Republicans. "Congress is a mess. Corruption. Waste. Incompetence," intones the narrator as the images of Tom DeLay, Bob Ney and Jack Abramoff scroll across the screen.

DeLay is the former majority leader who quit Congress and faces allegations of violating campaign finance laws in Texas. Ney, still in Congress, recently signed a plea agreement confessing crimes of corruption. Abramoff is the former Republican lobbyist whose plea bargain last January triggered a corruption scandal that has yet to subside.

Will The Levee Break? (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

The conventional wisdom says that the Democrats will take control of the House of Representatives next month, but only by a small margin. I've been looking at the numbers, however, and I believe this conventional wisdom is almost all wrong.

Here's what's happening: a huge Democratic storm surge is heading toward a high Republican levee. It's still possible that the surge won't overtop the levee — that is, the Democrats could fail by a small margin to take control of Congress. But if the surge does go over the top, the flooding will almost surely reach well inland — that is, if the Democrats win, they'll probably win big.

Let's talk about Congressional arithmetic.

Unless the Bush administration is keeping Osama bin Laden in a freezer somewhere, a majority of Americans will vote Democratic this year. If Congressional seats were allocated in proportion to popular votes, a Democratic House would be a done deal. But they aren't, and the way our electoral system works, combined with the way ethnic groups are distributed, still gives the Republicans some hope of holding on.

The key point is that African-Americans, who overwhelmingly vote Democratic, are highly concentrated in a few districts. This means that in close elections many Democratic votes are, as political analysts say, wasted — they simply add to huge majorities in a small number of districts, while the more widely spread Republican vote allows the G.O.P. to win by narrower margins in a larger number of districts.

My back-of-the-envelope calculations suggest that because of this "geographic gerrymander," even a substantial turnaround in total Congressional votes — say, from the three-percentage-point Republican lead in 2004 to a five-point Democratic lead this year — would leave the House narrowly in Republican hands. It looks as if the Democrats need as much as a seven-point lead in the overall vote to take control.

No wonder, then, that until a few months ago many political analysts argued that the Republicans would control the House for the foreseeable future, because only a perfect political storm could overcome the G.O.P. structural advantage.

But what's that howling sound? Every poll taken this month shows the Democrats with a double-digit lead in the generic ballot question, in which voters are asked which party they support in this election. The median Democratic lead is 14 points.

And here's the thing: because there are many districts that the G.O.P. carried by only moderately large margins in recent elections, a large Democratic surge — one only a bit bigger than that needed to take the House at all — would sweep away many Republicans holding seats normally considered safe. If the actual vote is anything like what the polls now suggest, we're talking about the Democrats holding a larger majority in the House than the Republicans have held at any point since their 1994 takeover.

So if the Democrats win, they'll probably have a substantial majority. Whether they'll be able to keep that majority is another question. But be prepared to wake up less than four weeks from now and learn that everything you've been told about American politics — liberalism is dead, whoever controls the South controls Washington, only Republicans know "the way to win" — is wrong. (Are we seeing the birth of a new New Deal coalition, in which the solid Northeast takes the place of the solid South?)

The storm may yet weaken. The Iowa Electronic Markets, in which people bet real money on election outcomes, still give Republicans a roughly 40 percent chance of keeping control of both houses of Congress. If that happens, will it mean that Republican control is permanent after all?

No. Bear in mind that the G.O.P. isn't in trouble because of a string of bad luck. The problems that have caused Americans to turn on the party, from the disaster in Iraq to the botched response to Katrina, from the failed attempt to privatize Social Security to the sudden realization by many voters that the self-proclaimed champions of moral values are hypocrites, are deeply rooted in the whole nature of Republican governance. So even if this surge doesn't overtop the levee, there will be another surge soon.

But the best guess is that the permanent Republican majority will end in a little over three weeks.

'The Empire State Strikes Back' (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

NEW YORK -- What is happening to the Republican Party in New York state is the national GOP's nightmare. The once-thriving political organization of Nelson Rockefeller, Al D'Amato and George Pataki is a shambles.

And the way the Republican coalition has broken up should have national Republicans scurrying for a new game plan.

For many Americans, "New York" evokes the liberal salons of Manhattan. But Manhattan is a small piece of the Empire State. Political change has been driven by the populous suburbs of Long Island and Westchester and Rockland counties, and by the vast stretches of Upstate New York that are far closer in spirit to the Midwest than to the Upper West Side or the Silk Stocking District.

The Republican collapse here has been driven by two streams of defectors: suburban moderates and Upstaters.

As a result, the entire Democratic ticket, led by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Eliot Spitzer, the party's candidate for governor, is expected by just about everyone to sweep the state. As many as five Upstate Republican congressional seats -- they would constitute a third of the 15 seats that Democrats need to win the House -- are in jeopardy.

"It's 'The Empire State Strikes Back,' " says Democrat Dan Maffei, a former congressional aide who is running a surprisingly strong race against Rep. Jim Walsh, the Republican incumbent, in a district that stretches from Syracuse to the Rochester area.

Maffei sees the immediate trend toward Democrats powered by frustration with President Bush and the Iraq war. But it is also rooted in long-term factors: the economic troubles of many Upstate communities, the area's "libertarian" leanings on cultural issues and the homelessness felt by many moderate Republicans in the face of a national party increasingly dominated by conservatives.

"Bush Republicanism," Maffei says, "is not for them."

D'Amato, the voluble Republican who served 18 years in the U.S. Senate until he was defeated in 1998 by Charles Schumer, sees demographic change -- the increasing number of Hispanic and African American voters -- as augmenting the Democrats' advantage in party registration. Hispanics, of course, are also a growing part of the electorate in other key states, some of them traditionally Republican.

But he adds that "there is something broader than the Republicans falling on hard times, which they are." He notes that in New York, "after the tenure of a strong governor," the party that long held power often sees its organization fall apart. This happened to Republicans after Rockefeller's long run and to Democrats after Pataki defeated Mario Cuomo in 1994. With Pataki retiring, said Assemblyman Pete Grannis, a Manhattan Democrat, it's the Republicans' "time in the skillet."

State Sen. Kemp Hannon, a Long Island Republican who has spent nearly three decades in the legislature, also worries that the coalition of "Reagan Democrats" that D'Amato helped build -- "they were Irish, Italian and Polish Democrats and some Jews" -- is a thing of the past. "I believe that Bush has destroyed that whole thing," Hannon says. "It's not here any longer in the Northeast." And the parts of Upstate New York "not moving ahead economically whatsoever . . . feel it a great deal."

Adds D'Amato: "It's very similar to an Ohio kind of thing," meaning that vulnerable New York Republicans are in much the same spot as their endangered congressional colleagues in former industrial powerhouse regions to their west.

Bill de Blasio, who managed Hillary Clinton's 2000 Senate campaign and is now a New York City Council member from Brooklyn, sees the pincer movement against Republicans from the suburbs and Upstate as similar to what's happening in other parts of the country.

"The two trends are quite universal," de Blasio says. "There's a growing body of suburbanites who are increasingly concerned about the rightward drift of the Republican Party, and voters very worried about what's happening to real wages." Paul Tokasz, the retiring Democratic majority leader in the state Assembly -- he hails from Cheektowaga, just outside Buffalo -- says the same suburban movement away from the Republicans that is so visible in the New York City area is happening in metropolitan areas across the state.

D'Amato, normally a happy Republican warrior, is in a blue mood about November. "You have a foreign policy which is groping and a domestic [Mark] Foley scandal, so you have a lot of disaffected people, and I think it's going to result not only in the Democrats taking over the House, but also with substantial numbers."

As New York goes, so goes the nation?

In Key Races, Democrats Look At Rivals' Personal Lives (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

In the wake of the Mark Foley page scandal, Democrats are targeting the personal lives of Republicans in numerous key House races as part of a campaign to capitalize on voter disgust with the messy personal lives and alleged character defects among elected officials.

Although Democrats' internal polling shows that the Foley scandal is resonating deeply only in half a dozen races, party operatives are calculating that GOP candidates are now unusually vulnerable to personal attacks, several candidates and strategists said.

In New Jersey, Democratic candidate Linda Stender this week sent voters a two-page brochure accusing Rep. Mike Ferguson (R) of improperly preying on young women in a fashionable D.C. nightclub. Stender, who is shown by polls to be within striking distance of Ferguson, said the Foley affair "opened the door to talk about the ethical challenge of my opponent." Ferguson has denied the allegations, and a spokeswoman last night called the attacks "pathetic and desperate."

Democratic candidate Chris Carney is running an ad accusing Rep. Don Sherwood (R-Pa.) of "repeatedly choking" and "attempting to strangle" a young mistress. Foley and Sherwood share "the arrogance of power," said Carney. "They're willing to cover up these types of things to retain power."

Sherwood has apologized for the affair but said in a television ad that the "allegation of abuse was never true."

Democratic candidate Kirsten Gillibrand is calling on GOP Rep. John E. Sweeney in Upstate New York to explain a drunken driving arrest 30 years ago and a more recent car accident. "Your decision to release any and all records related to your arrests and other incidents with law enforcement will send an important signal about your willingness to come clean with voters," Gillibrand said in a letter to Sweeney this week.

The Sweeney campaign has said that the details of both incidents are out in public and that the congressman has nothing to hide. The lawmaker fired back yesterday by calling on Gillibrand to release her tax records, suggesting that she has her own secrets.

"It is attack and distract," said Maureen Donovan, a spokeswoman for Sweeney.

All three races highlight a much broader Democratic campaign to politicize the Foley page scandal over the final four weeks of the campaign, Democratic candidates and strategists say.

Top Democratic officials believe "that anybody who had a personal vulnerability before this is totally [at risk] with the spotlight on scandal," said a Democratic aide familiar with the party's plan to take advantage of the Foley affair. "Frankly, it is a tough environment out there if you have a problem with the bottle or the zipper."

Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC), said the effectiveness of the charges "often depends on what the person is accused of having done and their reputation and standing in the community -- national climate has nothing to do with it."

Former Republican National Committee chairman Ed Gillespie said Democrats are dangerously close "to overreaching" in their attacks, risking a political backlash like the one that damaged Republicans after they pushed for the impeachment of President Bill Clinton over the Monica S. Lewinsky scandal in 1998. Democratic operatives said they are aware of this possibility but are calculating that, as long as the attacks are at the local level, they will not backfire.

Republicans and Democrats alike said personal attacks are especially potent in districts that were not as competitive before the public's renewed focus on controversy and alleged coverups. Both sides are reporting high voter interest in the unfolding revelations that Foley repeatedly preyed on young male pages while in Congress and that GOP leaders were aware of concerns about the lawmaker's behavior and allegedly did little to stop it.

So far, there is general agreement that about half a dozen GOP candidates are suffering as a direct result of the controversy. Topping that list are NRCC Chairman Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), who was told of Foley's questionable behavior and said he reported it to his superiors, and Sherwood, whose former mistress, in a lawsuit, accused him of choking her.

Many Republicans also said it will be virtually impossible for the newly designated Republican candidate in Foley's district to win, because Foley's name remains on the ballot.

The most common Democratic attacks have been the sort used against Republicans such as Rep. Deborah Pryce (Ohio), a member of the House GOP leadership team who has said she knew nothing of the allegations against her friend and colleague Foley. Nonetheless, Democrats are criticizing her for not catching warning signs and for being part of a team that they say averted its gaze from Foley's problems.

A big part of the Democratic strategy in Pryce's district and elsewhere is to suppress turnout among Christian conservatives, a pillar of the GOP coalition.

But there have also been attempts to take advantage of the Foley episode to highlight corruption issues more broadly.

For the Ohio seat to be vacated by indicted Rep. Robert W. Ney (R), the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) is blanketing the district with mail saying GOP candidate Joy Padgett, a state senator, is too "dirty" to clean up Congress. "You can't clean up Congress if you are covered in mud," the mailings say, drawing links between Padgett and Ney. The DCCC is also running television ads questioning her personal business dealings. The offensive coincides with Ney's expected guilty plea on Friday in the money-for-favors scandal involving convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Top targets are Republican incumbents who have been bruised by the Abramoff scandal. In California, for instance, Democrats are assailing Rep. John T. Doolittle for supporting "forced abortions and sex slavery" in the Northern Mariana Islands, which were represented by Abramoff. Democrat Charlie Brown said the attack is fair because Doolittle has refused to return contributions from supporters of the government there.

In most cases, these attacks are akin to a "Hail Mary" football pass because the chances of success are so low. An example is in Nevada, where Democrats are trying to oust GOP Rep. Jon Porter from a seat that would be very hard to flip under normal circumstances. Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) -- facing his own controversy over a big profit on a land deal -- has twice raised questions about Porter's divorce. The Democratic candidate in that race, Tessa Hafen, is a former Reid aide.

Cheney Touts Ryun, Bush Record During Visit To Kansas (KCS)

By John Hanna

The Kansas City Star, October 13, 2006

TOPEKA, Kan. - Telling fellow Republicans that tax cuts and a vigorous war on terrorism are at stake in this year's election, Vice President Dick Cheney came here Thursday to help raise money and boost Rep. Jim Ryun's re-election campaign.

Cheney touched on themes he has used in speeches in other states, suggesting that a Democratic-controlled Congress would allow tax cuts championed by President Bush to lapse and would adopt a "strategy of resignation and defeatism" abroad.

"In all the decisions that will come in the next two years, it's going to matter a great deal which party has the majority on the floor and the gavel in committee," Cheney said. "The stakes in this campaign are high."

Democrats argued Cheney's visit shows Republicans are worried that Ryun, who's seeking a sixth term representing Kansas' 2nd District, might lose to Democratic challenger Nancy Boyda.

Ryun's campaign said the event, held in the ballroom of Topeka's biggest conference center, raised $209,000, with nearly 300 contributors paying $100 each to attend the speech and an additional $1,000 to have their pictures taken with Cheney. Some arrived two hours early.

"I don't think there's any part of America that's better represented in Washington than the 2nd District of Kansas," Cheney said. "He's also one of the most thoroughly respected members in the House."

The vice president also mentioned GOP challenger Chuck Ahner in the 3rd District and Republican gubernatorial candidate Jim Barnett.

Cheney's visit comes as his fellow Republicans are worried about holding onto their House majority. Earlier this month, Cheney made fundraising appearances in Florida and Wyoming to help GOP incumbents in those states.

Boyda said Cheney's visit demonstrates how Ryun has "gone Washington."

"I personally think it's going to do him more harm than good,' Boyda said during an interview. "Jim Ryun's biggest mistake is that he thinks most Kansans are as disconnected as he is, and that's what is going to get him out of office."

But Mike Gaughan, the state Democratic Party's executive director, said Ryun "is depending on his Washington cronies to give his campaign a boost."

Ryun said such a suggestion is wrong because Cheney's visit has been planned since August.

"It gives us the opportunity to make sure our message is out there so people understand the clear choices that will take place on Nov. 7," Ryun said after the event.

For fellow Republicans, Cheney painted a stark picture of what Democratic victories would mean, listing liberals such as Massachusetts Sen. Ted Kennedy as leaders of committees. Ryun's only close race to date was his first one in 1996, and Kansas Republicans used a similar argument to prevent too many defections.

"It's almost like they're saying, 'We understand why you're thinking of voting against us, but the result is going to be worse than you can imagine,'" said Bob Beatty, a Washburn University political scientist. "It's almost an acknowledgment that, 'Things haven't been going as well under our party as we'd hoped.'"

Kansas always has been friendlier-than-average territory for Bush. Two years ago, he captured 62 percent of the Sunflower State's vote in winning re-election.

Earlier this year, Ryun seemed likely to win re-election without much trouble in the 2nd District, which covers the eastern third of the state, except for the state's portion of the Kansas City metropolitan area.

The district leans GOP, and Ryun still enjoys a reservoir of admiration from his days as an Olympic runner. Also, Boyda captured only 41 percent of the vote in 2004, even with major help from the national Democratic Party.

But Boyda has said her internal polling shows the race is close, and even some Republicans acknowledge her pitch - exemplified by her "Had enough?" slogan - appears to be resonating with voters upset with Congress.

However, Cheney warned his audience that if Democrats controlled Congress, families would pay higher taxes.

"The marriage penalty will be back. The death tax will come back to life," Cheney said. "The child credit will also drop down from $1,000 to $500 per child."

Boyda called such statements "hollow rhetoric."

"Democrats would not only keep, they would expand middle class tax cuts. They would expand tax relief for independent and small businesses," she said. "The Bush tax cuts for the wealthy have to be repealed."

Cheney also said the United States is safer, adding that Bush warned Americans that the fight against terrorism would require patience and determination. He noted Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman's loss in his Democratic primary this year and suggested leaders such as Chairman Howard Dean are trying to purge the party.

"What these Democrats are pushing now is the very kind of retreat that has been tried and has failed in the past," Cheney said. "It would be reckless and inconsistent with our values. It would betray our friends and only heighten the danger to the United States."

Boyda said she hopes nonpartisan recommendations for ending the war in Iraq will come from former Secretary of State James A. Baker III.

"With the military stretched thin, the American people are not feeling safer," Boyda said. "This administration and Jim Ryun need some adult supervision."

GOP Focuses On Taxes Again (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, October 13, 2006

President Bush and Republican Senate and House candidates are talking more about taxes in speeches, debates and TV spots after polls showed it is the Republican Party's best issue in a tough midterm election season.

"One of the most important issues on the ballot this November is taxes," Mr. Bush said this week in stumping in Georgia for former Rep. Mac Collins, seeking to unseat Rep. Jim Marshall, the incumbent Democrat. "There is a fundamental difference between the Republican and Democratic parties on this important issue."

After being off the campaign radar for months, the tax issue is now turning up in races from Virginia to Minnesota, with a little recent help from Democrats.

Republicans grinned from ear to ear last month when the ranking Democrat on the House Ways and Means Committee, New York Rep. Charles B. Rangel, just about guaranteed tax increases if his party takes over the House after Nov. 7. Asked whether Democrats would consider raising taxes across the whole spectrum of income, Mr. Rangel said, "No question about it."

Some Republicans say Mr. Rangel and his party will soon regret those words.

"Republican tax cuts have removed lots of low-income Americans from the tax rolls, so is Charlie Rangel telling those low-income folks if he and the Democrats take over, they'll put those folks back on the tax rolls?" said American Conservative Union Chairman David A. Keene. "So is he saying his supposed constituency will get to pay taxes again?"

Republican candidates are now asking the same question:

•In a new TV spot, Republican Sen. George Allen, facing an unexpectedly difficult re-election bid in Virginia, says his Democratic challenger, James H. Webb Jr., a former secretary of the Navy, will "bring back the death tax, the marriage penalty tax and cut your child tax credit from $1,000 to $500."

•In Iowa, state Senate President Jeff Lamberti, the Republican seeking to unseat Democratic Rep. Leonard L. Boswell, has hit the incumbent hard with the "new" weapon, saying the five-term congressman supports higher taxes.

•In Minnesota, Rep. Mark Kennedy -- a Republican running for the seat being vacated by retiring Democratic Sen. Mark Dayton -- in a debate this week accused his Democratic opponent, Amy Klobuchar, of supporting "job-killing" tax increases and said that Republicans "helped create 6 million new jobs ... because of the tax relief we passed."

The Democrats are countering with their traditional argument that only the rich benefit from Republicans' tax-cutting policies.

"I don't think taxes are working any better than the war on terror for Republicans, unless you are talking to people in the top 1 percent of income," said Karen Finney, spokeswoman for Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean. "The vast majority of Americans know the Bush economy isn't working for them, so in talking about the economy, most voters are concerned about jobs, wages and rising costs."

Since Mr. Rangel's pledge last month that Democrats would consider across-the-board tax increases, the New York Democrat -- who would become chairman of the key tax-writing committee if Democrats win a House majority on Election Day -- has hedged, shifting his emphasis to making the rich pay more taxes.

Mr. Rangel's remarks, however, have helped focus attention on taxes -- long a signature issue for the Republican Party, but one that Republican pollsters say wasn't polling well until recently.

The comeback of the tax issue is timely for Republicans, who have found their advantage slipping on other key issues. Newsweek magazine reported earlier this month that for the first time since 2001 its poll "shows that more Americans trust the Democrats than the GOP on moral values and the war on terror."

In several competitive congressional races, Republican campaigns have shifted away from a strong emphasis on national security and have begun hammering Democrats as the party of higher taxes -- as Mr. Bush did this week in Georgia.

"Next month, our nation has to make a choice: Do we keep taxes low so you can keep our economy growing? Or do we let the Democrats in Washington raise taxes and hurt the growth of the economy?" the president said while campaigning for Mr. Collins.

"The decision you make in the voting booth will have a direct impact on your bottom line," Mr. Bush told Georgia Republicans.

Republicans say the threat of Democrats taking over Congress has helped boost the issue.

"The tax issue wasn't working for us before because the economy was good, Bush and the Republican Congress had already slashed taxes, and people were focused on other things," Mr. Keene said. "Now, with only weeks before the election, people are being told this election is not about putting money in their pockets through tax cuts but about Democrats taking money out of people's pockets by raising taxes if they get to run the show."

Making taxes a personal issue is the key, one senior Republican adviser said.

"Candidates using the issue successfully are personalizing it, saying for example that there are 42 million middle-class families with children, and if Bush tax cuts are allowed to expire or are repealed, each such taxpayer stands to lose 2,000 bucks out of his pocket," he said.

In New Orleans, Cheney Collects Campaign Cash, Praises Levee Work (AP)

The Associated Press, October 13, 2006

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — During his first trip to this city in more than a year, Vice President Dick Cheney attended a Republican fundraiser after getting briefed on efforts to protect New Orleans from future floods.

Cheney's stopover in New Orleans was also criticized by Democrats, who released a news release questioning the vice president's decision to not spend time in areas flooded by Katrina.

Cheney was shuttled into New Orleans in a motorcade and met privately with Donald Powell, the administration's recovery czar for the battered Gulf Coast, U.S. Sen. David Vitter, R-Metairie, and Brig. Gen. Robert Crear, commander of the Mississippi Valley division of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers.

Cheney briefly spoke to reporters after the closed-door meeting. He took no questions.

The vice president acknowledged that there are still some unfilled gaps in flood protection system, but he said overall he was "tremendously impressed."

"We've got a lot of work to do yet, but it looks like the levees are back to pre-Katrina levels, and in some cases, better than that," Cheney said. "Clearly, that's one of the most important parts of recovery process, which is altogether fitting given that this was the worst natural disaster in American history."

In the late afternoon, Cheney headlined a Republican National Committee fundraiser at the World Trade Center. The RNC said the event was expected to raise $180,000 in campaign cash.

The Democratic National Committee issued a news release calling Cheney's meeting with officials window-dressing for the fundraising junket.

Powell, speaking on Cheney's behalf, called that charge "unfortunate."

"I think he spent his time very wisely" focusing on flood control and economic issues," he said.

Earlier Thursday, Cheney visited Topeka, Kan., to help raise money and boost Rep. Jim Ryun's re-election campaign.

Cheney touched on themes he has used in speeches in other states, suggesting that a Democratic-controlled Congress would allow tax cuts championed by President Bush to lapse and would adopt a "strategy of resignation and defeatism" abroad.

Democrats argued that Cheney's visit shows Republicans are worried about Ryun, who's seeking a sixth term representing Kansas' 2nd District, losing to Democratic challenger Nancy Boyda.

Ryun's campaign said the event, held in the ballroom of Topeka's biggest conference center, raised $209,000, with nearly 300 contributors paying $100 each to attend the speech and an additional $1,000 to have their pictures taken with Cheney. They munched on snacks and drank iced tea, some arriving two hours early.

"I don't think there's any part of America that's better represented in Washington than the 2nd District of Kansas," Cheney said.

The vice president also mentioned GOP challenger Chuck Ahner in the 3rd District and Republican gubernatorial candidate Jim Barnett.

Cheney's visit comes as his fellow Republicans are worried about holding onto its House majority. Earlier this month, Cheney made fundraising appearances in Florida and Wyoming to help GOP incumbents in those states.

Earlier this year, Ryun seemed likely to win re-election without much trouble in the 2nd District. But Boyda has said her internal polling shows the race is close.

Laura Bush Lends A Hand To Sen. Talent (STL)

By Jo Mannies

STLToday.com (St. Louis), October 13, 2006

Besides planting a tree in Forest Park and flipping a pink light on at the Arch, Laura Bush also had a political role to fill while in town Thursday.

Her task: to help energize the region's Republican base about U.S. Sen. Jim Talent's bid for re-election Nov. 7.

She had plenty of help. Also in the region Thursday was her husband, President George W. Bush, and Republican National Committee chairman Ken Mehlman.

Although many of their events were nonpolitical, the appearance of all three in the same state on the same day is a rare occurrence that underscored Missouri's political importance this fall, said David Robertson, a political science professor at the University of Missouri at St. Louis. "Missouri has become a 'firewall' state for Republicans as they do everything they can to avoid losing the U.S. Senate," Robertson said.

A loss of six Senate seats nationwide would put the Democrats in control. And at the moment, more than that number around the country are considered in play in next month's elections. They include Talent's neck-and-neck contest with his Democratic rival, state Auditor Claire McCaskill.

Mehlman called "firewall" too strong of a term to describe Missouri's significance to the GOP. "Missouri is important to both parties," said Mehlman in a telephone interview from Union, Mo., where he headlined the last of five get-out-the-vote events Thursday for Republican activists.

Laura Bush was the chief attraction Thursday afternoon at a fundraising event for Talent in west St. Louis County that collected $300,000 for his campaign. "She is a very gracious lady," Talent said afterwards, as he told reporters how much he appreciated her campaign help.

Talent joined Bush at her two nonpolitical events open to the press.

Her first stop Thursday afternoon was at Forest Park, where she led a ceremonial planting of the first of 50 million trees that the Enterprise Rent-A-Car Foundation has promised to national forests.

Among those joining her at the World's Fair Pavilion was Andrew Taylor, chairman of Enterprise Rent-A-Car. Bush, Taylor and others donned garden gloves to plant four white pine seedlings in a shiny galvanized washtub. The seedlings are destined for permanent soil elsewhere.

"Trees are essential to our lives and our planet," Bush said. "They eliminate harmful carbon dioxide and create the oxygen we breathe."

The foundation promised to underwrite the planting of the trees through a pledge of $50 million over the next 50 years to the National Arbor Day Foundation.

Talk About Your Wildest Dreams

DMX gave his now-infamous interview to Sister 2 Sister magazine with his wife, Tashera, sitting by his side. Bet he'll bring his lawyer next time.

A Maryland woman whose child was fathered by the rapper sued him yesterday in Prince George's County Circuit Court for his claim in the interview that she had "raped" him in his sleep. Monique Wayne , 25, is seeking $6 million for defamation, false statements and "unreasonable publicity" to her private life, according to a copy of the suit provided by her lawyers.

"Miss Wayne's been completely ostracized," said attorney Stephanie Moran . "She's had to answer questions from friends and family members. You have reporters as far away as Ireland commenting on this." A rep for the 35-year-old rapper (born Earl Simmons) said last night that he would have to confer with lawyers before commenting.

DMX did not cite Wayne by name in his Q&A with Jamie Foster Brown , but Wayne's 2004 paternity suit -- which Moran said resulted in a $5,000-a-month support agreement -- had been widely reported. Wayne's suit alleges that the conception of her son, now 2, was hardly the passed-out one-night stand DMX described. She says they met in August 2003 at D.C.'s Dream (now Love) nightclub, then spent the night at Hotel Helix, followed by a day together shopping, playing pool and eating crabs at Hains Point. She claims DMX went on to invite her to parties and concerts as recently as this past summer.

"Then DMX turns around and accuses her of being a rapist," said Moran. "That's a serious allegation."

Bucks for Barbra: The Deal Is On

Barbra Streisand ' s reps were taken aback last week when we told them about the offer her concert tour promoter had made to well-heeled fans -- a personal meeting with the diva in exchange for a $50,000 contribution to her charitable foundation. First they insisted the e-mailed offer had to be a hoax -- "not her style," said one -- then expressed pique that no one had cleared the idea with Babs.

But as Streisand heads to D.C., all is apparently forgiven. A rep for promoter Michael Cohl said that the plan is fully on track, and that the first meeting package has been sold in conjunction with tonight's Verizon Center show. But no, they wouldn't identify the generous fan who thinks a chat with Barbra is worth the cost of a new Benz. Any clue? mailto:reliablesource@%20washpost.com .

St. Louis Arch Lights Up Pretty in Pink

Laura Bush was in St. Louis last night to see the city's landmark 630-foot arch lit up in pink for Breast Cancer Awareness Month -- the brainchild of cosmetics executive Evelyn Lauder, who also invented the pink-ribbon symbol. The National Park Service originally turned down the request two years ago, so Sen. Jim Talent (R-Mo.) successfully pushed legislation making an annual exception. Lauder attended the first lighting last year but missed this year's ceremony -- she's in Washington today, where top businesswomen will honor her philanthropic work for breast cancer research.

When Terror Strikes, Liberals And The Right Vote Further Apart (WSJ)

By Sharon Begley

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

On the weekend before Election Day 2004, al-Jazeera broadcast a videotape in which Osama bin Laden, addressing the U.S., boasted about the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and tore into the Bush administration. Four days later, the president won re-election.

Three days before the March 2004 elections in Spain, terrorists bombed commuter trains, killing 191 people. The ruling party, which had strongly supported the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, went down to defeat.

Two cases in which terrorism was front and center in voters' minds. Two different outcomes. In Spain, the attack sparked a growing fury at incumbents for not keeping them safe. In the U.S., voters in greater number embraced candidates they perceived as stronger on national security.

A growing number of studies offer clues as to how terrorism and other deadly events affect people's voting decisions. The latest research shows that because such violent political acts are brutal reminders of death, they make conservatives, but not liberals, more hostile toward those perceived as different, and more supportive of extreme military policies, according to a study in April in Personality and Social Psychology Bulletin.

For 20 years, researchers have been exploring how people manage the fear engendered by intimations of mortality. Reminded of the inevitability of their own death (which happens to a lesser degree by merely walking past a funeral parlor), people try to quench or at least manage the resulting "existential terror" in several ways. They become more certain of their worldview or faith. They conform more closely to the norms of their society. They show greater reverence for symbols of their society, such as flags and crucifixes.

All of these make people feel more secure and, crucially, a part of something larger -- something that will outlive them.

Building up your own worldview requires disparaging (even unconsciously) that of others. If beliefs that contradict yours have any worth, then by definition they call into question the absolute validity of your own. The result is stronger feelings of hostility toward those with different values and beliefs.

This "worldview defense," says psychology researcher Sheldon Solomon of Skidmore College, "reduces the terror that reminders of your own death bring." These results have been replicated in some 300 lab experiments, including in cultures with very different ideas about an afterlife.

Which brings us back to the effect on voters of a terrorist attack and its brutal reminders of mortality. Although some voters would feel betrayed by incumbents who failed to protect them, researchers say, these days that trend would more likely be swamped by a surge toward candidates perceived as hawks on national security.

"We feel that unconscious thoughts about death do influence people's voting decisions, especially for folks who are not strongly committed to a candidate," says Prof. Solomon, expressing a consensus of those who have studied terrorism and voting behavior.

The link between thoughts of death and actual behavior shows up not only in labs but in the real world, too. After 9/11, Americans sprouted flag lapel pins. Patriotism and approval of the president soared. Tolerance for dissent plummeted. ("All Americans...need to watch what they say," warned a White House spokesman.)

Even what seem to be exceptions support the rule that reminders of death cause people to hunker down in their own worldview. New Yorkers living or working near Ground Zero are regularly reminded of death, yet tend to be liberal, opposed to the Iraq war and critical of President Bush. Why don't intimations of mortality push them toward nationalistic fervor?

"Reminders of death do make New Yorkers cling to their worldview more strongly," says psychology researcher Tom Pyszczynski of the University of Colorado, Colorado Springs. "If that worldview has to do with tolerance and peace and prosocial beliefs, then those positions strengthen."

Prof. Solomon and Prof. Pyszczynski and colleagues explain this conservative/liberal divide in the Bulletin study by suggesting that extreme militarism violates liberals' core beliefs. Since thoughts of death make people more committed to their worldview, hawks, but not doves, would increase their support for military action in the wake of a terrorist attack.

"A worldview that has your nation engaged in a heroic battle against evil seems to be especially effective at soothing fears of your own death," says Prof. Solomon. "That makes leaders who talk about fighting a righteous battle more appealing."

Needless to say, voters weigh many factors before they pull the lever. The bin Laden tape did not produce a Bush landslide, so horrific reminders of death just before Election Day have only so much power.

"Not every vote in 2004 was based on thoughts of death, but these reminders can make a big difference," says Prof. Solomon. "There is nothing like a terrorist attack to bring thoughts of your own death to the fore. My gut tells me there would be a significant movement toward candidates who describe the U.S. as engaged in a righteous fight against an evil worldview."

Clinton Says Right Wing Has Hurt U.S., Predicts Win By Democrats (LVS)

By Kathleen Hennessey

Las Vegas Sun, October 13, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) - The nation has been "jammed into an ideological corner" by conservative Republicans and is primed for a power shift in the November elections, former President Bill Clinton said Thursday.

"This is an election unlike any other I have ever participated in," Clinton told Democratic supporters at a fundraiser in Las Vegas. "For six years this country has been totally dominated - not by the Republican Party, this is not fair to the Republican Party - by a narrow sliver of the Republican Party, its more right-wing and its most ideological element."

"When the chips are down, this country has been jammed to the right, jammed into an ideological corner, alienated from its allies, and we're in a lot of trouble," he said.

Clinton addressed a group of about 50 top-level donors to the Jack Carter for Senate campaign. Carter, the son of former President Jimmy Carter, is running to unseat Republican Sen. John Ensign.

Clinton also attended a fundraiser for Democratic congressional candidates Jill Derby and Tessa Hafen at which the minimum contribution was $3,000.

He appeared onstage with Hafen, Derby, Carter and Rep. Shelley Berkley, D-Nev., but did not take questions from the media or comment on recent criticism of his administration's policy on nuclear nonproliferation in North Korea.

The former president largely stuck to politics.

"The Democratic Party has become the liberal and conservative party in America. If you want to be fiscally conservative, you've got to be for us. If you want to conserve natural resources, you've got to be for us," he said. "If you want a change of course in Iraq ... you've got to be for us."

Clinton also attacked Republican tax cuts, describing a repeal of the estate tax as the GOP's top legislative priority.

"They may think I should be able to give Chelsea every nickel, but I don't," Clinton said.

Tucker Bounds, spokesman for the Republican National Committee, returned the criticism.

"It's going to take more than a Bill Clinton stopover to change the minds of the majority of Nevadans," he said.

"Republicans have solid candidates on the ballot that are going to keep taxes low and continue to fight terrorism," Bounds said. He said the party had not fallen out of step with voters.

"Keeping taxes low and the economy healthy is not a fringe belief. It is a popular belief in Nevada and a popular belief in most every other state."

Clinton did not mention Rep. Jon Porter, Hafen's opponent, or Nevada Secretary of State Dean Heller, Derby's opponent, by name. He dismissed Ensign as "a sort of a likable fellow" with "good relations with most of the powers-that-be here in the state," perhaps a reference to Ensign's working relationship with Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

Clinton, who recently made fundraising stops for Democrats in Minnesota and New Jersey, also said he was embarrassed by the recent immigration debate.

He noted that Mexico had become one of the U.S.'s top 10 creditors.

"These people are our bankers," Clinton said. "Doesn't it embarrass you that these poor people are trying to sneak over the Rio Grande River to find a living in this country and we want to stop that? But we're only too happy to turn around and say, 'Don't spend your own money on those poor illegal immigrants to give them an education and get a job in Mexico. Loan it to us.'"

Santorum, Casey Clash In Debate (CCT)

By Jennifer C. Yates And Kimberly Hefling

The Contra Costa Times, October 13, 2006

PITTSBURGH - Sen. Rick Santorum and Democrat Bob Casey bickered about everything from Santorum's residency to immigration in a contentious debate Thursday that was their first in Pennsylvania.

"Don't be a desperate campaigner," Casey, the state treasurer, told Santorum.

Santorum, R-Pa., accused Casey of relying on the name of his father, the late Gov. Robert P. Casey, and not offering plans of his own.

"I don't know how you can say so many words and say nothing," said Santorum, a two-term incumbent who is the No. 3 Senate Republican. "It's just talking point after talking point."

Santorum, who has trailed Casey in polls for months in one of the nation's most competitive Senate races, closed with an impassioned speech in which he said he has worked hard and been rewarded by Pennsylvanians and his Republican colleagues with a leadership position

"I'm a passionate guy. I'm tough, I'm a fighter. But you know what? I'm an Italian kid from a steel town. What do you expect from me? I'm a guy who had to grow up having to scratch and claw," Santorum said. "I wasn't born into a family that had a great name. My dad's an immigrant to this country. I've worked hard, just like you do in western Pennsylvania to fight for the things you believe in."

Casey closed with a promise to bring health insurance to more children and protect workers from unfair trade deals.

"We need change. We need to move in a brand-new direction," he said.

The debate started on a contentious note with a question to Santorum about his decision to keep a home in a Washington suburb in Virginia where he primarily lives with his wife and six kids. Questions have been raised throughout the campaign about Santorum's use of tax dollars from Pennsylvania to fund his children's cyberschool education.

"I'm a senator from Pennsylvania. My residence is in Pennsylvania. That's where I pay my taxes, that's where my driver's license is. We have a three bedroom home. My kids and I slept there last night," Santorum said.

Santorum then turned to Casey and accused him of not showing up for work in his position as the state treasurer, and repeatedly asked him to look into the camera and tell voters how many times he has shown up.

Casey did not. He repeatedly told Santorum to "pay the money back" that had been used to fund the cyberschool education.

"This wouldn't be an issue in this campaign if he were straight with the voters, not only with the people of Penn Hills, but the voters all over the state," Casey said.

Casey, asked if he was relying on his father's name to get elected, cited his work as state auditor and treasurer, saying he had been fiscally responsible and cracked down on waste and fraud. He said it was hard when he lost the Democratic gubernatorial primary in 2002, but he said he entered the Senate race because he thought he could contribute.

"If this race comes down to whose working harder and who does their job better, mine as state treasurer, his as a U.S. senator, I'll win that battle. I'm not worried about that at all because I get results and I've been fighting battles for the people of this state for a decade," Casey said.

The two argued over whether Casey supports "amnesty" for illegal immigrants because Casey has said he would reluctantly support a Senate bill - which Santorum opposed - that would allow illegal immigrants to earn citizenship after meeting certain requirements. Santorum has said the bill would give illegal immigrants a free ride.

As they have before, Casey accused Santorum of supporting a plan that would privatize Social Security and Santorum accused Casey of not understanding the problem or offering a plan to help.

During the debate, Casey worked to portray Santorum as a partisan Republican and ally to President Bush who has acted in the interests of corporate America. What Santorum has done, he said, is "talk and talk and talk."

Santorum touted a record working with Democrats on issues such as curtailing dog-breeding operations dubbed "puppy mills" by opponents and obtaining money for autism research. He attempted to challenge Casey's credibility by asking Casey to name facts, such as the name of the former president of Iran, which Casey did not name when asked.

"I provide the solutions," Santorum said. "He's only describing problems."

The two, both clad in black suits and dark red ties, stood next to each other behind podiums. At one point, Santorum told Casey to "quit lying to the people, Bob." Casey later said to Santorum, "I've got a point to make, stop talking." They even interrupted moderator Ken Rice at times.

"Gentleman, please, please, please, you're just killing our time keeper and you're just trashing your own rules," Rice said after one exchange.

The debate in a KDKA-TV studio was sponsored by the station and the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette. It was the second debate between the two and comes less than a month before the Nov. 7 general election.

Their first debate, taped in Washington and aired Sept. 3 on NBC's "Meet the Press," focused primarily on the war in Iraq.

The two are expected to debate twice on Monday in Philadelphia.

The Gloves Come Off (HPN)

By Brett Lieberman

Harrisburg Patriot-News (PA), October 13, 2006

PITTSBURGH - U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum and his Democratic challenger, Robert P. Casey Jr., pointed fingers and exchanged barbs and charges of hypocrisy during a tense debate yesterday that showed how personal the Senate election has become.

The accusations and fireworks lasted throughout, when Santorum was questioned about perceptions that he's been dishonest about where he lives, to the end, when he accused Casey of being lazy and trying to coast into office on his famous name.

In between, moderator Ken Rice of KDKA-TV, which hosted the forum, struggled, mostly unsuccessfully, to maintain order.

"Gentlemen, we have to move on," Rice said at one point. "You're killing the time keeper and trashing your own rules."

Bitter exchanges came over issues such as Santorum's residency and the candidates' negative ads, but the debate degenerated when they talked about immigration reform, U.S. policies toward Iraq and Iran and how to stop the spread of nuclear weapons.

"You don't understand the issues," Santorum told Casey after the Democrat faulted the Bush administration's handling of Iran and North Korea.

Casey said "all options need to be on the table," including using the military to deal with North Korea. The White House has squandered opportunities for a solution and has alienated allies, he said.

Santorum complained of "Monday morning quarterbacking" of foreign-policy decisions by Bush critics.

Santorum also faced scrutiny from his challenger and panelists for his divisive reputation and on issues such as whether the Bush administration's decision to invade Iraq has made Iran stronger and limited U.S. options to combat terrorism.

Santorum said he is unfairly cast as a polarizing figure and portrayed himself as a straight-talking hard worker who delivers for Pennsylvania and works across party lines.

"I look people in the eye and tell them what I believe. ... I don't not answer questions. ... I'm passionate about things, as opposed to someone who just wants to ride it out and use their name and not say anything," he said.

Santorum recited a litany of his efforts, from legislation to close puppy mills, fund autism and Lyme disease research, fighting to save western Pennsylvania military bases, keep the Pirates and Penguins sports teams in Pittsburgh, and protecting farmland.

Casey faced more scrutiny of his positions and record from Santorum and the KDKA and Pittsburgh Post-Gazette panelists yesterday than he did in a debate with Santorum on NBC's "Meet the Press" last month.

But Casey, who has been criticized for his low-key style, showed a more aggressive side as he repeatedly challenged Santorum to "answer the question."

He accused Santorum of trying to piggyback on immigration reform after failing to take a tough stand on the issue during 12 years in the Senate.

Santorum, who continues to trail Casey in polls, closed the debate with a plea to voters, especially those in western Pennsylvania, where his approval is lowest.

"As you can see from this debate, I'm a passionate guy," Santorum said. "I'm tough, I'm a fighter. But you know what? I'm an Italian kid from a steel town. What do you expect from me?

"I wasn't born into a family that had a great name. My dad's an immigrant to this country. I've worked hard, just like you do in western Pennsylvania to fight for the things you believe in," he said.

Santorum has been criticized for living with his wife and six children most of the year in Leesburg, Va., while claiming a three-bedroom home in the western Pennsylvania town of Penn Hills as their residence.

"I'm a senator from Pennsylvania. My residence is in Pennsylvania. That's where I pay my taxes, that's where my driver's license is," he said.

Santorum defended the Virginia home, noting that the Senate is in session 35 to 40 weeks a year and voters "sent me to go to Washington to fight hard, to show up for work, which is something that my opponent doesn't do."

Casey, invoking U.S. Sen. Arlen Specter's comments last month that the Senate's three-day work week ought to be extended, said Congress has more recesses than most schools.

Santorum asked Casey how much time he spends in the treasurer's office.

"Look in the camera, Mr. Casey," Santorum said. "Look in the camera and tell the people how much time you spend in the office. This is a legitimate question.

"Now I want you to look in the camera and tell people how many full days of work you spent at the treasurer's office last month," he said.

"Don't be a desperate campaigner," Casey shot back.

Santorum And Casey Trade Barbs (PT)

By Mike Wereschagin

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review Debate, October 13, 2006

In a feisty debate that spun out of the moderator's control almost from the start, U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum accused Democratic challenger Bob Casey of skipping work and offering no solutions to the nation's dilemmas, while Casey denounced Santorum for being beholden to oil companies and for not recognizing the country has problems.

The taped one-hour debate, broadcast at 7 p.m. on KDKA Channel 2, began with Santorum saying he has paid more than $100,000 in taxes on his Penn Hills home since he took office, making that home -- and not his larger house in Virginia -- his primary residence.

Santorum, who has trailed Casey in the polls for more than a year and only has a few weeks to rebound, attacked Casey's work ethic.

"How many days were you in the treasurer's office 9-to-5 last month?" Santorum, almost yelling, asked Casey. "I want you to look in the camera and tell people how many 9-to-5 days you spent in the Treasurer's office last month."

"Rick, don't be a desperate campaigner," Casey replied evenly. He didn't answer Santorum's question, and instead shot back with an accusation about taxpayer dollars paid for the Santorum children's education at a cyber charter school while they lived in Virginia. "You ripped the taxpayers off $55,000."

Santorum responded with a rapid-fire litany of the amounts of local and state taxes he paid in Penn Hills over the years, while Casey, talking at the same time, said slowly, "Pay the money back."

Moderator and KDKA anchor Ken Rice admonished the candidates to stick to the agreed time limits. It didn't work. The two continued talking over each other, pointing fingers and leaning toward the others' podium throughout the debate. Even afterward, each candidate met with reporters to take a few parting shots at his opponent.

During the debate, which began at 1:30 p.m. in KDKA's Downtown studios, Casey criticized the Bush administration and Santorum for what he said is a fixation on Iraq that has allowed Iran and North Korea to advance their nuclear weapons programs. He also challenged Santorum to close a loophole, which he said allows Halliburton, a defense contractor once run by Vice President Dick Cheney, to do business with Iran.

"What you see again is my opponent not providing any answer to the question. What he's done is describe the problem, complained about the administration," Santorum said. "I authored the Iran Freedom and Support Act, which the administration opposed. You're right. I disagree with the administration and have on the Iran policy."

Turning to Casey, he said, "I disagreed with them inviting (to the White House) the former president of Iran -- you know his name, I'm sure. The former president of Iran?"

Casey didn't. Speaking to reporters after the debate, Casey admitted he couldn't remember the former Iranian president's name -- Mohammad Khatami -- and added, "There are some names I don't know. I don't know the lobbyist from Exxon that gave (Santorum) tons of money."

The candidates traded barbs on outsourcing, with Casey saying Pennsylvania lost 180,000 manufacturing jobs on Santorum's watch, and Santorum criticizing Casey for investing millions of taxpayer dollars in companies that have shipped jobs overseas.

On immigration, Santorum charged that Casey supports amnesty for millions of illegal immigrants. Casey shot back that the proposal he supports is not considered amnesty by Republican Sens. Arlen Specter, of Philadelphia, and John McCain, of Arizona.

Casey and Santorum are expected to debate twice more next week in Philadelphia.

Santorum, Casey Go Toe-to-toe In Debate (PPG)

By Bill Toland

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, October 13, 2006

The two candidates interrupted each other, talked over each other, ignored time limits, ignored the moderator and generally stopped just short of playground name-calling and shin-kicking. To say that KDKA moderator Ken Rice lost control of yesterday's debate between U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum and state Treasurer Bob Casey would be fallacious, because it suggests that he ever had control to begin with.

In short: bad manners.

But great political theater.

In this debate, sponsored jointly by KDKA and the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, the issues took a back seat to the candidates' sparring and demeanor. Mr. Santorum, a Republican, frequently challenged his Democratic foe to "look in the camera" and tell Pennsylvania the truth. After many of Mr. Casey's responses to panelists' queries, Mr. Santorum rolled his eyes and said: "You will not get this man to answer the question."

Mr. Casey, meanwhile, repeatedly alluded to the incumbent's poor poll numbers.

"Hey Rick, I know things are tough," he said. "Don't be a desperate campaigner."

And that was just the first 10 minutes. Over the course of the hour, the candidates battled on the Iraq war, border security and amnesty for undocumented immigrants, Social Security, pay raises and other issues.

Rare was the question that elicited a few minutes of civility. The close-quarters sparring undoubtedly added color to the affair, but the candidates appeared less statesmanlike than either Gov. Ed Rendell or challenger Lynn Swann, who debated each other in Pittsburgh last week.

Off the bat, Mr. Rice asked Mr. Santorum a question that has dogged him for months -- why did he allow Penn Hills School District to foot the bill for his children to attend a Pennsylvania online cyber school, when he and his family primarily live in Virginia? (A public school district, by state law, must pick up the tab for students living within the district and attending an Internet-based school.)

"I've paid $100,000 in state and local taxes," Mr. Santorum said, implying that he's entitled to the same benefits that other Pennsylvania taxpayers get, even if his children lay their heads to rest in a different state.

"This issue is as much about hypocrisy as it is about residency," Mr. Casey said, referring to Mr. Santorum's 16-year-old attack on former U.S. Rep. Doug Walgren, whom Mr. Santorum pilloried for living in Virginia instead of Pennsylvania. Both candidates were evasive to varying degrees, but Mr. Casey more so. That was partly because, at least twice, Mr. Santorum asked questions designed to trip him up -- first, he wanted to know if Mr. Casey remembered the name of former Iranian president Mohammad Khatami; second, he asked Mr. Casey if he knew precisely what percentage of the Pennsylvania Public School Employees' Retirement System's assets is invested in companies that are notorious for outsourcing jobs (he said the answer was 25 percent).

Mr. Santorum, as a result, appeared to have a better grasp of the issues, at least those ones that were raised yesterday. Mr. Casey often relied on familiar talking points, reminding viewers that Mr. Santorum votes with President Bush about 98 percent of the time, and that Mr. Santorum wanted to "privatize" Social Security by allowing younger workers to invest part of their Social Security payroll taxes into stocks.

"I don't know how you can say so many words and say nothing," Mr. Santorum said, mocking the catchphrases that are familiar not only to Mr. Casey but to all political challengers. "Brand new direction. Different course. It's just, you know, talking point after talking point."

But Mr. Santorum had his talking points, too. Several times, he said Mr. Casey doesn't take his job as state treasurer seriously, viewing it as a stepping stone to higher office. He also said Mr. Casey is coasting on his father's name, referring to the late Robert P. Casey, former governor of Pennsylvania.

If he seemed more informed at times, Mr. Santorum also seemed far more agitated, gesturing aggressively and trampling Mr. Casey's remarks more often than Mr. Casey returned the favor. He opened the debate wearing a smile, but quickly the smile became a frustrated scowl. Mr. Casey appeared more bemused than he did frustrated, except for a moment near the end of the debate, when he mustered his best teacher voice and cut off Mr. Santorum:

"Stop talking Rick, I've got a point to make."

Mr. Santorum seemed surprised, but recovered nicely: "It would be the first one today."

On Iraq, the candidates debated the merits of the recently publicized National Intelligence Estimate, which suggested that the invasion of Iraq is "shaping a new generation of terrorist leaders and operatives." Mr. Santorum was asked if the Iraq invasion made the Middle East more dangerous than before.

"Compared to what? Compared to had we done nothing? That's a classic Monday morning quarterback," Mr. Santorum said. The coupled U.S. invasions of Iraq and Afghanistan have helped, in his assessment, in reducing the global terror threat posed by al-Qaida and the version of Islam that breeds radical Sunnis.

"We haven't been attacked in five years," he said, speaking of the American homeland and not the 2,800 American troops who have died since the invasion.

"I think the National Intelligence Estimate tells a good part of the story," Mr. Casey replied. "That said very clearly that the war in Iraq has made it much tougher to take on the war against terrorism around the world. There's no question about that. Sen. Santorum just said that because of what happened in Iraq, we reduced the threat of terrorism -- that's not the truth. The National Intelligence Estimate contradicts what he just said."

The candidates' Iraq responses soon wandered into a parsing of the differences among special forces, special operations forces, and the U.S. Army Special Forces, informally known as the Green Berets. Mr. Rice, the moderator, had heard enough. "You're killing our timekeeper," he said, "and you're just trashing your own rules."

In his closing statement, Mr. Santorum dialed down the bullying while acknowledging it at the same time.

"You can see from this debate -- I'm a passionate guy," he said. "I'm tough. I'm a fighter. But you know what? I'm an Italian kid from a steel town. What do you expect from me? ... I wasn't born into a family that had a great name."

He also touted his role in funding local VA hospitals, and keeping the Air Force Reserve's 911th Military Airlift Wing open in Pittsburgh, when it had been facing closure.

Mr. Casey wrapped up by acknowledging that this is "a very, very important Senate race for the country," something echoed by Democrats and Republicans across the United States, as well as political observers who view Pennsylvania's premier race as a bellwether for the nation.

"We can stay on the road that we've been on the last couple of years, the road of deficit and debt ... There's a very clear choice in this campaign."

Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker, the Republican candidate to replace retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, has retooled his campaign in an effort to regain his lead over Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., Tennessee Democrat.

"We've made a number of enhancements to the campaign," said Corker campaign spokesman Todd Womack. "They are more about addition than subtraction ... adjustments to ensure that we win this election, and we will."

The new campaign chairman is Tom Ingram, a longtime political insider in the state who serves as chief of staff to Sen. Lamar Alexander, Tennessee Republican.

Mr. Corker also has hired a new media consultant, former EMI Records executive Fred Davis. The campaign has moved its headquarters from Chattanooga to Nashville, the state capital.

Democrats need to win six seats on Nov. 7 to reclaim their majority in the Senate, and see hope in Republican-leaning Tennessee.

The party seized on the Corker campaign shake-up.

"Corker is in disarray, shaking things up and hiring Hollywood media types instead of explaining things like why he's for staying the course in Iraq one day and against it the next," said Phil Singer, spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

Mr. Ford yesterday received another boost: the endorsement of Frank Cagle, a leading conservative political analyst and editor of Knoxville Magazine.

The Republican National Committee and the National Republican Senatorial Committee are working to counter Mr. Ford's momentum by infusing Mr. Corker's campaign with new ads.

RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman will lead rallies in Murfreesboro and Franklin with Mr. Corker and Rep. Marsha Blackburn, Tennessee Republican.

Polls heavily favored Mr. Corker over the summer before trending for Mr. Ford. The latest polls show the candidates in a dead heat.

Two weeks ago, when Ben Mitchell was Mr. Corker's campaign chairman, he told The Washington Times that the campaign was comfortable with where it stood and noted that Mr. Ford "has yet to show above 45 percent in his own polling."

Things have changed since then.

The DSCC released a poll of 800 likely voters Tuesday showing Mr. Ford leading Mr. Corker by seven points, 51 percent to 44 percent, with a margin of error of 3.3 percentage points.

Hamilton Beattie & Staff conducted the poll for the DSCC from Oct. 2 to 4, during the height of the frenzy surrounding disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley, Florida Republican.

Polls conducted during that time showed a national trend against Republicans, which might have affected Mr. Corker.

A Survey USA poll of 537 likely voters for WBIR-TV Knoxville shows Mr. Corker leading with 48 percent and Mr. Ford with 46 percent, with a margin of error of four percentage points. The poll was conducted Saturday through Tuesday and released Wednesday. It still revealed a virtual dead heat in the race and more than 45 percent support for Mr. Ford.

Steele Takes A Head-On Jab At His Party (WP)

By Ann E. Marimow

Maryland Senate candidate Michael S. Steele, who often avoids mentioning his political affiliation in the overwhelmingly Democratic state, took one of his most direct swipes at his party in a new commercial yesterday while continuing to fault Democrats.

In the ad, Steele criticizes Republicans for creating an education policy "that teaches to a test," a reference to President Bush's No Child Left Behind law, and Democrats for putting "bureaucracy ahead of our kids."

"Some Republicans forget folks still climbing that ladder," he says, and Democrats "just raise their taxes."

Meanwhile, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin is trying to use the lieutenant governor's own words to pin Steele to the unpopular president. In the Democratic candidate's latest 30-second spot, the announcer says, "Steele wants you to believe he'll follow his own convictions. The truth?" The screen then flashes to Steele onstage at the 2004 Republican National Convention declaring: "The standard-bearer of these convictions is George W. Bush."

Steele, the former chairman of the state Republican Party, has played down his party ties throughout the campaign. He has pledged to be a "bridge of steel" between Republicans and Democrats and has pointed out problems with Bush's signature education policy. His criticism of the president and his party became public in July after he acknowledged sharing it privately with reporters.

The ad marks some of his most direct public comments about the GOP. Like Steele, the state's last Republican senator, Charles McC. Mathias Jr., avoided talking about his party or listing it in his literature.

"What's unusual is that Steele has taken the next step," said John N. Bambacus, who teaches politics at Frostburg State University and managed Mathias's campaign in 1980.

Steele can afford to openly criticize his party, Bambacus said, because the GOP base has "nowhere else to go."

Dan Ronayne, a spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee, said many candidates are expressing dissatisfaction with official Washington.

Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee (R-R.I.) took a similar approach in one ad, saying, "I believe that neither Republicans nor Democrats are always right. I angered Republicans when I voted against the war in Iraq and Democrats when I voted for legal reform."

To Ronayne, Steele's critique is not surprising. "Michael Steele is an independent voice, and he speaks his mind," he said. "He's pointing out problems he sees in Washington on both sides."

As is independent candidate Kevin Zeese, who has the backing of the Green, Libertarian and Populist parties. He has tried to tap into voter dissatisfaction by offering himself as an alternative to the candidates from the two major parties.

With Republicans on the defensive nationally, Cardin has repeatedly tried to link Steele to Bush, noting his support for the Iraq war and for the president's veto of a bill to expand federal funding for embryonic stem cell research.

Cardin spokesman Oren Shur accused Steele of trying to "re-create himself" through the ad, saying, "Michael Steele is in lock step with the Bush agenda."

Steele spokesman Doug Heye, noting that he counted more than 100 references to Bush by Cardin during the candidates' debate this month, shot back, "This race is not about George Bush."

Burying the news

"Why is it that none of the major television networks or newspapers have managed to pay attention to the biggest real scandal of the 2006 campaign season, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid's real estate shenanigans?" Jed Babbin asks at www.realclearpolitics.com.

"According to [Wednesday's] AP report, Reid pocketed a $1.1 million windfall on the sale of some Las Vegas property he didn't own at the time of the sale. This makes Hillary Clinton's futures trading venture look like amateur hour. And it's time for conservatives to act because the biggest scandal is that the media are burying the story," Mr. Babbin said.

"According to the AP report, the deal was put together by Reid's longtime friend Jay Brown, '... a former casino lawyer whose name surfaced in a major political bribery trial this summer and in other prior organized crime investigations.' Apparently Brown structured the deal so that Reid could transfer his ownership interest to Brown without disclosing it to the public. And here's the kicker: Reid didn't disclose the sale on his financial disclosure forms filed with the Senate.

"Not to make too big a deal of this, but falsifying that report — as Reid apparently did — is a federal crime. Under Title 18 US Code Section 1001, it's a false official statement. For which Reid could be sent to jail. If you're looking for this on tonight's network news or on the front page of tomorrow's New York Times (next to the newest revival of the Foley minutiae) you won't find it. There's ample time for Mark Foley, the discredited generals' revolt, and even the comprehensively discredited Lancet report on civilian casualties in Iraq. But cover a real scandal, with real misconduct that's punishable under federal criminal law?"

Never mind

A black leader who had accused Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman of lying about his civil rights record said yesterday that he accepted Mr. Lieberman's word that he marched with 1960s-era activists against segregation.

"It is true that he marched with Dr. King, but I believe Dr. King would be disappointed in his record as a senator over the past 18 years," said Henry E. Parker, a former state treasurer, in a statement released by the campaign of Mr. Lieberman's rival, Ned Lamont.

"I accept the fact that Sen. Lieberman provided documentation that he participated in the civil rights movement in the '60s," Mr. Parker added.

Earlier, the Connecticut Federation of Black Democratic Clubs, which includes 20 clubs, endorsed Mr. Lamont, a Democrat, and questioned whether Mr. Lieberman, who holds his seat as a Democrat but is running for re-election as an independent, had marched for civil rights. Mr. Lamont attended the event, the Associated Press reports.

Mr. Lieberman's campaign responded by producing a 1963 college newspaper clip that cites Mr. Lieberman's reporting from Jackson, Miss., about the arrests of civil rights workers. Mr. Lieberman was chairman of the Yale Daily News.

"Was I there?" Mr. Lieberman said Wednesday. "You bet I was there."

Test of leadership

"In one deadly moment, North Korea has succeeded in doing what no amount of backtracking by House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert or his beleaguered Republicans could do: It has changed the subject of the national debate. With nuclear weapons in the hands of the most deranged regime in the world, e-mails to pages will have to fade from the forefront of the public's attention," Dick Morris writes in the Hill newspaper.

"Will Bush be able to deal with the North Korean crisis? This is truly the moment for a test of his leadership," Mr. Morris said.

"In August 2004, according to [an] article in the liberal New Yorker, 'a clandestine summit meeting took place at the Aspen Institute, in Colorado's Rocky Mountains. The participants, all Democrats, were sworn to secrecy' and included five billionaires who 'shared a common goal: to use their fortunes to engineer the defeat of President George W. Bush in the 2004 election.' The wealthiest of these 'hard-core partisans' was George Soros, who had been a 'leading crusader for campaign-finance reform,' " Edward Whelan writes in National Review Online at www.nationalreview.com.

"Soros, through his Open Society Institute, provides support for the Aspen Institute, which runs various activities in support of its stated mission of '[fostering] enlightened leadership and open-minded dialogue.' Among these activities are its 'Justice and Society Seminars,' which often have federal judges as participants. The Aspen Institute has waived the steep seminar fee (currently up to $6,950) for participating federal judges, and also has covered their expenses for travel, lodging, and meals," said Mr. Whelan, president of the Ethics and Public Policy Center.

"Soros has also been a major funder of the Community Rights Counsel, a left-wing 'public interest law firm.' In addition to its activist litigation efforts, the Community Rights Counsel has been the most vocal opponent of educational seminars for judges operated by anyone other than federal bureaucrats or bar associations. Soros's left hand apparently knows what his other left hand is doing: The Community Rights Counsel has not criticized the Aspen Institute's seminars for judges. Instead, one of its primary targets has been the academic programs in economics, philosophy, and history offered by the George Mason University Law and Economics Center."

Five key races

The U.S. Immigration Reform Political Action Committee yesterday endorsed six Republicans and two Democrats for re-election to the Senate, as well as 10 challengers and two candidates running for open Senate seats.

The group's communications director, Phil Kent, singled out five Senate endorsements as especially critical because of the sharp differences among candidates on giving amnesty, Social Security and in-state tuition to illegal aliens.

The group backed Sen. Rick Santorum, Pennsylvania Republican, over Democrat Bob Casey Jr.; Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, a Republican, over Democratic Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin; Tom Kean Jr., New Jersey Republican, over Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez; Sen. Jim Talent, Missouri Republican, over Democrat Claire McCaskill; and Jan Ting, Delaware Republican, over Democratic Sen. Thomas R. Carper.

Nobel finalist?

Anti-war activist Cindy Sheehan says she is a finalist for the Nobel Peace Prize.

Mrs. Sheehan made the announcement Wednesday night in an Austin, Texas, bookstore while autographing copies of her new book, "Peace Mom," local ABC affiliate KVUE-TV reported. The station's Web site provided no further details.

Warner Nixes 2008 Bid (RTD)

By JEFF E. SCHAPIRO

Richmond Times-Dispatch Warner, October 12, 2006

"While politically this appears to be the right time for me to take the plunge -- at this point, I want to have a real life." Former Gov. Mark R. Warner's decision not to run for president in 2008 scrambles politics in Virginia and beyond.

Warner's unexpected announcement yesterday could lead to a realignment of the Democratic presidential field, forcing moderates and Southerners to look elsewhere for an alternative to U.S. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, now considered the front-runner for the nomination.

It also could complicate Virginia politics. The popular Warner has made no secret of his interest in another term as governor. Should he seek the nomination in 2009, that could crowd a field that includes at least two prospects, both of whom badly lag behind Warner in name recognition and fund-raising ability.

House Democratic Caucus Chairman Brian J. Moran of Alexandria, who along with state Sen. R. Creigh Deeds of Bath is weighing a run for governor, said of Warner, "He'd be a wonderful governor if he chose to do that again."

Warner's decision, said Washington political analyst Stuart Rothenburg, "creates something of a vacuum" at the national level. Rothenburg said U.S. Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana could get a boost; so might the party's vice presidential nominee in 2004, former U.S. Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, as well as Govs. Bill Richardson of New Mexico and Tom Vilsack of Iowa.

Clinton, campaigning in Syracuse, N.Y., for a second Senate term, told The Associated Press she respects Warner's decision. She described it as "intensely personal," adding, "I hope we haven't seen the last of him in Democratic politics and on the national scene."

An enthusiastic all-but-official candidate for the White House since leaving Richmond nine months ago, Warner signaled that he also might consider the vice presidential nomination -- if offered -- or a U.S. Senate bid two years hence.

"It does not mean I'm not going to run for public office again," said Warner, who informed his staff of his decision at a 9 a.m. meeting yesterday but told some his closest allies in confidence earlier in the week.

Warner, a 51-year-old high-tech multimillionaire viewed by some handicappers as the Democrats' best chance for attracting Republican-leaning voters in the suburbs and the countryside, said his decision is personal, not political -- that he wants to spend more time with his wife, Lisa Collis, and their three daughters, one of whom is nearing college age.

"If I'm not ready to put everything on the back burner, everything else -- family, friends, any other interest of mine -- then you shouldn't take this next step," Warner, who left the governorship with a 70 percent approval rating, said at a hastily organized news conference at The Jefferson Hotel.

He said he finalized his decision during a Columbus Day weekend trip to his parents' home in Connecticut.

Though he described politics as a "body-contact sport," Warner said he was not withdrawing out of fear of heightened scrutiny of his private life, his marriage and vast business interests. Nor was he swayed, Warner said, by punishing news coverage of another Virginia presidential prospect, U.S. Sen. George Allen, amid continuing claims the Republican is insensitive to race and ethnicity issues.

Warner, seated at the head of a long table in a private dining room crowded with reporters, aides and supporters, insisted his decision and its timing were driven by concern for family and friends -- that he wanted to prevent further disruption of their lives.

"That's not the way I hope I treat people," said Warner.

Elected governor in 2001 on a pledge of bipartisanship, Warner suffered significant setbacks in the Republican-controlled General Assembly before winning over moderate GOP lawmakers in 2004 for a $1.4 billion tax increase for schools, police and social services.

The feat, while widely supported by Virginians, also solidified Warner's image as a common-sense centrist who could pull votes in regions long off-limits to national Democrats -- the South, Midwest and West.

However, Warner was reminded of the continuing muscle of his party's liberal core in August, when U.S. Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut lost a primary in large part because of his support of President Bush's Iraq policy. That development apparently forced Warner to step up his criticism of President Bush's Iraq policy.

Warner laced through his remarks yesterday occasional digs at Bush, depicting him as more interested in political polarization than practical solutions to such issues as terrorism, Iraq and energy.

Ray Buckley, vice chairman of the New Hampshire Democratic Party, said he believed Warner could have won the state's first-in-the-nation primary, which in 1992 revived the candidacy of another moderate Southern governor, Bill Clinton of Arkansas.

"Right from the beginning, he had a strong and early buzz," Buckley said of Warner. "He was able to maintain a steady, positive buzz, which is phenomenal."

Forgoing a challenge this year to Allen for the Senate, Warner launched a political action committee, ForwardTogether, that was widely seen as a first step toward a national candidacy. The PAC raised $9 million, of which more than $7 million was steered to state and federal Democratic candidates who share Warner's agenda.

ForwardTogether will remain in business, though Warner conceded its fundraising power will fade with his retreat from presidential politics.

Warner traveled extensively, visiting five countries and 28 states. His active schedule generated considerable media attention, including cover stories in Newsweek and The New York Times Magazine as well as national television and radio.

Following his news conference yesterday, Warner departed for Iowa, site of the first presidential caucuses. Next week, he visits California.

"It has been an extraordinary nine months," said Warner. "This is the right decision." But Warner later acknowledged that, given his emphasis on family considerations in bowing out for 2008, "I understand that folks in the political world will question it."

Warner said the exploratory phase of his presumed candidacy had been so disruptive that he was spending only one or two nights a week at home. Also, Warner said, he managed to attend only half of one game of his daughters' many soccer, tennis and field-hockey matches.

"This was my decision -- this was not Lisa and the girls asking me not to run," said Warner.

Warner Rules Out Run For White House In 2008 (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny And David Stout

DOJ_NMG_0080252

WASHINGTON, Oct. 12 — Former Gov. Mark Warner of Virginia, who has been traveling across the country for more than a year exploring a bid for the White House, said today that, after "a lot of reflection, prayer and soul-searching," he had decided not to seek the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008.

"I have decided not to run for president," Mr. Warner said in a statement, issued at a Richmond news conference, that immediately set off a scramble among other Democrats with presidential aspirations. He said his decision was based on family considerations, but he pointedly did not rule out another try for public office later on.

A centrist Democrat who has embraced some positions more commonly associated with Republicans, Mr. Warner has been widely regarded as an attractive presidential candidate, one who might run stronger in the South and other Republican regions than other Democrats. (For example, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, the 2004 Democratic nominee, did not carry any of the 11 states of the old Confederacy.)

Mr. Warner said the decision, which he described as one of the most difficult of his life, crystallized in the past several days.

"This past weekend, my family and I went to Connecticut to celebrate my dad's 81st birthday, and then we took my oldest daughter, Madison, to start looking at colleges," Mr. Warner said. "I know these moments are never going to come again. This weekend made clear what I'd been thinking about for many weeks — that while politically this appears to be the right time for me to take the plunge, at this point I want to have a real life."

Mr. Warner reached his final decision in the last 48 hours, according to two Democratic officials close to his political operation. He began alerting some of his top contributors on Wednesday evening and disclosed the news during a hastily-convened meeting with his staff today.

Mr. Warner, who finished his single term as Virginia governor in January, has spent the majority of his time since leaving office traveling to New Hampshire, Iowa and other key states in the presidential nomination process. His political action committee, Forward Together, was assembling the framework for a full-blown presidential campaign to be formed after the midterm elections. Mr. Warner had assembled a staff of 35 and raised close to $10 million.

"Everywhere I've traveled, I found hope that we could turn this country around," Mr. Warner said today. "That Americans are looking for leaders who at this moment of enormous challenge for our country can actually bring us together and get things done."

Mr. Warner said he was convinced that, regardless of the "depths of dismay" that he senses over the policies of President Bush, rank-and-file Democrats are energized as the elections approach. He said he would continue to work for James Webb, who is trying to unseat Senator George Allen of Virginia, the Republican incumbent.

As for the decision to remove himself from presidential politics, at least for the time being, one Democratic official friendly to Mr. Warner said: "He realized how hard this was going to be. He's a great general election candidate, but he thought he would have difficulty winning the primary."

Mr. Warner, 51, was seen as one of the leading alternatives to Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York. More than a half-dozen other Democrats are seriously considering jumping into the race, and Mr. Warner's decision touched off quick responses from top Democratic prospects and contributors. Senator Evan Bayh, a centrist from Indiana, cancelled a day of fund-raising in California to begin telephone calls in hopes of rounding up some of Mr. Warner's supporters and contributors.

Other Democrats who are regarded as likely candidates in 2008 include Senator Kerry; his running mate, former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina; Senators Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, Christopher Dodd of Connecticut and Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin, and Govs. Tom Vilsack of Iowa and Bill Richardson of New Mexico. Democrats speculated today that Mr. Warner's sudden departure could put new pressure on others who have so far resisted entering the race for 2008, in particular Senator Barack Obama of Illinois and former Vice President Al Gore.

The decision by Mr. Warner, party officials said, does not remove him from the short list for vice presidential running mates, regardless of who wins the Democratic presidential nomination. Nor, given his youth, does it rule out a future presidential run, although he indicated more interest today in perhaps running for the Senate or for governor again. In Virginia, the governor cannot serve consecutive terms, but there is nothing to prevent an ex-governor from running again.

Mr. Warner emphasized that he was not forgoing a White House bid because of pessimism about his chances. “I can say with complete conviction that, 15 months out from the first nomination contests, I feel we would have had as good a shot to be successful as any potential candidate in the field,” he said in Richmond.

In an interview later, he acknowledged that the wide-open state of the race was tempting. “It’s hard to figure out another time when there would be as good an opportunity as now,” he said.

“My decision does not in any way diminish my desire to be active in getting our country fixed,” Mr. Warner said. “It doesn’t mean that I won’t run for public office again.”

Mr. Warner first ran for office in 1996, losing to Senator John W. Warner, the Republican incumbent. (The two are not related.) Should Mr. Warner opt to run for the Senate, he might try for the seat now held by Mr. Warner, who will turn 80 in February and whose term (his fifth) is up in 2008.

In his 2001 campaign for governor, Mr. Warner opposed new gun-control laws and managed to persuade the National Rifle Association to remain neutral — in effect, a victory for a Democratic candidate, according to The Almanac of American Politics. He also called himself a “fiscal conservative” and pledged not to raise taxes. He stuck to that no-tax increase pledge until about halfway through his term, when the state’s fiscal realities compelled him to go along with some increases.

Mr. Warner has displayed the kind of entrepreneurial spirit that many Republicans revere. In the early years of the cell-phone industry, he assembled investor groups and packaged their cell-phone license applications in return for fees and ownership stakes. By 2001, his net worth was estimated at $200 million, according to the almanac.

Former Virginia Governor Won't Run For President In '08 (WVEC)

By Bob Lewis

AP Warner, No ’08 Bid, October 13, 2006

Former Gov. Mark R. Warner has decided not to run for president in 2008, saying he wanted "a real life" and feared the impact of a drawn-out campaign on his family.

"This is the right time for me in my life to have a life for a little while," Warner told reporters at a downtown Richmond hotel.

The Democrat, 51, would not rule out running for the Senate or seeking the governorship again; the state bars incumbents from seeking re-election. He also left open the possibility of a future presidential bid, but conceded: "Things will probably never be as aligned as they are right now."

Warner said he arrived at his decision over several weeks. He said neither his wife, Lisa Collis, nor his daughters, ages 12, 15 and 16, discouraged him from running. In a written statement, he said he made the decision after celebrating his father's 81st birthday and taking his oldest daughter on a college tour.

"I know these moments are never going to come again," Warner said. "This weekend made clear what I'd been thinking about for many weeks — that while politically this appears to be the right time for me to take the plunge, at this point I want to have a real life.

"And while the chance may never come again, I shouldn't move forward unless I'm willing to put everything else in my life on the back burner," he said.

Since Warner left the governor's office in January, he has busily toured key states in the Democratic nomination process, including New Hampshire and Iowa. His political action committee, Alexandria-based Forward Together, has raised money for Warner's exploratory effort and for other Democratic candidates in this year's midterm elections.

"This is not a choice that was made based on whether I would win or lose," Warner said in his statement. "I can say with complete conviction that 15 months out from the first nomination contests, I feel we would have had as good a shot to be successful as any potential candidate in the field."

Warner leaves a crowded field of possible Democratic candidates.

"He's obviously been thinking about it quite hard and concluded, as he said in his statement, that this wasn't the right time for him and his family," Clinton said while campaigning in Syracuse, N.Y. "He's been a tremendous public servant, and I hope we haven't seen the last of him in Democratic politics and on the national scene."

Warner, a centrist who had won in a Republican-leaning state, was seen as a viable Democratic alternative to Clinton. Just last week, Warner traveled to Florida, a critical battleground state, to raise money and help other Democrats. He talked about how his ability to work with Republicans could appeal to Democratic primary voters.

"We have to really get it right and getting it right will require big enough change that it can't be a Democrat-only answer or a Republican-only answer." Warner said. "I think people ... even though they are hardcore Democratic activists, get that."

During his tenure as governor, Warner's approval rating was in the mid-70s in a state that hasn't supported a Democratic presidential nominee since 1964. His lieutenant governor, Timothy M. Kaine, rode that popularity last year to replace Warner, who left because of the state's one-term limit.

Kaine, who learned of Warner's decision late Wednesday night, said he knew Warner had serious, personal reservations about running.

"I wasn't completely surprised ... when he told me. We had talked a little bit over a couple of months, and I knew he was very legitimately wrestling with that question and hadn't resolved it in his own mind," Kaine told reporters Thursday afternoon.

Warner could be considered for a vice presidential spot. Another possibility would be Sen. John Warner's seat in 2008. The five-term senator — no relation — is 79.

Mark Warner was elected governor in 2001, defeating Republican Attorney General Mark Earley. The former state Democratic Party chairman, who made a fortune in the infancy of the cellular telephone industry, had never held elected public office.

After a difficult start with a Republican-controlled General Assembly, Warner in 2004 brokered a compromise between Democrats, moderate senators and 17 House Republicans to pass a budget-balancing $1.4 billion tax increase. The tax increase was widely regarded as the signature initiative of his four-tear term.

Warner then returned to private business.

Warner Won't Make 2008 Run For President (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

RICHMOND, Oct. 12 -- Former Virginia governor Mark R. Warner unexpectedly announced Thursday that he will not seek the Democratic nomination for president in 2008, citing the personal toll a run for the White House would have on his family.

Before Thursday, all signs pointed to a Warner candidacy. His repeated trips to Iowa, New Hampshire and other states with early primaries were largely successful, as voters greeted him with interest. He had raised $9 million for his political action committee. And he was positioning himself as a moderate alternative to another potential candidate, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

But Warner said Thursday that he had decided in the past few days that a presidential campaign would interfere with his family life even as his eldest daughter is starting to look at colleges. He said he did not want to put his "real life" on hold for the next two years.

"This moment in life is not the right time for me," Warner, 51, told reporters at the Jefferson Hotel in Richmond. "When and where, I don't know right now. But I guarantee you'll see me. I'm not going away from being involved in how we get our government fixed."

Warner, a millionaire and a founder of Nextel (now Sprint Nextel), insisted that he was not running away from scandal. "Politics is a body contact sport at this point," Warner said. "But, no, that was not [a consideration]. I understand folks in the political world will question it."

Warner's announcement stunned a growing cadre of political consultants, donors and volunteers in Virginia and elsewhere who were convinced that he would soon reveal plans to compete for the Democratic nomination. Not long ago, it appeared that Virginia could have a presidential candidate from each major party. Now, Warner is out, and Sen. George Allen (R) is in a close reelection campaign, and questions of racial insensitivity may have damaged his presidential aspirations, according to many GOP analysts.

Warner, who has been grappling with the decision for weeks, said he made up his mind during a Columbus Day weekend with his wife, three daughters and 81-year-old father in Connecticut. But the timing -- Warner made another trip to Iowa on Thursday -- left everyone in his political orbit struggling to understand.

Advisers who were in his kitchen cabinet when he was governor were shocked by the decision during a conference call Wednesday night; they had been told initially that Warner wanted to discuss "strategy." Several of his staff at Forward Together, the political action committee that was being fashioned into a full-blown presidential campaign, burst into tears when he told them at 9 a.m. Thursday. Word of Warner's plans soon leaked out.

"Everyone's devastated," said John Graham, his chief operative in New Jersey. "Why would a person pull out this fast? Is there something we don't know? Maybe he's not ready emotionally. All I ever said to him was, 'You're running, right?' And he said, 'Yes, I am.' "

Virginia Republicans, too, said they were surprised. But the decision prompted a bit of quiet celebration among GOP leaders who had watched Warner capitalize on his state tenure to run for national office.

"I've never really understood where the substance was," said Del. M. Kirkland Cox (R-Colonial Heights), who battled Warner's successful 2004 plan to raise taxes to pay for a growing government. "He's a guy whose only real legacy was raising taxes."

Warner rejected the idea that he was afraid he would lose to Clinton or one of the other as-yet-unannounced Democrats who could contest the nomination.

"Things will probably never be as aligned as they are right now," said Warner, who left office in January. "I bring a real desire to learn. I think I bring a tremendous curiosity. I think I bring a willingness to acknowledge when I'm wrong. Those three traits alone make me different from [President Bush]. Whether I had the experience and preparation to take on this challenge and then this job, I feel absolutely confident."

But that confidence -- a trait that some called unshakeable during Warner's four years in Virginia's executive mansion -- was apparently not enough.

Warner said his wife, Lisa Collis, and daughters, Eliza, 12, Gillian, 15, and Madison, 16, were ready to support a White House run. But he said that his wife was never enthusiastic and that his children were "excited" when he made his final decision.

"Lisa went from negative to neutral," Warner said of his wife's attitude in the past year. "They would have been supportive. They did not ask me not to pursue this."

A Democratic nominee could still ask Warner to run for vice president. That happened to Walter F. Mondale, who dropped out of the 1976 contest and ended up as Jimmy Carter's vice president.

Warner could also run for his old job again. Virginia law does not allow sitting governors to run for reelection, but it does allow them to seek the office again after a four-year hiatus. Warner, who left office with record-high approval ratings, has said repeatedly that he might want the job back someday.

Warner's statement that he will consider elective office in the future also shook up Virginia politics even as the state is watching another battle between Allen and Democrat James Webb.

Democrats who have been taking the first steps toward running for the U.S. Senate in 2008 or the governorship in 2009 now have to contend with the possibility that Warner will want one of those two jobs.

"There is a potential gorilla in the race," said former lieutenant governor Donald S. Beyer (D), who served for a year as finance chief of a possible presidential bid by Warner.

Beyer, the owner of a chain of car dealerships in Northern Virginia, jokingly offered Warner a job as a mechanic if he needed one. But Beyer, a longtime friend, sounded weary and exasperated.

"All of us who were deeply and emotionally invested in him are very disappointed," Beyer said. "There's nobody in the United States better positioned to be president. But I think we all very much respected his desire to have a real life."

Warner's year-long dalliance with a run for the presidency has had its ups and downs.

Warner has been highly successful at fundraising, tapping into the venture capital community, in which he made his fortune, and topping most of the other Democratic hopefuls except Clinton. That ability helped propel him to the top of many lists of White House contenders in 2008.

His political action committee raised more than $9 million and distributed $7 million to candidates for federal and state office. It also paid for 67 trips to 28 states and five countries. His frequent trips to Iowa and New Hampshire were stirring curiosity among voters.

"We all believe that he was in a strong, strong position to be a very lead contender in winning the primary," said Ray Buckley, vice chair of the New Hampshire Democratic Party. "Often, somebody's hot one month, and then it's somebody else. For Warner to now have that buzz for 12 months was phenomenal."

But there have been difficulties as well. The New York Times Magazine put a tight, unflattering picture of Warner's face on the cover, prompting snickers. And national polls have consistently listed him as the choice of 1 or 2 percent of voters, indicating how far Warner would have to go to build recognition.

And despite Warner's belief that his brand of politics would appeal to the entire Democratic Party, pundits said his biggest challenge would be selling a moderate, bipartisan message to Democratic primary voters, especially at a time when Democrats are hungry to topple the party that will have been in power for eight years.

"I think he concluded that he couldn't win the Iowa caucuses," said one Democrat who declined to be named because he is supporting another Democratic presidential contender. "He wasn't getting any traction out there."

Geoff Garin, Warner's pollster, disputed that opinion. He said research and polling suggested that Democrats of all stripes were receptive to Warner's message.

"Every single political consideration would have had him running. There was an almost magical marriage here between the man and the moment," Garin said. "Even among those who dislike Bush the most, they want a candidate who is about hope for the future rather than just voicing their anger."

Why Did Mark Warner Quit? (TIME)

By James Carney

Time, October 13, 2006

Whenever a politician delivers an emotional speech announcing his withdrawal from the field of politics, and then cites as his reason a desire to spend more time with his family, it's a safe bet he's lying. Men who have spent years sacrificing family on the altar of ambition don't suddenly wake up one morning and decide they've had their priorities all wrong. The truth is usually elsewhere, and elsewhere is often a less than savory place.

But not always. When Mark Warner dropped out of the 2008 presidential race Thursday, the former Virginia governor shocked a lot of people, beginning with the many Democratic professionals and activists who fervently believed he would make both a strong candidate and a good president. "It's definitely a blow," says Jim Jordan, a Democratic operative who had signed on to help Warner's run for the White House. For Jordan, and others like him in both Washington and places like Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina, Warner's credentials as a popular former Democratic governor of a Republican state—and, prior to that, a hugely successful venture capitalist—made him the Democratic Party's best hope to capture independent and swing voters in a 2008 general election.

In the competition to be the un-Hillary, Warner had risen to the top. He was doing everything right as he positioned himself to run for the presidency— raising buckets of money for other Democrats, schmoozing activists in key primary states, winning lots of positive reviews in the press. Although the prospect of competing with Senator Clinton for the nomination is daunting for any Democratic candidate, Warner had firmly established himself as a top tier alternative. If anyone was in a position to topple Hillary, or to benefit if she chose not to run, it was Warner.

And yet he says he woke up Monday morning and decided he had his priorities all wrong. After a weekend that included celebrating his father's 81st birthday and touring colleges with the eldest of his three daughters, Warner began telling close staffers and supporters that he planned to drop out. "I know these moments are never going to come again," Warner said today.

"This weekend made clear what I'd been thinking about for many weeks—that while politically this appears to be the right time for me to take the plunge—at this point, I want to have a real life."

Perhaps there's a hidden truth that belies Warner's simple explanation a skeleton in a closet that was about to get the kind of rummaging that only a presidential campaign can bring. But the known evidence suggests he is being honest. Those close to him say that even though his wife and daughters were willing to support a presidential run, he felt guilty about missing so much of his children's lives for the sake of pursuing political office. A fiercely ambitious man, he discovered something he didn't expect when he asked himself how badly he wanted the ultimate prize: ambivalence.

Warner Bows Out Of White House Bid, Leaving Crowded Field Of Democrats (BG/AP)

By Liz Sidoti

The Boston Globe, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON --Mark Warner's decision Thursday to bow out of the early presidential race leaves a field still crowded with Democrats competing to be the most attractive alternative to front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Fifteen months before the first vote is cast in a presidential primary, the departure of the centrist Democrat and former Virginia governor alters the dynamics of a race still taking shape. The lineup for 2008, however, remains largely the same -- Clinton and about a dozen others.

"It's good for Hillary. Anytime a serious contender drops out that helps the front-runner," said Steve Elmendorf, the deputy campaign manager for Democrat John Kerry's 2004 presidential campaign. "Warner would have been, perhaps, the strongest, or certainly one of the strongest candidates, to become the anti-Hillary. This also will help somebody who's looking at that role."

Like several other Democrats, Warner maneuvered to become Clinton's strongest challenger and used his Forward Together committee to lay the groundwork for a presidential run after leaving the governor's office in January because of Virginia's one-term limit.

"I respect his decision. It's such an intensely personal decision," Clinton said in Syracuse, N.Y., during a campaign appearance for her 2006 Senate re-election race. "He's been a tremendous public servant, and I hope we haven't seen the last of him in Democratic politics and on the national scene."

Other rivals also offered similar praise. Warner's exit could help some distinguish themselves from the pack.

The field of centrist Democrats from Republican-held states has winnowed to Sen. Evan Bayh, a former Indiana governor, and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack. Former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, the Democrats' vice presidential candidate in 2004, now is the only Southerner left in the field.

Edwards, Vilsack and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson could be more attractive to voters looking for a candidate who works outside of Washington.

Others expected to run include Kerry, D-Mass., and Democratic Sens. Joe Biden of Delaware, Russ Feingold of Wisconsin, and Christopher Dodd of Connecticut.

It's also possible that Warner's exit could encourage more Democrats to jump into the mix, such as first-term Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill. His appearance in Iowa at an annual Democratic gathering last month stoked talk of a presidential run.

For much of the year, Warner has traveled the country to raise money for and campaign with the party's candidates in this fall's congressional election while determining whether to enter the race to succeed President Bush in 2008.

"This has been a remarkable journey and I've got no regrets at all," Warner said in Des Moines, Iowa. He attended a fundraiser for state legislative candidates just hours after announcing he would not run for president.

Considered a serious contender, Warner leaves behind what he called "a very strong field." He said he would endorse whoever gets the nomination and would not rule out endorsing a candidate before then.

"I will support them," Warner said. "At some point I may weigh in and get involved with one of these candidates. But that's a decision made far down the line for me."

The 51-year-old Southerner was well-received in visits to early primary states of Iowa and New Hampshire by Democrats hungry for a fresh face. A centrist Democrat, Warner had proven he could win in a Republican-leaning state. Also appealing to supporters was his skills as a campaigner, his ability to raise millions of dollars -- $9 million as of Aug. 31 -- and his leadership experience in both the private and public sectors.

"He fit the description of new blood, new energy," said Donna Brazile, who ran Democrat Al Gore's 2000 presidential campaign.

In the end, Warner exited the race even before he had officially entered it, fearing the impact of a full-blown campaign on his wife, Lisa Collis, and his daughters, age 12, 15 and 16. He made his final decision, he said, after taking a few days off to celebrate his father's 81st birthday and tour colleges with his eldest daughter.

"At this point, I want to have a real life," Warner said in a statement.

The Democrat could be considered for a vice presidential slot and would not rule out running for the Senate or seeking the governorship again, which is permitted under state law. He also left open the possibility of a future presidential bid but acknowledged to reporters in Virginia: "Things will probably never be as aligned as they are right now."

Bill Carrick, a Democratic strategist in California, said every candidate will now say my chances are better because there's one less serious contender.

"I also can't help but note that this is the second presidential candidate from Virginia to be eliminated this year -- one voluntarily, one involuntarily," Carrick said.

That was a reference to Republican Sen. George Allen. His presidential chances have all but disappeared as he fights to keep his political career alive after several missteps in his Senate re-election race.

Warner Will Not Run For President In '08 (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni And Seth McLaughlin

The Washington Times, October 13, 2006

Former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner yesterday stunned state and national Democrats when he announced he will not run for president in 2008 so he can spend more time with his family.

The one-time rising star of the Democratic Party had been exploring a White House bid since before he left office in January, making frequent visits to Iowa and New Hampshire and giving generously to national candidates.

Mr. Warner said "weeks of contemplation, soul-searching and an awful lot of prayer" convinced him the pressures of a national campaign weren't fair to his family -- wife Lisa Collis and daughters -- 12, 15 and 16. But he didn't rule out seeking the vice presidency two years from now, or running for governor again.

"While politically this is the right time, it's not the right time in my life," said Mr. Warner, 51. "I want to have a real life because these moments with my family won't come again."

"It came down to the fact that if I wasn't ready to put everything else in my life -- my family, my friends, any other interests -- on the back burner, then I shouldn't do this," he said.

The loss of a centrist Democrat from a southern state when former first lady Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton is the presumed 2008 front-runner throws a wrench into the presidential primary contest.

Bloggers and party activists worried the remaining contenders don't have a resume as impressive as Mr. Warner's that could beat Mrs. Clinton, a New York Democrat many call polarizing.

"All Democrats are jockeying for a single position -- to be the alternative to Hillary -- and Warner was the moderate alternative,"said Robert D. Holsworth, dean of the College of Humanities and Sciences at Virginia Commonwealth University. "This helps Hillary because it takes away a contender who was successful in the money race."

Known for his toothy grin and hands-on style, Mr. Warner had been telling his friends for months he still hadn't made a decision about 2008, despite his fundraising and organized campaign.

During a visit with his 81-year-old father in Connecticut last weekend, Mr. Warner toured colleges with his oldest daughter, and realized it was time to announce he won't embark on a presidential campaign.

Yesterday, Mr. Warner lamented that toward the end of his daughters' soccer, field hockey and tennis seasons, he has seen "half of one game." He has spent the year traveling the country, with 86 events in 25 states.

Mr. Warner's political action committee, Forward Together, raised $9 million this year, more than any other federal PAC. He gave $7.3 million this year to candidates nationwide.

Mr. Warner said yesterday he has "complete conviction" he "would have had as good a shot to be successful as any potential candidate in the field."

The blogs exploded with the news, and some pondered whether Mr. Warner had cut a deal with Mrs. Clinton to become her running mate. Others wondered if there was a scandal brewing, a theory Mr. Warner quickly squashed.

Mr. Warner wasn't shy about his interest in the U.S. Senate seat held by Republican Sen. John W. Warner, who is likely to retire in 2008. "I have a lot of public service left in me; what form that takes, time will tell," he said.

Mr. Warner, who left the governor's office with a nearly 80 percent popularity rating, also could decide to run for the state's top office again in 2009. Virginia law bars chief executives from seeking consecutive terms.

Mr. Warner's 2001 election in a heavily Republican state gave national Democrats hope in the South, wooing rural voters with a bluegrass campaign tune and a NASCAR sponsorship.

Despite pushing a $1.38 billion tax package through Virginia's Republican-controlled legislature in 2004, Mr. Warner's popularity skyrocketed. That year, he was considered as a vice-presidential contender.

He further bolstered his credentials when he helped his lieutenant governor, Democrat Timothy M. Kaine, win the governor's race last fall. At the end of last year, Mr. Warner officially began work on his PAC at a gala in Tysons Corner.

Yesterday's announcement shocked some of his confidants and staff, several of whom were visibly shaken at the PAC's headquarters in Old Town Alexandria. The PAC will continue through the Nov. 7 elections, sources said.

Mr. Warner also kept plans to campaign for a Democratic candidate in Iowa, and next week will campaign in Virginia with James H. Webb Jr., the Democratic nominee for U.S. Senate.

Delegate Brian J. Moran said he was disappointed with the decision because Mr. Warner had an attractive record. "He would have made a great president," the Alexandria Democrat said.

A former telecommunications executive and millionaire, Mr. Warner ran a campaign known for innovation. When a cell phone interrupted his campaign speeches he would smile and say, "You hear an annoying ring, I hear ka-ching, ka-ching."

He often brought crowds to their feet with his talk of centrist politics and the importance of global competitiveness. He also was known to unwind with a martini after campaign events, rolling up his sleeves and talking strategy.

Warner's Exit A Boon For Clinton '08 Rivals (NSDY)

By Glenn Thrush

Long Island Newsday, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner had been touted to be the moderate "anti-Hillary" candidate in the 2008 Democratic presidential mix, but now his stunning exit has created an opening for another would-be Clinton-slayer: John Edwards.

After raising $9 million and assembling a campaign team, Warner called it all off in Richmond Thursday, telling reporters he needed to spend more time with his family. "While politically this appears to be the right time for me to take the plunge, at this point I want to have a real life," he said.

On its surface, Warner's departure helps Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, who won't have to face an indefatigably upbeat Red-state centrist millionaire who isn't nearly as polarizing as the former first lady.

But his exit may be an even bigger boon to 2004 vice presidential candidate John Edwards, even though the former North Carolina senator is more liberal than Warner.

Edwards was the big winner when the Democratic National Committee voted to squeeze the Nevada caucuses into the January 2008 primary calendar between the Iowa caucuses and the New Hampshire primary. The former North Carolina senator, who is running strongly in early Iowa polls, has the inside track on Las Vegas hotel and food service union endorsements, giving him a chance in Nevada despite Clinton's juggernaut fundraising operation.

"Mark Warner's departure confirms John Edwards as the most credible candidate to challenge Sen. Clinton," said Leo Hindery, a top New York City donor who backed Edwards in 2004. "The combination of his strength in the early primaries, plus Mark Warner stepping aside really changes things."

Another beneficiary of Warner's decision is Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, a moderate whose views are closer to Warner's. "Bayh is the best positioned to inherit the Warner support because he's the closest thing to a centrist in the field," said Larry Sabato, a politics professor at the University of Virginia who follows Warner's career closely. "Edwards isn't a moderate. He's been running on poverty and left-wing issues."

But the big winner in 2008 just might be Mark Warner himself. By pulling out of a race he might have lost anyway, Warner is positioning himself as the perfect vice presidential pick, regardless who wins the Democratic nomination.

"He was always a better vice presidential candidate anyway. ... He's a bridgehead to the South," said University of Maryland political science professor Ronald Walters, a former Democratic operative. "He can give them some hope of winning Virginia, which no one else could do."

Democrat Mark Warner To Skip '08 White House Race (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — Former Virginia governor Mark Warner's surprise decision Thursday to skip the 2008 presidential race opened opportunities for several Democratic prospects angling for the same red-state niche.

Warner, who has three daughters ages 12 to 16, said family considerations drove his decision. The time for a presidential run seemed right politically, he said in a letter to supporters, but "at this point, I want to have a real life."

By his own account, Warner made 67 trips to 28 states and five foreign countries as he explored the race. He headlined 86 events in 25 states to help his party and its candidates and raised or contributed $7.3 million for 2006 campaigns. He repeatedly visited Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina, states that lead off the nominating process. He even rated a cover story in The New York Times' Sunday magazine.

Kathy Sullivan, chairwoman of the Democratic Party in New Hampshire, said "there was a lot of interest" in Warner because he had been a successful, centrist governor in a conservative state and was perceived as electable nationally.

She said his exit probably would help Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, a moderate ex-governor, "more than anybody." Former North Carolina senator John Edwards, the party's 2004 vice presidential nominee, could also benefit, Sullivan said. Like Virginia, their states usually back Republicans for president.

Bayh was on the phone Thursday courting Warner supporters, spokesman Dan Pfeiffer said. The pre-eminence of New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, the strongest Democratic prospect as measured in polls and fundraising, was a formidable challenge for Warner and remains one for Bayh and the rest of the field.

Warner said his decision "doesn't mean that I won't run for public office again." He could end up as the 2008 vice presidential nominee. Other options include a Senate run in 2008, when GOP Sen. John Warner's term ends, or another bid for governor in 2009. Mark Warner had high ratings when he left office in January, but under state law could not run for a second consecutive term.

Gov. Tim Kaine, who served as Warner's lieutenant governor and has known him since law school 25 years ago, said Warner expressed his concerns about the demands of a national campaign on "Good Friday in Richmond and we've talked about it since. I knew he was wrestling with this."

Warner said he spent last weekend celebrating his father's 81st birthday and taking his oldest daughter to look at colleges. "I know these moments are never going to come again," he said.

Democrats Work To Fill Ideological, Electoral Void (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

DOJ_NMG_0080261

Former Virginia governor Mark R. Warner's decision to bow out of the 2008 Democratic presidential race yesterday left the remaining candidates scrambling to fill the ideological and electoral void left by the candidate long considered a leading alternative to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential bid.

The most obvious Democrat to benefit from Warner's surprise announcement, in the view of many party strategists, is Sen. Evan Bayh (Ind.). He cleared his schedule yesterday to make phone calls to donors and party activists who had tentatively signed on with Warner for 2008 and are now free agents.

Warner's anticipated campaign was to be built around the notion that in an age of polarized politics, many voters are eager for a leader focused on reaching across partisan barriers for solutions to big problems. The former technology executive talked often about his experience in Virginia; he had won a state where Republicans had easily won the governorship in the previous two elections and went on to persuade the GOP-controlled legislature to pass a tax increase he called necessary to the financial solvency of the commonwealth.

That rÃ©sumÃ© -- coupled with his personal wealth -- had elevated him as a preferred choice among many Democrats who believe that Clinton (N.Y.) will not be electable in 2008.

"This is disheartening information to Hillary-alternative Democrats," said Thomas F. Schaller, a professor of political science at the University of Maryland at Baltimore County.

Some party strategists suggested that the greatest opportunity for a Democrat seeking to be the anti-Clinton alternative will -- unlike Warner's canceled candidacy -- emerge on the ideological left.

"I just don't think there is any oxygen in this race for the space that Warner was looking to occupy -- that being the moderate, establishment, electable, successful, business-entrepreneur-turned-one-term governor," said Chris Lehane, an experienced Democratic operative.

Clinton has carefully hewed to the ideological center in her six-year Senate career, building a record of working across party barriers. Her positioning is not without risk, however, as exemplified by the resentment toward her among many activists in the party's liberal wing because of her 2002 vote supporting the Iraq war and her unwillingness to set a date for withdrawal of troops.

"The bulk of the people running are going to run to the left of her, not the center," said Douglas Sosnik, a former Clinton White House aide and a personal adviser to Warner.

If Warner's decision shifts the 2008 center of gravity leftward, the candidate best positioned to capitalize on the change may be former senator John Edwards (N.C.), the Democratic vice presidential nominee in 2004. Since leaving the Senate at the end of that year, Edwards has apologized for his 2002 vote authorizing President Bush to use force in Iraq and he has called for the immediate withdrawal of U.S. forces. He has also courted organized labor, which remains a key Democratic constituency in nomination contests.

Other names touted as potential liberal alternatives include Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.), who recently made his first visit to Iowa, and former vice president Al Gore.

Many within Warner's own inner circle, however, believe that his message of centrist politics leaves a void for someone with a similar philosophy.

"People responded to his leadership style. This was a different way to think about leadership," said Monica Dixon, the head of Warner's Forward Together PAC and one of his leading campaign strategists.

On paper, Bayh most closely resembles Warner in both ideological profile and governing style. Both are former governors of Republican-leaning states who have spent much of their time in office working with members of the rival party to provide solutions.

In nearly every speech, Bayh emphasizes that he was twice elected governor of Indiana before being elected -- and reelected to the Senate. The not-so-subtle message of those speeches is that Bayh represents his party's best chance of being competitive in Republican-leaning states.

Seeking to quickly capitalize on Warner's decision, Bayh spent the day reaching out to jilted Warner backers -- making the argument that his campaign is a natural landing spot for them. In a statement released yesterday Bayh praised Warner as "an exceptional public servant, a great leader, and an influential voice in the Democratic Party."

Outgoing Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson are also positioning themselves as moderates in the 2008 field. They gain some residual benefit from a Warner-less field, said party strategists not aligned with either candidate.

"Primary voters are all handicappers," said Matt Bennett, co-founder of Third Way, a group of moderate Democrats. "They try to pick the guy who can win."

2008 Race Just Got Hazier For Democrats (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — In a surprise decision that reconfigures the race for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner announced Thursday that he would not run, saying he was unwilling to put his family second to a presidential campaign.

Warner, a centrist Democrat from a Republican-leaning Southern state, was considered by many Democratic strategists to be the strongest potential rival to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), the early front-runner for the nomination.

His decision opens the field for other candidates hoping to present themselves as centrists, including Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.), Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson.

"The great dynamic in this race is: Who are the one or two others in the pack who can break out and challenge Sen. Clinton?" said Simon Rosenberg, founder of the New Democrat Network, an organization that promotes progressive candidates.

"This benefits all the people who are going to be challenging Hillary."

Warner's stature among Democrats was based less on his nationwide visibility — he polled in the single digits — but more on the centrist record he built as governor.

He left office earlier this year with high approval ratings from Democrats and Republicans.

"The idea [is] that the way that Democrats win the White House is to nominate somebody who has won election in a red state," said Jennifer Duffy, a political analyst at the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. "He had a very successful term. He had a lot to brag about."

Warner dismissed speculation that his decision was based on any liabilities he would have had as a candidate.

"I can say with complete conviction, 15 months out from the first nominating process, I think I would have as good a shot as any of the potential candidates in the field," he told reporters in Richmond, Va.

Instead, Warner, 51, said that after four years of putting his personal life on hold as governor, he wanted to spend more time with his three teenage daughters.

"While politically this appears to be the right time for me to take the plunge, at this point I want to have a real life," Warner said. "And while the chance may never come again, I shouldn't move forward unless I'm willing to put everything else in my life on the back burner."

The announcement surprised many Democrats because Warner had been working assiduously since he left office to build a campaign war chest and political organization.

He had raised more than $9 million and made repeated trips to Iowa and New Hampshire, whose nominating contests are crucial for presidential runs.

Traditionally, the presidential election cycle does not begin until after the midterm election, which is Nov. 7 this year.

Unofficially, Democrats and Republicans have been working at least since the 2004 election to get ready for the 2008 race, when the presidency will be up for grabs.

Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, Massachusetts Sen. John F. Kerry and Wisconsin Sen. Russell D. Feingold are promoting themselves as more liberal alternatives to Clinton.

Also laying the groundwork for presidential runs are Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut. And some party activists are hoping that former Vice President Al Gore and Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois decide to make a run for the White House.

Some Democratic strategists worry about Clinton as a candidate, in part because her time as first lady made her a polarizing figure. That has focused attention on less well-known Democrats, particularly the moderates.

"The center of the race is now less crowded," said a senior advisor to one of the other Democratic contenders, who spoke on condition of anonymity while discussing campaign strategy. "We have opportunities today that we did not have yesterday."

Notably, Warner did not rule out running again for public office and indicated he would be willing to consider running for vice president, senator or even governor again. Warner had been barred from seeking reelection because Virginia does not allow its governors to hold consecutive terms.

"Listen," he said, "when and where, I don't know right now, but I can guarantee you'll see I'm not going away from being involved in how we get our country fixed."

Warner, who was always devoted to politics, made a fortune as a pioneer in the cellphone industry before he became a venture capitalist.

He has used his money to bankroll his campaigns, including a failed 1996 challenge to Sen. John Warner (R-Va.) and his successful run for governor in 2001.

Friends and colleagues have said that he went into business in large part to finance his political career, and most think it's not over.

"This is a formidable competitor choosing to walk off the field. And it's disappointing to people who were working for him," said Kenneth Baer, who had been working as a speechwriter and advisor to Warner. "But he's 51 years old. There's a lot of time."

Poll: McCain, Hillary Clinton Popular Choices For President (NSDY)

Newsday, October 12, 2006

DURHAM, N.H. -- A poll released Thursday indicates that John McCain and Hillary Clinton are the early front-runners in New Hampshire for their parties' nomination for president in 2008.

A total of 515 likely voters were asked about 20 potential presidential candidates in the latest Granite State Poll conducted by the University of New Hampshire Survey Center for WMUR-TV.

The largest group of New Hampshire Republicans is supporting McCain, with 32 percent. Former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani is next with 19 percent, followed by Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, with 15 percent. Ten percent said they would vote for Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. Two percent favor some other candidate and 14 percent are undecided.

Among the less popular potential candidates are Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, Virginia Sen. George Allen, Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum and New York Gov. George Pataki.

Among Democrats, Clinton was the favorite, with 30 percent choosing her. John Edwards is next with 16 percent, and Al Gore is at 10 percent. Sen. John Kerry is the choice of 9 percent of Democrats.

Among the less popular choices are Delaware Sen. Joe Biden, retired Gen. Wesley Clark, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, and former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner, who announced Thursday that he doesn't plan to run. Four percent prefer some other candidate and 17 percent are undecided.

"It's the first time since 1952 that there's not been an incumbent president or vice president on the ticket, so that means it's wide open," said Andy Smith of the UNH Survey Center.

Those polled also were asked which candidates they liked the least. Among potential Democratic candidates, Hillary Clinton was the least liked by 35 percent of all of the likely voters in both parties, followed by Kerry, Gore, Clark and Edwards. Jeb Bush was least liked by all likely primary voters, followed by McCain, Romney, Rice and Tennessee Sen. Bill Frist.

Democrats said their least liked candidate was Kerry, followed by Gore and then Clinton. Even though they'd vote for him, Republicans said the least popular potential candidate was McCain, followed by Bush, Romney and Pataki.

"What we're seeing right now is name recognition and overall popularity of these candidates based on name recognition," Smith said.

When asked about candidates in the other party, 54 percent of Republicans said their least favorite candidate was Clinton, and 33 percent of Democrats called Bush the most unpopular potential candidate.

Included in the poll were 205 likely Democratic voters in 2008, and 206 likely Republican voters. The sampling margin of error was plus or minus 6.8 percentage points for both groups; it was plus or minus 4.3 percentage points for the total. The poll was conducted by phone between Sept. 15 and Sept. 24.

Mass. Governor Hires Jeb Bush Aide For '08 Bid (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — With the Republican Party's conservatives lacking a favorite candidate for the 2008 presidential race, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney has hired a strategist who might help him win their favor.

Sally Bradshaw, a longtime political advisor and confidante to Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, confirmed Thursday that she has signed on as a consultant to Romney's political action committee.

Known in Florida circles as Jeb Bush's equivalent to President Bush's Karl Rove, Bradshaw will advise the Romney campaign on navigating the complicated political contours of the most populous battleground state. But more important in the context of what is likely to be a competitive GOP primary, Bradshaw's presence helps Romney shore up his credentials with conservatives who view the Florida governor as one of their favorite Republicans.

Jeb Bush, despite his brother's sagging popularity, is admired by social conservatives for his support of private school vouchers and his involvement in the Terri Schiavo right-to-die case.

In his quest to win support from increasingly important evangelical voters, Romney, a Mormon who was elected in one of the nation's most liberal states, has disavowed statements supporting abortion rights

Bradshaw's decision to work for Romney also confirms that the Florida governor, who is prevented by term limits from seeking reelection, is not planning his own White House bid for 2008.

"It should be no surprise that I am not running for president," Bush wrote in an e-mail late Thursday. "After all, that is what I have told you and others in the press for a long time."

Bradshaw said Thursday that Bush encouraged her to consider working for Romney, who will appear with the governor next week in Florida at several campaign events.

Bradshaw's Florida connections could also prove useful for Romney if that state's GOP-led Legislature proceeds with plans to move up the date of the state's presidential primary. The new House speaker is pushing a bill that would schedule the election immediately after New Hampshire's first-in-the-nation primary.

Other major GOP candidates have sought advice from Jeb Bush, including Arizona Sen. John McCain, who flew to Tallahassee late last year for a private meeting.

Bush said Thursday that he is not supporting any candidates, but said Romney would be "formidable" if he runs.

Nevada Feeling Political Glow Of '08 Spotlight (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

LAS VEGAS — No longer is it, "Um, Dina who?"

The name of the Democratic candidate for governor here, Dina Titus, is tattooed on the brain of most every Democrat who wants to be president, because of Nevada's newly vaunted position in the 2008 election calendar.

Since Democrats moved the caucus here smack between the Iowa caucus, the first contest of the year, and the New Hampshire primary, Ms. Titus has worked the fund-raising circuit with Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico and Senators Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin and John Kerry of Massachusetts and former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina. Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Evan Bayh of Indiana and Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa are on their way.

"They raise money for me, and I get them face time," said Ms. Titus, a little-known state lawmaker who has leveraged the attention into a suddenly competitive race against Representative Jim Gibbons, the Republican candidate for governor.

The decision this summer to move the Nevada caucus has infuriated Democratic officials from Iowa and New Hampshire, accustomed to being the electoral prom queens of the primary season, who have been criticizing Nevada's low turnout in elections and questioning the state's ability to pull off the complex process of a high-profile caucus.

The jokes about strippers in the union halls and caucusing over the craps tables are presumably being written now.

DOJ_NMG_0080265

"I met folks from Nevada before," said Gordon R. Fischer, the immediate past chairman of the Iowa Democratic Party. "It seems like a nice group of people. But I don't think you can overestimate the amount of work that goes into this. I think it is bad, with all due respect. I think it is bad for the Democratic Party and bad for the country."

Nevadans, not surprisingly, reject this idea.

"We're not talking about figuring out the DNA strand here," said Jon Ralston, Nevada's most respected and widely quoted political reporter, who said he had already identified the state's biggest winner: "Me!"

How Nevada changes the calculation for Democratic contenders is a matter of debate within incipient campaigns, a sort of election wild card. And even as they zip off to the state to appear at fund-raisers, most potential candidates do not want to discuss the issue, partly out of fear of alienating New Hampshire.

Interview requests to the offices of the Democrats were greeted with initial cheer, but the responses became mostly frosty when the subject of the Nevada caucus surfaced.

Senator Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut was an exception.

"There is a healthy quality to this because you're going to have to be more places," Mr. Dodd said in a telephone interview. "It is true I would not be normally going to Nevada this time of year. It changes the amount of time I spend in the state. I think the country benefits from that."

Smarting from losses in the West in 2004 and looking to gain momentum among Hispanic, exurban, union and other Western voters, the party has calculated that Nevada is the perfect swing-state entree into the 2008 campaign. It also bumped up South Carolina's primary.

For Nevada Democrats, the January caucus will seal their state's importance in national politics.

They point to Las Vegas, the nation's fastest-growing big city, the booming number of Hispanic residents and the local issues that differ from those in other states to underscore why their time has come.

Still, Nevada is not entirely ready to answer questions about logistics.

"I haven't even thought of that," said D. Taylor, secretary of the Culinary Workers Union of Nevada, which lobbied to move up the caucus. "Right now we're focused on a minimum wage bill that comes up in November."

Although Nevada has held a presidential caucus for 40 years, the scope of this event will be well beyond any of those. In 2004, 9,000 people came out to caucus here; 125,000 caucused in Iowa that year.

In previous caucuses, Nevada has set up one location in each of its 17 counties; in 2008, party officials are aiming for 1,000 sites statewide. The Nevada Democratic Party anticipates spending $1 million to train people and publicize the race. "Obviously the process isn't easy," said Kirsten Searer, the state party spokeswoman.

And how, Iowa caucus veterans say.

"It absolutely takes a tremendous amount of money, knowledge and organization to pull off a caucus," Mr. Fischer said. "We have nearly 2,000 precincts in the state of Iowa, and I compared it to planning 2,000 weddings that all go off at the same time."

Unlike primaries, caucuses have myriad built-in impediments to their own success. The first is simply getting people to show up, because going to a caucus takes more time and energy. Precinct captains, some of whom in Iowa have been playing their role for decades, must be trained. Coordinating the reporting of results, perhaps the key component, can be turbid.

"You have to go with your neighbors and publicly declare your support of a candidate, and that can take a couple hours or more to complete," Mr. Fischer explained. "You need a public meeting place, you need to get packets of information to all the precinct captains, who need to be trained in caucus procedures — there is math involved.

"Then, the hardest thing of all is reporting results. There have to be layers of security to make sure they are reporting accurately and timely. You can't have some that report right away and others that wait until 3 a.m."

Unlike the well-trodden coffee shops in Iowa and New Hampshire where candidates awkwardly tossing pancakes are as essential to winter as snowplows and mincemeat pies, Nevada is still puzzling out its pit stops.

Bagel Mania in downtown Las Vegas, a favored spot among power brokers, is in the running. But is it a good place to spot likely Democratic voters? "Absolutely not," said Evan Garfinkel, the restaurant's assistant manager, noting the clientele's conservative leanings. But Mr. Garfinkel anticipates serving the candidates scores of corned beef sandwiches nonetheless.

Nevada officials see their caucus as a chance to showcase issues — growth and water use in particular — that have often been ignored in primaries.

"So much a part of life in the Southwest are overcrowded schools, sitting in traffic, a lack of fire stations and libraries," said Ms. Titus, the candidate for governor, in an interview here. With Hispanics now making up 10 percent of all voters, immigration issues are also expected to be important.

New Hampshire is less than enthused with Nevada's new status. Its officials argue that Nevada's low turnout — its 2004 primary, the state's contest for nonpresidential races, attracted 29 percent of registered voters — and the fact that Nevadans are unschooled in big caucuses are reasons enough to try moving up New Hampshire's date. The Democratic National Committee said it would punish any candidates who participate in a state that violates the official schedule by denying them delegates.

Here is the recent editorial take of one New Hampshire newspaper, The Portsmouth Herald: "What makes more sense — to have a racially diverse population that is not engaged in the political process or to have a predominantly white population that is politically involved and active?" The choice of Nevada, the editorial said, stemmed from "maneuvering by Nevada Senator Harry Reid and the influence of big Las Vegas gambling money on the process."

But national party officials remain confident in their choice.

"Nevada had all those magic things in terms of being a Western state, having a large Hispanic population, a large Asian population and a labor population," said Stacie Paxton, a Democratic National Committee spokeswoman. "We will work with officials from the state party to make sure they are ready to have a successful caucus."

Meanwhile, Democratic attention remains fixed on Ms. Titus. A professor at the University of Nevada and the minority leader in the State Senate, she is battling for the governor's office against Mr. Gibbons, a congressman with deep pockets, longstanding ties to the gambling industry and a lead in the polls.

The attention from national candidates has raised Ms. Titus's profile, garnered free publicity and energized her base. And as Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware tells it, Nevada's caucus rivals are no worse for it.

"I plan on going back out to campaign for Democratic candidates the last couple weeks in October," said Mr. Biden, who has already made one trip to Nevada. "I don't think Iowa or New Hampshire should feel threatened by it."

Arnold Swaps Agendas For Political Resurgence (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, October 13, 2006

LOS ANGELES — Last year, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger looked very much like the Republican he is: He waded into confrontations with the Democratic Legislature and unions of public employees. He proposed caps on state spending and eliminating legislators' long-lasting power to design their districts.

This year, Schwarzenegger has all but become a Democrat. Reversing course after his popularity rating sank to 37%, he joined Democrats in placing proposals on the Nov. 7 ballot to borrow a record $37.3 billion for highways, schools and levees. And he signed a law that made California the first state to try to reduce global warming by forcing industries to cut "greenhouse gas" emissions.

"Last year, he took every one of his moves out of the Republican playbook," says Fabian Núñez, Democratic speaker of the state Assembly. "It was an unsuccessful attempt to make a Democratic state a Republican state. Now he has surrounded himself with people who have encouraged him to wrap himself around the Democratic flag, and it has worked."

Judging from lopsided polling figures, Schwarzenegger is cruising toward election to a second term next month with the panache he exudes at the handlebars of his Harley-Davidson.

Schwarzenegger, elected in 2003 to replace recalled Democrat Gray Davis, holds a 17-point lead in statewide polls over state Treasurer Phil Angelides, 53, the Democratic challenger. The former Hollywood action star had a job-approval rating of 56% in a Los Angeles Times Poll published Oct. 1.

"You rarely see in politics anybody come up from where the governor was," says Mark Baldassare, polling director of the Public Policy Institute of California. "It's a lot easier for voters to lose faith than to regain faith in their leaders."

This year's self-reversal exemplifies the central political mystery of Arnold Schwarzenegger: continual change that has kept voters and politicians guessing whether the Austrian-born, self-made megamillionaire is at heart a Republican, a Democrat or a combination of the two.

In 2004, Schwarzenegger made a last-minute campaign stop with President Bush in crucial Ohio, where the governor runs an annual bodybuilding exposition. This year, he stays out of photo range of Bush, ducking the president's fundraising trips to California.

"I've worked with the governor for three years now, and I still don't know what his values are," says political foe Barbara Kerr, president of the 340,000-member California Teachers Association, who led the successful campaign against the governor's 2005 ballot propositions. "It's very confusing. We just don't know who we're going to see next."

As a Republican in a heavily Democratic state, Schwarzenegger, 59, has clearly abandoned the hard-edged conservatism of 2005. He's managed to re-establish the moderate image that catapulted him to Sacramento after his surprise announcement of candidacy on The Tonight Show, with Jay Leno, in 2003.

He appeared with Leno again Wednesday and joked that political ads linking him to Bush are as silly as "linking me to an Oscar." The Angelides campaign asked NBC for equal time.

Schwarzenegger originally ran as a business-oriented Republican who could make Sacramento's deficit-plagued government work. Yet he favored abortion rights, gay rights, gun control and expanded environmental protection — issues not embraced by more conservative Republicans.

Barely more than half his appointments to state jobs have been Republicans. Half of his judicial appointments are Democrats or independents.

Within a few months of taking office, however, the governor yawed from bipartisan deficit-cutting agreements to ridiculing the Democrats who control the Legislature as "girlie men" and bashing unions of teachers and nurses.

This year, he again has reached out to top Democrats. Together, they chalked up a slate of legislative successes that Schwarzenegger touts in his campaign.

"Who can you trust to do the right thing?" Angelides said Saturday in the only televised debate with the governor. "For three years, Arnold Schwarzenegger was very consistent. Only in the last 60 days, as he sought to save his own job, has he tried to move to the middle."

Squaring his epic shoulders against dramatic backdrops — a Malibu beach, the San Francisco skyline — the governor has signed legislation committing California to reduce emissions of carbon monoxide and other greenhouse gases 25% by 2020; raising the state minimum wage from $6.75 to $8 an hour and pressuring drugmakers to lower prices of prescription medicines for families earning less than $60,000 a year.

"As people watched him work with opposite numbers in the Legislature, people say, 'Yeah, this is the guy we voted for in the recall. The governor of last year wasn't that guy,' " says Matthew Dowd, the governor's chief campaign strategist.

Jack Pitney, a government professor at Claremont McKenna College in Claremont, Calif., says: "The classic question in politics is: What have you done for me lately? And Schwarzenegger has done quite a lot lately."

Some of the twists and turns that make Schwarzenegger so hard to pinpoint:

•In the special election he called last November, voters defeated a proposal that would have made it tougher for teachers, police, nurses and firefighters to use union dues for political contributions. Also rejected were measures to give the governor more say over spending, to strip legislators of power to map their districts and to fire teachers more easily.

Unions spent $100 million and humbled Schwarzenegger, defeating all his initiatives. The unions are still so angry that they are airing TV ads against his re-election.

The special election was unpopular not only because Schwarzenegger wanted the measures passed, but also because of the expense of holding a fourth election in just over two years.

The defeat on last year's ballot measures deprived Schwarzenegger of the club he had held over legislators' heads: the threat to go directly to the people if the Legislature didn't do his bidding. "In 2005 he decided he was so popular that he could go off on his own and could get things passed by the ballot initiative," Baldassare says. "He didn't need the Legislature. Now he does."

Schwarzenegger has expressed contrition since that November night. “The people sent a message loud and clear,” he said in the debate with Angelides. “And that message was, ‘Don't come to us for every little thing. Go to the legislators. You guys work it out.' ”

•Within days of the November debacle, Schwarzenegger purged his staff. He started by replacing a Republican chief of staff with Susan Kennedy, a Democrat and former aide to Davis. The move enraged conservative GOP activists.

Núñez says the governor made the staff changes on the advice of his wife, Maria Shriver, a Democrat of the Kennedy family dynasty.

“She's obviously a very, very important adviser for the governor,” Dowd says. “She's as smart as anyone. She has a network of people she talks to. She provides advice, suggestions.”

•Schwarzenegger named more Democrats to his Cabinet and hired Republican strategists from Bush's 2004 campaign, including Dowd and campaign manager Steve Schmidt. The odd team of pragmatists meshes well, Dowd says.

•An improving economy pushed a $7.5 billion windfall into the treasury, enabling Schwarzenegger to restore $3 billion he'd cut from school funding in previous years. A budget deficit of $16.5 billion when he took office is down to $3.5 billion, he said in the debate.

•Schwarzenegger has raised $41.3 million this year for his campaign, nearly doubling Angelides' $23.2 million. The governor's fundraising from oil, tobacco, real estate and other industries has given Angelides ammunition to charge that the governor has violated a recall-campaign pledge to end the influence of “special interests.”

•After he abruptly switched to embracing a Democratic agenda he had battled for three years, the California Chamber of Commerce, a longtime business ally, opposed Schwarzenegger over the global warming law. The chamber has endorsed his re-election, anyway.

While Schwarzenegger schmoozed with Democrats, he ignored the Legislature's Republican minority this year. “While we were disappointed, there were no real surprises,” Senate Republican leader Dick Ackerman says. “When he ran in the recall election, we knew he was going to be a moderate Republican.”

Núñez and other Democrats say they are ambivalent about handing Schwarzenegger accomplishments that have blocked Angelides' headway on minimum wage and other issues. Democrats had little choice but to help the governor: The Legislature's approval ratings were even lower than Schwarzenegger's.

“Do I go out and stall any effort to advance my own agenda, which is very self-defeating?” Núñez says. “The governor has been able to benefit from that cooperation. But it is a political year. We also want a Democrat elected governor. And it puts us in sort of a quagmire.”

Angelides' commercials replay Schwarzenegger with Bush in Ohio to rouse the Democratic base. These days, though, Schwarzenegger's positions oppose Bush on global warming, stem-cell research and other issues.

All of this inconsistency opens Schwarzenegger to charges that he's a flip-flopper. Schwarzenegger's shifts haven't hurt him so far. “One does have to remember at all times that he is an actor,” says Kerr of the teachers union. “And people have short memories. He did apologize and appear very sincere. He is a very good actor.”

Attempts to link Schwarzenegger with Bush haven't registered in Angelides' polling, says Bill Carrick, Angelides' senior campaign strategist. So Schwarzenegger's zigzagging record is getting more attention from the trailing Democratic candidate.

During the debate, the polished Schwarzenegger attempted to disarm the policy-wonk Angelides with jokes and gentle jabs.

Granted one chance to ask Angelides a question, Schwarzenegger playfully asked the Democrat what his funniest moment was in the campaign.

“Every day is just a hoot — I can't tell you how much fun,” Angelides said.

Though some Republican activists are miffed at Schwarzenegger, “conservatives will come out” on Election Day, Ackerman says. “He's stayed true to his pledge of no new taxes.”

Schwarzenegger has been so hard to pigeonhole that he provokes a wide range of guesses about what a second term would look like. On the campaign trail, he offers few clues.

DOJ_NMG_0080269

Sherry Bebitch Jeffe, a University of Southern California public policy analyst, theorizes that Schwarzenegger will "move to the left because he's more comfortable there.

He feels far more comfortable as an activist liberal than with the conservative part of his party's base."

Ackerman takes an opposite view. He expects Schwarzenegger to again challenge Democrats over legislative reapportionment, cutting public-employee pension costs and winning more budget-cutting power for governors.

Dowd says Schwarzenegger will hew to the bipartisan approach of 2006.

If he wins, Schwarzenegger is apt to start 2007 with his former movie-star appeal restored with Californians. The Los Angeles Times Poll showed that 60% of likely voters have a favorable impression of him.

"They want to like him, because he's fun," Pitney says. "It's fun to have him as governor, fun to tell people you have Arnold Schwarzenegger as your governor. It's something you can brag about to people in other states."

Not Right, 'Tonight' (LAT)

AMONG THE LATE-NIGHT PROMOS you aren't likely ever to hear, add this one: "Coming up on 'The Tonight Show With Jay Leno,' Jay chats up Heidi Klum, Robin Williams and Phil Angelides!"

Not many weeknight couch potatoes would be lured to their TV sets by the prospect of California's Democratic gubernatorial candidate trading quips with Leno about his humble Sacramento upbringing or his plan to raise the income ceilings on Cal Grants, which is why his invitation to appear on the program hasn't so far materialized. Yet it's also why Leno and NBC should have known better than to invite Angelides' more telegenic Republican rival for the governor's office, Arnold Schwarzenegger, on the show just four weeks before the election.

Angelides cried foul after Schwarzenegger's appearance Wednesday night, claiming that NBC is violating the equal-time provision of the Communications Act by not giving him the same consideration as his opponent. He doesn't have much of a legal argument. News interview shows are exempt from the provision, and Leno often interviews important public figures, so his program almost certainly qualifies.

Illegal or not, Schwarzenegger's appearance was clearly inappropriate. Leno at one point asked his friend the governor about the attack ads from Angelides that have sought to tie Schwarzenegger to President Bush, who is deeply unpopular in California. "To link me to George Bush is like linking me to an Oscar," Schwarzenegger replied.

It was the most entertaining line of the night, but it also blew away any pretense that this wasn't a campaign appearance. It's hard to imagine Leno asking just one presidential candidate on his show in the weeks before an election and ignoring the other, and the same should apply to the state race.

Booking guests on shows like Leno's is all about timing; celebrities appear when they want to promote their newest movie or album, not necessarily when Leno's schedulers want them. The problem is, Schwarzenegger still acts like a movie star rather than a public official, and NBC still treats him that way.

There's no reason he couldn't have been booked after the election rather than before. But just as he made the TV circuit when he wanted to promote his latest "Terminator" movie, now he's doing it to promote himself as governor. Yet different rules apply.

The airwaves are granted to broadcasters for free, with the understanding that they are a public trust. Using them to boost favored candidates for office violates that trust, even if it doesn't violate the law.

Long List Of Laws Headed To Voters (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

WASHINGTON — Voters next month will decide the most citizen-sponsored referendums in a non-presidential election in nearly 100 years, as groups step up efforts to shape policy by putting measures directly to popular vote.

Eighteen states will decide 76 ballot initiatives in November, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures. That's exceeded only by 87 such measures in 1914 — when initiatives were popular as part of the Progressive movement that fought moneyed special interests, the conference says.

There were also 87 ballot measures in 1996, which was a presidential election year.

"We're seeing initiatives go more and more into battleground states," said University of Florida political scientist Daniel Smith, a leading expert on initiatives. "Groups want to use them to mobilize their supporters."

Ohio has four initiatives, including a labor-backed proposal to raise the minimum wage, which sponsors hope will help Democrats in close races for governor, Senate and two House seats. In Missouri, an initiative to allow stem cell research could influence a tight Senate race.

"A lot of regional and national groups have become very adept at using the initiative process, and they have deep pockets so they can operate campaigns in a number of states," said Jennie Bowser, a policy analyst for the legislatures conference.

Initiatives increase voter turnout, particularly in non-presidential election years, and can sway other contests by drawing attention to how candidates stand on the initiative questions, Smith said. His study last year showed that a referendum to bar same-sex marriage in Ohio in 2004 helped President Bush carry that state and win a second term.

This year, "progressives are taking a page out of the right-wing playbook" by putting questions on ballots in Ohio, Colorado and four other key states to raise the minimum wage, said Kristina Wilfore, executive director of the liberal Ballot Initiative Strategy Center.

Unions are sponsoring those initiatives, even though few members earn minimum wage, to help pro-labor Democrats, AFL-CIO President John Sweeney said.

Citizens in 24 states can use initiatives to enact new laws by gathering signatures to put questions on a ballot. Since the 1970s, many initiatives have curtailed taxes, imposed term limits and restricted campaign fundraising.

Next month, voters in 33 states also will decide 121 additional ballot measures sponsored by legislatures. Those often involve less-contentious matters such a borrowing money, but they also cover topics such as same-sex marriage.

The 76 ballot initiatives do not include five "citizen vetoes" in which voters are being asked to repeal laws, such as South Dakota's near-total ban on abortion.

Other measures on ballots Nov. 7 would limit public smoking, restrict taxes and increase school spending.

Those issues don't motivate voters the way minimum wage and same-sex marriage can because they have "no clear partisan or ideological dimension," said Stephen Nicholson, a political scientist at the University of California, Merced. "The critical thing is to choose an issue where you're certain support is going to be strong and stay strong."

Ex-President Ford Has Medical Tests (AP-Y)

Gerald Ford, the nation's oldest living former president, was in a hospital Thursday and undergoing medical tests, his office said.

Ford, 93, was doing well at Eisenhower Medical Center, spokeswoman Penny Circle said in a statement. She did not disclose the nature of the tests.

The former president has been hospitalized repeatedly this year.

He underwent heart procedures in August at the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn., then returned to his home in Rancho Mirage. He received an implantable cardiac pacemaker to regulate his heartbeat and underwent angioplasty, with stents in two of his coronary arteries to increase blood flow.

In July, Ford was admitted to Colorado's Vail Valley Medical Center for a few days because of shortness of breath. In January, he was hospitalized for 12 days in Rancho Mirage to treat pneumonia.

Five years ago, Ford suffered two small strokes and spent about a week in a hospital.

Ford, a Michigan Republican, was House minority leader when President Nixon chose him to replace Spiro Agnew, who resigned, as vice president in 1973. Ford became president on Aug. 9, 1974, when Nixon resigned amid the Watergate scandal.

U.N. Nears Action On N. Korea (LAT)

A deal on a draft sanctions resolution specifies that it cannot lead to military action, allaying Russian and Chinese concerns.

UNITED NATIONS — The Security Council edged closer to agreement Thursday on a draft sanctions resolution designed to strangle North Korea's missile and nuclear programs and their funding in response to the country's announced nuclear test.

After a flurry of high-level negotiations in Washington, Beijing and Moscow, diplomats at the United Nations worked out a compromise specifying that the resolution could not be used as a basis for military action.

The new draft was sent to capitals for consideration in time for a possible vote today or Saturday.

The resolution also calls for an embargo on conventional weapons, a ban on luxury goods, a prohibition against materials related to North Korea's missile and nuclear programs and a freeze on financial activities that support them, as well as a travel ban for senior North Korean officials. It would also allow the interception and inspection of suspected nuclear and missile materials going to and from North Korea.

Russia and China, sensitive to the prospect of intrusive activity so close to their borders, are concerned about whether proposed inspections of all North Korean cargo would be legal. The neighbors, which as permanent members of the Security Council hold veto power, had balked at an earlier draft circulated by the United States on Thursday. The new measure says the inspections should be "cooperative."

The U.S. added the provision against military action after a special envoy from China met with President Bush, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and national security advisor Stephen Hadley at the White House. The envoy, Tang Jiaxuan, told them that China agreed that "strong measures" were needed to punish North Korea but that it only wanted sanctions related to the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, National Security Council spokesman Frederick Jones said.

Afterward, Rice acknowledged it would take a little more effort on both sides to come up with a draft acceptable to China, which would have to implement many of the sanctions.

"I think the Chinese clearly understand the gravity of the situation," Rice said. "They clearly understand that the North Koreans in doing this have made the environment much less stable and much less secure." She said that if the vote did not happen today, "I think it will be soon."

Tang goes to Moscow for meetings today and Saturday, while South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun travels to Beijing to discuss the issue.

"I don't want to say we've reached agreement, but many, many of the significant differences have been closed," said U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton, after a breakthrough meeting among the Security Council's permanent members and Japan. "But I'm very pleased with the progress we've made, and I think it's close to the point where we will have an agreement."

Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said he had urged Bolton on Thursday morning to slow down the process to ensure full agreement by the council and to prevent problems in the resolution's implementation.

Bolton said the United States would consider changes in the resolution but was determined to vote on it by the end of the week. He left it "open to interpretation" which day he meant.

"I think the council should try to respond to a nuclear test within the same week that the test occurred," Bolton said. "We're certainly in favor of keeping all the diplomatic channels open, but we also want swift action, and we shouldn't allow meetings and more meetings … to be an excuse for inaction."

Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya said the resolution should be "firm, forceful and appropriate." He said he was willing to accept an article of Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter — at the heart of the debate on the North Korea resolution — authorizing economic sanctions, but not the part that allows military action.

The United States, Britain and France — the other permanent members of the Security Council — argue that the issue is a test of the council's authority.

British Ambassador Emyr Jones Parry said, "If you can't even vote Chapter 7 when a country performs a nuclear test, you have to wonder whether we'll be using Chapter 7 ever again.

"There is a perception — a misperception — that it leads to military action. It does not."

North Korean Ambassador Pak Gil Yon repeated a threat that his government would consider Security Council sanctions a declaration of war.

"We will take counter-measures," he told The Times.

He said that he did not know if the nuclear test had a smaller explosion than expected but that it had achieved its aims. "I am not a scientist. All I know is that the test was successful."

U.N. Near Agreement On N. Korea Sanctions (WP)

By Colum Lynch, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

Arms Embargo Among Resolution's Provisions

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 12 -- The U.N. Security Council moved closer Thursday night to agreement on a resolution that would impose an arms embargo and broad financial sanctions on North Korea in response to its claimed nuclear test, according to senior U.S. and European diplomats.

The council's five major powers -- the United States, Russia, China, Britain and France -- and Japan hammered out a compromise text that was to be sent to capitals Thursday night for approval, diplomats said. The preliminary deal was struck after the United States, acting at the request of China, included assurances that the resolution could not be used as a pretext for future military action against North Korea.

"I don't want to say we've reached agreement, but many, many of the significant differences have been closed," John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador, said after the meeting. "But I'm very pleased with the progress we've made, and I think it's close to the point where we will have an agreement."

"It was a good meeting," added French Ambassador Jean-Marc de La Sabliere. "We will now send the outcome of this meeting to our capitals. We are close to an agreement."

The diplomatic movement came hours after President Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met in Washington with China's state councilor, Tang Jiaxuan.

Bush and Rice pressed Tang to support a series of tough measures designed to compel North Korea to halt its nuclear activities and resume multiparty talks aimed at eliminating Pyongyang's nuclear weapons.

A U.S.-backed draft resolution presented to the council earlier Thursday would impose an arms embargo on North Korea, ban all trade linked to its programs for ballistic missiles and nuclear weapons, and permit international inspections of North Korean cargo.

The U.S. text would also prohibit North Korean trade in luxury goods, and would ban travel and freeze assets of individuals involved in the country's prohibited weapons programs. North Korea would be given 30 days to halt its nuclear activities or face additional international penalties.

China has resisted the U.S. approach as too tough, instead favoring U.N. sanctions that would narrowly target North Korea's programs for nuclear and ballistic missiles. In an effort to address China's concern, the United States has agreed to include more restrictive language on the scope of military sanctions and inspections.

Rice told reporters that she, Bush and national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley "had excellent talks" with Tang, a senior official who outranks the foreign minister.

"I think the Chinese clearly understand the gravity of the situation," Rice said. "They clearly understand that the North Koreans in doing this have made the environment much less stable and much less secure."

China has voiced concern that international inspections of North Korean cargo would excessively intrude into the country's commercial affairs.

Beijing also expressed concern that the resolution invokes a provision of the U.N. Charter, Chapter 7, that has been used in the past to authorize military force. China insists that the text should refer to a section of Chapter 7, Article 41, that authorizes only sanctions.

Security Council diplomats said the United States and China are working on compromise language that would split the difference. It would refer to Chapter 7 but would require explicit council approval to consider any action against North Korea.

Russia's ambassador, Vitaly Churkin, meanwhile, said early Thursday that Moscow needs more time to consider the U.S. draft. He said a vote should be delayed until after Russian officials hold high-level meetings in Moscow with a senior Chinese delegation on Friday and Saturday.

But council diplomats said Russia softened its opposition after Rice agreed in a phone conversation with Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov to drop U.S. opposition to a Russian-backed resolution criticizing its neighbor Georgia, which recently detained seven Russian soldiers who were accused of spying.

Rice, China In Agreement On North Korea (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, October 13, 2006

China agrees that North Korea's nuclear test was a grave development that makes Northeast Asia much less secure, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday after talks with a Chinese envoy.

Rice predicted the U.N. Security Council would respond to North Korea's nuclear test "with a very good resolution that will demonstrate to the North Koreans that the international community is very much united in its condemnation of this test."

President Bush, pursuing a diplomatic solution, spoke with Australian Prime Minister John Howard by telephone and they agreed on the need for a strong U.N. resolution to punish North Korea, a spokesman said.

Bush and Howard said any resolution should be adopted under Chapter 7 of the U.N. charter, which means it could be enforced militarily, National Security Council spokesman Frederick Jones said.

The Chinese envoy, State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan, met briefly with Bush in the Oval Office and conferred at the White House with Rice, national security adviser Stephen Hadley and Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill.

"I think the Chinese clearly understand the gravity of the situation," Rice told reporters later at the State Department. "They clearly understand that the North Koreans doing this have made the environment much less stable, much less secure."

Rice credited China with working very hard to get a tough resolution through the Security Council.

But at the United Nations, Russia urged the United States not to rush a vote but to await the results of high-level diplomacy. China said it would welcome more talks so the council could send a united and forceful message to North Korea.

After his stop in Washington, Tang is due to hold talks in Moscow with Russian officials.

The United States, China, Russia, Japan and South Korea are in a six-party negotiating arrangement with North Korea designed to stop the communist government from making nuclear weapons in exchange for economic and other concessions.

Washington has publicly reassured North Korea that the U.S. has no intention of attacking it.

Deputy national security adviser J.D. Crouch told reporters traveling with Bush to St. Louis on Thursday that the meeting with the Chinese envoy went well.

"I think it's a positive sign that we all agree that we need a resolution and that we need to go forward with strong measures," he said.

U.S. Tones Down U.N. Sanctions Draft (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, October 13, 2006

NEW YORK -- The United States yesterday watered down elements of its U.N. Security Council condemnation of North Korea to win crucial support from Russia and China, but appeared unlikely to get the vote it is seeking by today.

Washington wants a tough rebuke this week of Pyongyang's announcement of a nuclear test, as well as legally binding measures to close down the communist state's access to nuclear and military materiel and illicit sources of funding.

"Differences remain on some important aspects of the resolution," John R. Bolton, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, acknowledged after a morning of meetings. "We will continue to work on it, but not at the cost of sending a swift and strong response."

But Russian and Chinese U.N. ambassadors urged the resolution co-sponsors to slow down and leave some room for diplomacy -- both in their own capitals and directly with the North Korean regime.

China launched its own initiative yesterday, dispatching State Councilor for Foreign Affairs Tang Jiaxuan to Washington, where he met with President Bush in the Oval Office and also conferred at the White House with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley and Assistant Secretary of State for East Asia Christopher R. Hill. Today he plans to travel to Russia for further talks.

"I think the Chinese clearly understand the gravity of the situation," Miss Rice told reporters later at the State Department. "They clearly understand that the North Koreans doing this have made the environment much less stable, much less secure."

She credited China with working very hard to get a tough resolution through the Security Council.

Miss Rice plans to visit Japan Monday, while South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun is expected in Beijing the day before for meetings with top officials.

Pyongyang, meanwhile, leveled new threats at Japan, which on Wednesday announced a unilateral halt to trade with North Korea and a ban on its vessels entering Japanese ports. Tokyo today approved additional measures, including a total ban on imports from the country.

A North Korean diplomat in Japan, Song Il Ho, told the Kyodo News agency his country "will take strong countermeasures."

The U.S.-drafted resolution, which is co-sponsored by Japan, Britain, France and Slovakia, calls for all states to embargo materials that could contribute to North Korea's nuclear, ballistic missile or weapons programs, freeze assets linked to counterfeiting and smuggling, and impose a travel ban on senior officials. It allows states to inspect cargo moving to or from the North's ports.

The resolution also demands that Pyongyang immediately renounce nuclear weapons and return to various international nonproliferation regimes, and resume without preconditions the six-party talks with the United States and the North's neighbors.

The resolution makes provisions for humanitarian assistance and legitimate trade on which the bankrupt and famine-wracked nation depends.

The newest versions of the resolution delete language that would have demanded that nations close their ports to North Korean goods, ships and planes.

Mr. Bolton yesterday acknowledged "a relatively modest number of changes" but insisted the draft still had enough teeth to curtail North Korea's illegal trading and pursuit of nuclear weapons and energy programs.

The Security Council has been meeting in various formats every day since Pyongyang said early Monday that it had tested a nuclear device. That action galvanized many nations, including those which Mr. Bolton had taunted as Pyongyang's "protectors in the council."

"The nuclear test conducted by [North Korea] is an irresponsible action and this action has to be firmly opposed and condemned," said Wang Guangya, China's ambassador to the United Nations.

"The response and action the council is considering should be firm, forceful and also appropriate," he added. "By appropriate I mean it should reflect the feelings of the international community and more important, should [lead] to a solution of this issue by peaceful means."

U.S. And Japan Try To Get China On Board For Sanctions Against N. Korea (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, October 13, 2006

SEOUL — The United States and Japan are pressing the U.N. Security Council — including a reluctant China — for a vote as early as today on sanctions against North Korea for its reported nuclear test.

The Security Council is considering a U.S.-drafted proposal that would impose wide-ranging sanctions on the reclusive communist state. The latest draft also would demand that the North return to six-party talks without preconditions and that it "not conduct any further nuclear test or launch of a ballistic missile."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met Thursday in Washington with Chinese envoy Tang Jiaxuan. She said China agrees that North Korea's announcement Monday of a nuclear test was a grave development and predicted that the Security Council would respond "with a very good resolution."

Though China denounced North Korea in harsh terms, it has in the past balked at imposing serious sanctions on the Pyongyang government. It fears that economic pressure could destabilize North Korean dictator Kim Jong Il's regime, which could send refugees into China. Russia's U.N. Ambassador Vitaly Churkin also urged the United States not to rush to a vote, saying it should wait for results of diplomatic meetings.

Japan's U.N. ambassador, Kenzo Oshima, said a vote would "most likely" take place Saturday. As two of five permanent Security Council members, China and Russia have veto power and could kill a resolution.

It's unclear how North Korea would respond to punitive measures. North Korean officials have threatened to retaliate against Japan, which said it will ban North Korean imports, bar their ships and block travel to Japan by North Korean officials. "We will take strong countermeasures," North Korean diplomat Song Il Ho told Japan's Kyodo News. Japan's sanctions are likely to take effect today.

South Koreans, meanwhile, debated how to respond to North Korea's defiant behavior. The South Korean parliament passed a non-binding resolution Thursday condemning the reported test.

A poll published Thursday by the conservative JoongAng Daily newspaper showed that 78% of South Koreans want changes in their government's conciliatory "Sunshine Policy" of aid to North Korea with no strings attached.

"We kept giving to North Korea," said Shin Wha Lee, a professor of political science and international relations at Korea University in Seoul. "They want to talk with us only if and when they need aid."

The JoongAng Poll also showed 65% of the 760 adults surveyed said South Korea should have its own nuclear weapons program. But many are less worried about a North Korean nuclear test than a regional nuclear arms race.

"It will have a domino effect," said Yu Hoon, 48, a sales representative for an Internet phone company. "Japan and Taiwan will want to have nuclear weapons." Those countries said this week that they would not develop nuclear arms.

U.N. Close To Sanctions For North Korea (AP-Y)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP-Yahoo, October 13, 2006

Key U.N. Security Council members moved closer to agreement late Thursday on a U.S.-proposed resolution that would impose sanctions but no military measures against North Korea because of its claimed nuclear test.

Tougher earlier drafts by the United States met opposition from Russia and China who wanted a more moderate response to Pyongyang's nuclear brinkmanship to try to persuade the reclusive communist nation to return to six-party talks on its nuclear program.

Both countries wanted to focus on reining in the North's weapons programs and China wanted to ensure that nothing in the draft could trigger military action.

The new U.S. draft circulated Thursday night tries to satisfy both the United States and China on the scope of sanctions. It also eliminates a blanket arms embargo in the previous draft, instead targeting specific equipment for sanctions including missiles, tanks, warships and combat aircraft.

The United States reported significant progress in bridging differences with Russia and China after more than two hours of closed-door negotiations among ambassadors from the five permanent council nations — the U.S., Russia, China, Britain and France — and Japan's ambassador who is the current council president.

The U.S. said it hoped a vote could be held on Friday though close ally Japan said Saturday was more likely.

"We have made very substantial progress," U.S. Ambassador John Bolton told reporters after the meeting. "I don't want to say we've reached agreement yet, but many, many of the significant differences have been closed, very much to our satisfaction."

A new draft of the resolution was sent to capitals Thursday night so ministers can examine the latest changes. Bolton said the full Security Council is meeting Friday morning.

China's U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya agreed that "good progress has been made" in improving the text. Russia's U.N. Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said there had been "a number of improvements" and, importantly, council unity "is in good shape."

"We should act with a cool head and moderation and also do everything to achieve a political, diplomatic outcome of this problem — and this is the spirit we had in those discussions," Churkin said. "It's not assured we're going to get there, but the mood is good and the effort is good, too."

North Korea warned it would have a firm response to sanctions, Japan's Kyodo News Agency reported from Pyongyang.

"We will take strong countermeasures," Kyodo quoted Song Il Ho, North Korea's ambassador in charge of diplomatic normalization talks with Japan, as saying.

The new U.S. draft expresses "profound concern" at the increased tension generated by North Korea's claim to have tested a nuclear device and therefore determines there is "a clear threat to international peace and security."

The major compromise, which appears to have satisfied both China and the United States, was on sanctions.

The United States insisted the resolution must be under Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter — which authorizes punishments ranging from breaking diplomatic ties and imposing economic sanctions to naval blockades and military actions — because of the gravity of North Korea's action.

China opposed a blanket reference to Chapter 7 and only wanted measures under one of its articles — Article 41 which authorizes non-military sanctions such as economic penalties, breaking diplomatic relations and banning air travel.

The new draft states that the Security Council would act under Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter and only take measures under Article 41. It also underlines that the Security Council would have to adopt a new resolution "should additional measures be necessary" against North Korea.

The U.S. proposal eliminates the blanket arms embargo and would instead impose sanctions on specific equipment including tanks, combat aircraft, warships and missiles.

It keeps the requirement that all countries prevent the sale or transfer of luxury goods and material and technology which could contribute to North Korea's nuclear, ballistic missile or other weapons of mass destruction-related programs.

Like the previous draft, the new draft would condemn the nuclear test, demand that North Korea immediately return to six-party talks without preconditions, and impose sanctions for Pyongyang's "flagrant disregard" of the council's appeal not to detonate a device. It would also demand that North Korea "not conduct any further nuclear test or launch of a ballistic missile."

Beijing and Moscow objected to the wide scope of financial sanctions and a provision authorizing the inspection of cargo going in and out of North Korea, council diplomats said, speaking on condition of anonymity because talks are private. There is concern among some diplomats that boarding North Korean ships could lead to a military response from the North.

The latest draft keeps the financial freeze on individuals and entities with any connection to North Korea's weapons or missile programs as well as a travel ban on those associated with the programs. But it changes the focus of the provision on inspections.

In the previous draft, all countries were authorized to inspect cargo to and from North Korea, "as necessary," to ensure compliance with the sanctions and to prevent illicit trafficking.

In the new draft, all countries are authorized to take "cooperative action including through inspection of cargo ... in particular to prevent illicit trafficking in nuclear, chemical or biological weapons, their means of delivery and related materials."

China And Russia Stall Sanctions On North Korea (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 12 — The American push to win Security Council backing for tough, swift sanctions against North Korea appeared to be set back by China and Russia on Thursday, in an echo of the obstacles the United States faces in a similar push to punish Iran.

The United States circulated a softened draft resolution to the Security Council in response to North Korea's assertion that it conducted a nuclear test on Monday. The United States pressed for a vote by Friday, but China and Russia immediately signaled their opposition to critical parts of the measure and said they needed more time.

China sent an emissary to the White House, Tang Jiaxuan, who met with President Bush on Thursday and appeared to be walking a line between punishing North Korea and preventing the United States from taking measures that would seriously threaten the government, according to the deputy national security adviser, J. D. Crouch.

A senior Bush administration official said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was considering a trip to Beijing, Seoul and Tokyo as early as next week to negotiate punitive steps over and above those that might be acceptable to the full Security Council.

The revised draft resolution dropped earlier Japanese amendments prohibiting North Korean ships from entering any port and North Korean aircraft from taking off or landing in any country. Japan is imposing its own new sanctions on North Korea, including a limit on imports and a ban on North Korean ships in Japanese waters.

The resolution still cites Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, which makes sanctions mandatory and suggests the possibility of military enforcement. China and Russia have consistently opposed Chapter VII enforcement for North Korea.

The United States was able to win a unanimous Security Council resolution condemning North Korea's missile launchings last July only by dropping the reference to Chapter VII, but John R. Bolton, the American ambassador to the United Nations, said he would resist that step this time.

"In light of the fact that North Korea has claimed a test of a nuclear device, we need stronger language," he said.

The draft calls for international inspections of cargo going into and out of North Korea to block transport of weapons-related material, a section that has aroused particular objections from China, which is wary of such interdiction moves being conducted off its coasts.

American officials, while acknowledging how difficult it will be to win Security Council backing for the tough sanctions they prefer, insist that even a weaker resolution would send a strong signal of international condemnation.

The revised draft still requires all countries to prevent the sale or transfer of arms, luxury goods and material related to North Korea's nuclear, ballistic missile and unconventional weapons programs. It maintains a ban on travel by officials connected to those programs and a freeze on their assets.

The new draft omits an earlier mention of curbs on activities benefiting North Korea like "counterfeiting, money-laundering or narcotics," but Mr. Bolton said those activities were covered by the resolution's freeze of North Korean assets, which includes those from "illicit means."

The measure also calls on North Korea to return to the six-nation talks involving South Korea, China, Japan, Russia and the United States that it walked out of 13 months ago.

As for the international inspections, Mr. Bolton said that the United States already had the power to inspect cargoes under the American-led Proliferation Security Initiative, a group of more than 70 countries that have pledged to seize illicit weapons as they move across oceans or are transported by air. But he said the United States wanted language in the resolution that would make it binding on all 192 member states of the United Nations.

China and Russia said they believed the steps recommended by Washington could end up doing more harm than good. "As we know in this problem and in this part of the world," Vitaly I. Churkin, the Russian ambassador, said, "some strong statements made by others in the Security Council have hurt the entire thing and have aggravated matters, so we do not want to repeat this on the level of the Security Council."

Sounding a note of exasperation, Mr. Bolton protested as "simply incorrect" the interpretation that Chapter VII sets a pretext for military force, as many countries at the United Nations believe it did in Iraq.

"It would require a separate resolution, if one were needed, to authorize force," he said.

Mr. Bolton said the United States was still open to changes but was determined to produce a decision by the end of the week.

"I think that the Council should try to respond to a nuclear test within the same week that the test occurred," he said. "I don't think that's too much to ask for."

Mr. Bolton had begun the week highlighting the unanimity of outrage over the North Korean move and expressing the conviction that in this instance the Council would act quickly and decisively.

To those who might claim that Thursday's indecision encouraged Iran to believe that it had little to fear from the Security Council in next week's scheduled debate, Mr. Bolton expressed confidence that the Council would take firm action and that it would set a good example. "I'm sure they're watching in Tehran," he said.

Mr. Churkin said he had asked Mr. Bolton on Thursday morning not to call for a vote, "but what happened, happened."

Mr. Churkin and Wang Guangya, the Chinese ambassador, said high-level negotiations over the resolution's terms were going on in major capitals over the weekend and ought not to be pre-empted by a hasty vote.

"Of course, some people are talking about a possible vote tomorrow," Mr. Wang said. "I'm not sure, but I think we have to see the final text, because there are many common grounds that members agree, but there are some disagreements."

Mr. Bolton responded, "We're certainly very much in favor of keeping all the diplomatic channels open, but we also want swift action and we shouldn't allow meetings and more meetings and more meetings and more meetings to be an excuse for inaction."

Mr. Wang said that Beijing thought the North Korean claim that it tested a nuclear device was an "irresponsible action" which had to be "firmly opposed and condemned."

But, he added: "More important, it should be helpful for leading to a solution of this issue by peaceful means. It should also create conditions for the parties to once again engage in negotiations to settle this issue."

Richard A. Grenell, Mr. Bolton's spokesman, said the Russians and Chinese were already blocking action on other issues before the Security Council regarding places like Zimbabwe, Sudan, Iran and Myanmar, formerly Burma. "It's all right to keep talking if you are really going to get action, but not if it's just delay and delay and delay," he said.

Asked if the United States would settle for a less than unanimous vote, Mr. Bolton said, "We would always like the highest number of votes in the Security Council and we have not given up on our efforts to achieve that, but we have also said that it's important what we send a very clear signal."

Acknowledging the lack of unanimity, Mr. Bolton said: "We don't have it yet. Differences remain, there are still differences on some important aspects of the resolution."

He said, "We are going to continue to work on it, but we're not going to work on it at the cost of losing sending a swift and strong response."

Understanding China's Place In N. Korea Situation (LAT)

By Mark Magnier

The Los Angeles Times, October 13, 2006

BEIJING -- Beijing's reaction to North Korea's nuclear testing announcement was unusually swift and forceful. Within hours on Monday, the normally slow to react Chinese government characterized Pyongyang's action as "hanran," meaning brazen, a term generally reserved for its worst enemies.

By midweek, however, China was sounding more like its old self: calling for dialogue, eschewing confrontation and warning against comprehensive economic sanctions, even as it redoubled efforts to lurch its longtime ally back to the negotiating table.

As North Korea's top supplier of energy and food, Beijing is viewed as the key to a tough international response at the United Nations to North Korean leader Kim Jong Il's provocation. And Washington, for its part, argues that China must be a "responsible stakeholder" if it wants a leading role in international society.

But with its go-slow stance, Beijing has been exposed to foreign criticism that it is squandering a golden opportunity to display global leadership.

The problem, analysts say, is that China draws much different conclusions than Washington, even in the middle of a nuclear crisis, because it has a very different idea of what's important and what it needs to survive and prosper.

While the United States and Europe view a nuclear North Korea as a fundamental threat to the global order, China sees it less as a problem in its own right than as a catalyst for secondary headaches including the possible destabilization of the Korean Peninsula and militarization of Japan.

"America wants to see North Korea go away, representing the final victory of the Cold War," said Alexandre Mansourov, a security expert with the Asia-Pacific Center for Security Studies in Honolulu. "China's interests, however, lie in keeping North Korea in place. China's not doing this because it loves Kim Jong Il, but because it wants the buffer to remain."

Furthermore, Beijing appears to be less worried about a nuclear-armed North Korea.

"There's a big perception gap," said Jin Linbo, Asia-Pacific director at Beijing's China Institute of International Studies. "China has a different assessment of the danger."

Beijing already lives in a tough neighborhood where nuclear neighbors are abundant. It nearly went to war with a nuclear Russia in the 1960s and more recently watched Pakistan and rival India join the club. China is not all that impressed by Pyongyang's nuclear technology, analysts add, nor does it see itself as an intended target.

China's current stage bears similarities to the United States from the Civil War to World War I, says Jin Canrong, vice dean of foreign relations at Beijing's Renmin University. It is industrializing rapidly, weathering a huge population shift from rural to urban areas and is grappling with enormous social problems related to rising expectations and a widening wealth gap.

In the same way America was primarily isolationist as it focused on internal development, China's leadership seeks enough time and international stability to lift its people out of poverty, ease societal stresses and keep enough money flowing to ensure the continued monopoly position of the Communist Party.

A bigger danger than North Korean nukes from China's perspective is of Washington destablizing the region. Beijing apparently believes it needs North Korea as a buffer against the 30,000 or so U.S. troops stationed in South Korea to guard against an attack by Kim.Beijing, along with Russia, fears sanctions could lead to regime change in Pyongyang and growing U.S. influence in their backyard. Sanctions presaged the U.S.-led NATO removal of Slobodan Milosevic in Serbia and the 2003 Iraq invasion that unseated Saddam Hussein.

Moreover, if Kim fell, the risk of refugees flooding across the border into China is a frightening economic and social prospect.

Also weighing on China's mind is a fear that precipitate action could disrupt its courtship of South Korea, analysts say. If the Pyongyang regime collapses in the near future in the wake of sanctions or direct military action, the United States would retain significant influence over a Seoul-dominated Korean peninsula. Keeping Kim in place, on the other hand, would eventually see both Koreas in China's camp.

"South Korea is the big prize in all of this," said Ralph Cossa, executive director of Honolulu-based Pacific Forum CSIS.

Since relations were normalized in 1992, Beijing has watched approvingly as anti-American sentiment has grown in South Korea, U.S. troop levels have declined, China supplanted the United States as Seoul's largest trading partner and trendy young Koreans have dropped their English-language classes in droves to study Mandarin. A sign of China's growing confidence is its support for South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon as the next U.N. Secretary General, a nominee it would have condemned as a U.S. puppet a decade ago.

None of which is to say that North Korea doesn't infuriate Beijing. Despite receiving much of its food and an estimated 70 percent of its energy from China, the North is often ungrateful and defiant knowing China's interests would be hurt by its collapse. The way Pyongyang sees it, analysts add, Beijing merely writes the checks while it is doing the heavy lifting in the front-line battle against Western imperialists.

North Korea has also timed its outbursts with seeming disregard for its giant neighbor.

Its 1998 missile launch over the main island of Honshu boosted Japanese public support for an American missile defense plan, hurting Beijing's interests.

Its February 2005 announcement of reactivated nuclear activity, in the middle of Chinese New Year, infuriated Chinese officials forced to cut short their holiday.

And the announcement Monday morning occurred during one of the most important political events on the Chinese calendar -- the Communist Party's four-day central committee meeting.

Chinese leaders, with their love of pageantry, don't like tearing up their domestic or foreign scripts. The test by Beijing's mercurial neighbor not only overshadowed the meeting but also discredited President Hu Jintao's main foreign policy initiative -- six-party talks on the North Korean nuclear issue, with Pyongyang, the U.S., South Korea, Russia and Japan.

China's biggest nightmare emerging from the crisis is a nuclear Japan, although it remains confident that won't happen given divisions in Japanese society and Washington's own fears it would spur a regional arms race.

While Beijing sees far less danger in a nuclear North Korea than Washington, however, it remains under pressure to bring its stance somewhat more in line with the U.S. position. Too many other countries are angry and the North's defiance threatens to embolden other nuclear wannabe regimes, undercutting the global stability China needs to grow and prosper internally. Nor can Beijing afford to alienate the U.S., its biggest customer, by appearing too cozy with Pyongyang.

China apparently also figures it would have more influence by supporting and watering down a U.N. sanctions resolution than it would through outright opposition. Seoul and Beijing both know that North Korea can take more punishment right now: the fall harvest gives the impoverished country some breathing room.

This all leaves Beijing seeking an equilibrium closer to the U.S. position but not so close that it deals a death knell to the North Korean regime.

Adding to Beijing's lumbering pace this week, analysts say, is its cumbersome decision-making system. Because policy for centuries has been made by a tiny elite behind closed doors, the system can fall short during periods of rapid change as other parts of the government await directives handed down from on high.

Beijing has certainly taken more global responsibility, as seen by its recent decision to send 1,000 peacekeeper troops to Lebanon. By and large, however, it tries to avoid getting entangled in too many overseas responsibilities in line with a multidecade game plan.

"China measures history in centuries, not the next quarter," said Mansourov, of the Asia-Pacific Center for Security Studies.. "There's a notion that China will play out an American scenario, but they don't see it that way. They have a very different national interest."

Japan Takes Lead In Sanctioning N. Korea (AP)

By Eric Talmadge, Associated Press Writer

The Yong Gwang 1, one of 24 North Korean merchant ships docked in Japanese ports, bobs beside a pier loaded to the gills with its prized cargo — rusty old bicycles that can fetch a good price on the black market in the impoverished North.

For years, this port on the Sea of Japan coast has been a regular stop for the North Koreans. But that will end Friday when Japan adopts the toughest sanctions by any country so far in response to North Korea's nuclear test.

Tokyo's sanctions include the closure of all Japanese ports to North Korean vessels, a ban on imports and exports, and a six-month ban on travel to Japan by all North Korean government officials.

In this quiet port town, North Korean trade has been a constant. The ships arrive loaded with crabs, clams or "matsutake" mushrooms, a delicacy among Japanese gourmets.

They return home filled with used bicycles or old household electrical appliances the Japanese might normally throw away, but which can be sold for a good price in the North.

The sanctions, approved by Japan's ruling party on Thursday, were to be finalized by Prime Minister Shinzo Abe's Cabinet on Friday. Fishermen here said the North Korean crews have been told to pack up and leave by midnight Friday.

"We will feel it here," said dock worker Koji Kanetsuki of the bans. "But the world needs to do something. Japan has been through Hiroshima and Nagasaki. No good will come out of having nuclear weapons."

North Korea immediately condemned the move.

Song Il Ho, North Korea's ambassador in charge of diplomatic normalization talks with Japan, said his country would take "strong countermeasures" if Japan goes through with the sanctions, according to Japan's Kyodo News.

But Japan's action also underscores the difficulty of punishing the already isolated regime of Kim Jong Il.

Though it is the world's second-largest economy and a regional trade dynamo, Japan represents less than 5 percent of the total trade with North Korea, according to the Korea Trade-Investment Promotion Agency.

DOJ_NMG_0080281

The North's most crucial trading partner by far is China, which accounts for 38.9 percent of its imports and exports, followed by South Korea, at 26 percent. In fact, even Thailand outstrips Japan — accounting for 8.1 percent in 2005.

And China and South Korea aren't likely to follow Japan's hard-line example.

Beijing, Pyongyang's closest political ally, has strongly criticized North Korea but has stressed that while action should be taken, it should be "appropriate" and not so severe that it would topple Kim's fragile regime.

Trade between North Korea and China has actually expanded substantially while the efforts to bring the North back to the nuclear negotiating table have fizzled over the past year, largely over the North's demand that the U.S. lift financial sanctions.

China's total imports and exports with North Korea jumped 14 percent last year to $2.2 billion, according to the Commerce Ministry in Beijing. The North is believed to rely on China for 90 percent of its oil.

North Korea has little to offer in return — Pyongyang ran a $1 billion deficit last year.

China's reluctance to slap tough sanctions on the North has complicated talks in the United Nations, where what to do is still being mulled in the Security Council. The United States, Japan and their allies are pushing for stern action, but Russia and China have yet to sign on.

South Korea, aware that its capital is well within reach of North Korea's artillery and missile arsenal, has also been very cautious in its response, though criticism is rising that its strategy of engagement — the "sunshine policy" — has been a failure.

Like China, South Korea's trade with the North has swelled while the nuclear talks have stalled — climbing by more than 50 percent last year to just over $1 billion, according to the South's Unification Ministry.

Because Japan's trade with North Korea is limited, Abe faced little domestic opposition to cutting it off.

Tokyo already has limited sanctions in place against North Korea, imposed after the North test-fired seven missiles into waters between Japan and the Korean Peninsula in July. Those measures included banning the Mangyongbong-92 — a North Korean ferry that served as a major conduit of trade between the two countries — from entering Japanese waters.

South Korea Grapples With Competing Pressures As It Weighs Its Response To North Korea (NYT)

By Choe Sang-hun

SEOUL, South Korea, Oct. 12 — South Korea, one of the few countries that can financially squeeze North Korea, slid into a bitter internal dispute Thursday over how to punish the North for its reported test of a nuclear device.

After days of squabbling, the South Korean National Assembly passed a resolution on Thursday condemning North Korea's test. But some governing party lawmakers criticized the resolution because it did not refer to "U.S. responsibility" for the crisis.

South Korea's inability to make a quick decision reflects a divide among lawmakers over how to reconcile their so-called sunshine policy of engaging North Korea with American pressure for an economic blockade of the North.

The division at home leaves President Roh Moo-hyun without a consensus as he prepares to meet the Chinese president, Hu Jintao, in Beijing on Friday.

The region will closely watch the meeting. Both China and South Korea have tried to engage North Korea. But they also compete for long-term influence there. Many South Koreans are unwilling to punish the North Koreans, partly because it would push the North closer to China.

On Thursday, Liu Jianchao, a spokesman of the Chinese Foreign Ministry, said, "It's necessary to express clearly to North Korea that the nuclear test is the wrong practice." Mr. Liu added, however, that "one can say that punishment isn't the goal."

In contrast to South Korea, Japan reacted swiftly to the reports of the North Korean nuclear test by imposing a ban on imports and ships from North Korea.

In response, a North Korean official warned Thursday that the government would take "strong countermeasures" against Japan if it carried out the ban.

"The specific contents will become clear if you keep watching," Song Il-ho, the North Korean ambassador in charge of relations with Japan, told the Kyodo news agency in Pyongyang, North Korea's capital. "We never speak empty words."

North Korea rattled the Japanese in 1998 by firing a missile that flew over Japan and crashed in the Pacific. A top governing party leader in South Korea highlighted the political divide on Thursday by warning against giving in to demands by conservatives that the country join the American-led Proliferation Security Initiative, which aims to intercept North Korean ships suspected of carrying weapons materials.

Seoul's participation in the initiative "could work as a detonator for a military clash," the party leader, Kim Keun-tae, said at a meeting with cabinet ministers.

The main opposition Grand National Party issued its own statement demanding an end to two joint ventures with the North — the Mount Kumgang tourism project, for which South Korea has provided North Korea over $900 million since 1998, and an industrial complex in Kaesong, where South Korean factories produce garments and kitchen utensils with low-wage North Korean workers.

Lee Jong-seok, South Korea's unification minister in charge of relations with North Korea, told the National Assembly on Thursday that negotiations, as well as the sanctions being considered by the United Nations Security Council, were needed because "North Korea is not a country that one can open up with pressure and sanctions alone."

President Roh has found himself caught between increasing American pressure to get tough with North Korea and strong resistance among members of his own liberal governing party.

Conservative South Koreans called the North Korean nuclear threat a "death penalty" for the sunshine policy of promoting political reconciliation and economic cooperation with the North. They said billions of dollars funneled into the North — in cash, aid and trade — during eight years of engagement had helped North Korea divert its resources into weapons development.

But liberals within and outside the president's camp say that although they are frustrated with the North Koreans, they see no other option but to engage them. Ending cooperative projects will only worsen inter-Korean relations and increase the danger of military clashes on the divided Korean Peninsula, they say.

"It's clear that the sunshine policy has succeeded between the two Koreas, and it could have been more successful were it not for the bad relations between North Korea and the United States," former President Kim Dae-jung, the architect of the engagement policy, said, according to the South Korean news media.

Asian Nations, U.S. Weigh Censure Of North Korea (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad And Lina Yoon

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

SEOUL -- Several Asian nations and the U.S. moved ahead on multiple fronts to develop sanctions and other measures to censure North Korea's communist regime for its apparent test of a nuclear device.

The leaders of China and South Korea planned to discuss their ideas at a summit in Beijing Friday. The meeting will be the first time South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun has sat down with Chinese President Hu Jintao in 11 months. Mr. Roh also will meet with Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao.

China and South Korea are North Korea's neighbors and largest trading partners, traits that give them the most economic and political leverage over the regime of Kim Jong Il. Leaders in both countries were angered by the North's declared nuclear test on Monday. In developing a response, neither China nor South Korea wants to destabilize the North in a manner that would trigger chaos or lead to refugees on their borders.

China's foreign ministry issued another guarded statement Thursday. Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said "punishment should not be the purpose" of any action taken by the United Nations in response to the test. "The measures taken [by the U.N.] should be conducive to the denuclearization of the Korean peninsula and to bringing about peace and stability on the Korean peninsula," Mr. Liu said.

Japan and the U.S. are leading efforts to forge a resolution at the U.N. Security Council. John Bolton, U.S. ambassador to the U.N., said he would like the council to adopt a resolution by the week's end. The U.S. introduced a new draft resolution in the Security Council to punish North Korea and said it wants a vote on Friday.

Russia urged the U.S. not to rush the vote, saying Moscow still had differences and the U.S. should wait for the results of the flurry of high-level diplomacy. China backed Russia's call, saying Beijing would welcome more talks so the Security Council can send a united and forceful message to Pyongyang condemning the test.

The U.S. and Japan had initially hoped for a vote Thursday. But if Washington wants to get China and Russia on board, a vote is likely be delayed until next week.

"We're certainly in favor of keeping all the diplomatic channels open, but we also want swift action, and we shouldn't allow meetings, and more meetings .. to be an excuse for inaction," Mr. Bolton told reporters Thursday.

Asian stock markets remained calm amid the diplomatic maneuvering. South Korea's Composite Stock Price Index, or Kospi, rose 0.5% Thursday, though it is down 1.5% for the week. Japan's Nikkei Stock Average of 225 companies fell 0.19% Thursday.

The Bank of Korea held its overnight call-rate target steady at 4.5% and suggested its interest-rate tightening might be over as the slower-growing economy faces uncertainties from the North Korean crisis.

"The reaction of the international community, including the U.N., and the North's response to such reactions could hurt both [local] consumption and investor sentiment, so the central bank will closely monitor the situation," central-bank Gov. Lee Seongtae told reporters.

Hyundai Securities economist Lee Sang Jae said the central bank is likely to keep interest rates unchanged until the first quarter of next year while it monitors developments in the U.S. economy and North Korea.

Meanwhile, Goldman Sachs forecast a 4% growth rate for the South Korean economy next year, slower than this year's expected 4.8% rate.

"It is clear Korea reached a peak but will not have a hard landing," said Kim Sun Bae, the bank's co-director of Asia economic research. "It will be a gradual slowdown with an unstable situation until late this year or early next year."

He said the forecast hadn't been affected by the North's test, adding it will add some instability to the South Korean economy but is unlikely to develop into a crisis.

Bush, Australian PM Discuss North Korea (AP-Y)

AP, October 13, 2006

President Bush, pursuing a diplomatic solution to the North Korean nuclear crisis, spoke with Australian Prime Minister John Howard on Thursday and they agreed on the need for a strong U.N. Security Council resolution to punish Pyongyang, a spokesman said.

Separately, Chinese State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan had a meeting in the Oval Office and also conferred with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, national security adviser Stephen Hadley and Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, deputy national security adviser J.D. Crouch told reporters.

Bush and Howard said that any resolution should be adopted under Chapter 7 of the U.N. charter, which means it could be enforced militarily, National Security Council spokesman Frederick Jones said.

Bush thanked Howard for Australia's response to both North Korea's missile test in July and its announced nuclear test on Monday. The president noted the leading position that both Australia and Japan are taking in implementing sanctions against North Korea, Jones said.

The president also thanked Howard for "the resolute commitment that the Australian people have made to the cause of freedom in Iraq and Afghanistan," the spokesman said.

Crouch, talking to reporters who accompanied Bush on a trip to St. Louis, said that meeting with the Chinese official went well.

"I think it's a positive sign that we all agree that we need a resolution and that we need to go forward with strong measures," he said.

There was not a detailed discussion on specific elements of the resolution, Crouch said, but he added that there was a "broad understanding what there needed to be was a strong response and I think that the details of those are going to have to be negotiated."

Making Good On Bush's Vow Will Require Detective Work (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And David E. Sanger

WASHINGTON, Oct. 12 — Making good on President Bush's vow this week to hold North Korea "fully accountable" if it shares nuclear material will pose a major challenge to American intelligence and diplomacy, requiring new equipment and a high level of international cooperation, administration and military officials say.

Mr. Bush's declaration on Monday, in his first public comments after the North announced that it had detonated a nuclear device, underscored the importance of monitoring North Korea's nuclear program, tracking its exports and investing in technology for "fingerprinting" nuclear materials.

Security specialists said Mr. Bush's warning signaled a significant expansion of longstanding policies of deterrence, extending the threat of reprisals to the transfer of nuclear weapons or materials to another country or to terrorists.

That has long been a concern about the North Korean program, but the tools to prevent it are still limited.

Robert Joseph, the under secretary of state for arms control and international security, said in an interview on Thursday that "to be credible, declaratory policy must be backed up by effective capabilities."

Mr. Joseph cited three existing programs as models for what was needed: the Proliferation Security Initiative, a loose grouping of dozens of countries that have agreed to intercept illicit arms shipments moving through their waters or airspace; Megaports, an effort to install radiation detectors at major cargo ports around the world; and Second Line of Defense, a program to place radiation detectors at major border crossings around the world.

"We are putting in place the ability to detect, disrupt and deter North Korean proliferation activities," he said. "The announced North Korean nuclear test will provide impetus to further expand these capabilities, particularly in Asia."

The Pentagon, in carrying out one of its most sensitive missions, maintains a team of nuclear experts to analyze the fallout from any nuclear attack by terrorists, not only to identify the attackers but also to figure out where they got their bomb.

Separately, the International Atomic Energy Agency, a United Nations unit based in Vienna, compiles identifying markers drawn from the chemistry and physics of processes that produce radioactive material in nuclear programs around the world.

Using that kind of data and technology, it might be possible to figure out the likely origin of an intercepted shipment of bomb material — or of the radioactive debris of a weapon that was used. The atomic energy agency's inspectors have significant records from their time in North Korea before they were expelled, and they could rule out many other possible sources of radioactive material by calling on records from nations that cooperate with the agency.

The real question is how best to head off a nuclear transfer in the first place. Those options include stiff embargos, like those under discussion at the United Nations or even a more muscular international air and maritime inspection operation.

And then there is the threat of harsh retaliation.

Mr. Bush's declaration on Monday was no strategic aside, a number of administration and military officials said. Mr. Bush consciously chose language that amounts to a new "declaratory policy" of a line that must not be crossed.

"The transfer of nuclear weapons or material by North Korea to states or nonstate entities would be considered a grave threat to the United States, and we would hold North Korea fully accountable of the consequences of such action," Mr. Bush said.

When pressed for details on the implications, a range of administration and military officials declined to elaborate, saying that part of the power of deterrence was its very ambiguity. Most would speak about the topic only on condition of anonymity.

"These declarations are constructed with some elasticity, specifically to raise questions and doubts in the mind of the object," one Bush administration official said.

Last year the White House ordered a study of whether North Korea might share some nuclear fuel with Iran, but the report was inconclusive.

Some administration officials say they doubt that the North Koreans would take the risk. Others, including Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, argue that the North's record indicates that it proliferates any weapon in its arsenal. For example, it has long supplied missiles to Iran, and there have been suspicions, but no evidence, of nuclear cooperation between the countries as well.

Mr. Bush's statement was viewed by national security experts as a major shift in deterrence doctrine, one that acknowledges that the mission today is no longer preventing North Korea from building a nuclear weapon, but deterring its use or transfer.

"The administration will continue saying that a nuclear weapon in North Korea is unacceptable, but in fact they are beginning to accept it," said Scott D. Sagan, director of Stanford University's Center for International Security and Cooperation. "The administration is switching from a nonproliferation policy to a deterrence and defense policy. It is a form of containment rather than a form of nonproliferation."

The considerations during the cold war were far more straightforward: a Soviet missile would leave an obvious return address, allowing the United States to respond with no doubt as to the source of the attack.

But getting from the presumption of North Korean proliferation to the evidence is a very difficult task, one that initially is an intelligence, not a military, effort.

The difficulties of turning Mr. Bush's vow into real deterrence were vividly demonstrated in late 2003, the only moment when North Korea was widely suspected of being the source of nuclear material found elsewhere in the world.

The discovery was made in Libya, which decided to give up its nuclear weapons program. Along with centrifuges and other equipment purchased from the black market network created by Abdul Qadeer Khan, the Pakistani nuclear engineer, the Libyans turned over a cask of nearly two tons of uranium. It had arrived in Tripoli around 2001 in a semiprocessed form: uranium hexafluoride, the gas that is poured into centrifuges for enrichment into nuclear fuel.

Korean markings on the cask suggested that the North was the source. And chemical traces on the outside of the cask proved that the container had been at North Korea's main nuclear site, Yongbyon.

But while the Bush administration at first charged that North Korea had been the source of Libya's uranium, experts spent months trying to determine whether the contents of the cask had come from there as well or whether it had been filled up elsewhere. The result: plenty of suspicions, but no hard proof.

"We took months and months and months and still couldn't come to a 100 percent conclusion," one senior administration official said this year. "That happens. But it doesn't help you justify a counterstrike against someone."

The president's new warning grows from his 2002 National Security Strategy and subsequent statements on deterrence and pre-emption. But until now he never specifically said a nation transferring nuclear weapons or components would be held liable and be subject to retaliation, according to administration officials and analysts in the academic community.

Korean Test Seen As Only Partial Blast (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, October 13, 2006

Four days after North Korea tried to set off its first nuclear bomb, U.S. intelligence agencies think the blast detected by seismic sensors was a plutonium-fueled device that did not fully explode.

"The working assumption is that what happened, more likely than not, was an attempted nuclear test that fell far short of being successful," said one U.S. official familiar with the latest intelligence assessment.

There is still no confirmation that North Korea succeeded in creating a nuclear explosion, and so far no radioactive particles that would confirm a successful nuclear test have been detected. The Washington Times first reported Tuesday that U.S. officials were having doubts, based on preliminary data, about North Korea's boasts about having successfully tested its first nuclear device.

The latest intelligence estimates of Monday's test at a nuclear test site near Kilju, in northeastern North Korea, put the size of the blast at 0.2 kilotons, or the equivalent of 200 tons of TNT. A plutonium-fueled nuclear device normally creates a much larger blast, in the range of 5 kilotons to 20 kilotons. A kiloton is the equivalent of 1,000 tons of TNT.

The detected explosion likely was produced by the conventional high-explosives used to split the plutonium atoms and produce a nuclear explosion, one official said. A second official said, "There was a yield that was in the several hundred ton range, but it at least partially failed."

Complete analysis of the data could take weeks, the officials said.

Plutonium-fueled bombs use a core of plutonium that is surrounded by conventional high explosives. High-speed electronic triggers are used to set off the high explosives, which apply pressure to the plutonium and produce the nuclear blast.

According to officials, the North Koreans informed China's government that the test they planned to carry out would produce a 4-kiloton explosion. That size indicates the North Koreans were trying to test a small warhead that likely would fit on a missile. The North Koreans have several types of ballistic missiles, including a long-range Taepodong-2, medium-range Nodong and shorter-range Scuds.

Still, the top U.S. military official was noncommittal when asked yesterday by reporters whether North Korea's detected explosion was nuclear or merely conventional.

"It is not yet determined -- with any degree of assurance -- what exactly they tested," said Marine Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Other explanations for the relatively low size of the detected blast include that North Korea did create a small nuclear explosion, but that seismic waves from it -- it registered as a 4.2 on the earthquake scale -- were muffled by an underground cavern, the officials said.

A third theory that intelligence agencies are examining is that the detected explosion was only a conventional explosion that North Korea is trying to fool the world into believing was a nuclear test, the officials said.

So far, aircraft and other sensors nearby the site of the explosion have not detected any radioactive debris. But while the detection of minute amounts of such materials would confirm a successful nuclear test, the officials warned that even if no sensors detect radioactive particles, a partially successful test would remain a possibility.

What Will Stop North Korea (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

It shall be the policy of this nation to regard any nuclear missile launched from Cuba against any nation in the Western Hemisphere as an attack by the Soviet Union on the United States, requiring a full retaliatory response upon the Soviet Union .

-- President John F. Kennedy,

Oct. 22, 1962

Now that's deterrence.

Kennedy was pledging that if any nuke was launched from Cuba, the United States would not even bother with Cuba but would go directly to the source and bring the apocalypse to Russia with a massive nuclear attack.

The remarkable thing about this kind of threat is that in 1962 it was very credible. Indeed, its credibility kept the peace throughout a half-century of the Cold War.

Deterrence is what you do when there is no way to disarm your enemy. You cannot deprive him of his weapons, but you can keep him from using them. We long ago reached that stage with North Korea.

Everyone has tried to figure out how to disarm North Korea. It will not happen. Kim Jong Il is not going to give up his nukes. The only way to disarm the regime is to destroy it. China could do that with sanctions but will not. The United States could do that with a second Korean War but will not either.

So we are back to deterrence. Hence the familiar echoes of the Cuban missile crisis with North Korea's rude entry into the nuclear club this week. The United States had to immediately put down markers for deterrence. President Bush put down two.

One marker, preventing a direct attack on our allies in the region, was straightforward, if bland: "I reaffirmed to our allies in the region, including South Korea and Japan," the president said in a nationally televised statement, "that the United States will meet the full range of our deterrent and security commitments." It is understood by all that the decades-old American nuclear umbrella in the Pacific Rim commits us to attacking North Korea -- presumably with in-kind nuclear retaliation -- were it to attack our allies first.

Gruesome stuff, but run-of-the-mill in the nuclear age. The hard part is the second marker Bush tried to put down: proliferation deterrence.

We are in an era far more complicated than Kennedy's because his great crisis occurred before the age of terrorism. The world of 1962 was still technologically and ideologically primitive: Miniaturized nuclear weaponry had not yet been invented, nor had modern international terrorism. Yasser Arafat and the Palestine Liberation Organization gave the world that gift half a decade later with their perfection of the political airline hijacking.

Terrorism has since grown in popularity, ambition and menace. Its practitioners are in the market for nuclear weapons. North Korea has little else to sell.

Hence Bush's attempt to codify a second form of deterrence: "The transfer of nuclear weapons or material by North Korea to states or non-state entities would be considered a grave threat to the United States, and we would hold North Korea fully accountable for the consequences of such action."

A good first draft, but it could use some Kennedyesque clarity. The phrase "fully accountable" does not exactly instill fear, as it has been used promiscuously by several administrations in warnings to both terrorists and rogue states -- after which we did absolutely nothing. A better formulation would be the following:

Given the fact that there is no other nuclear power so recklessly in violation of its nuclear obligations, it shall be the policy of this nation to regard any detonation of a nuclear explosive on the United States or its allies as an attack by North Korea on the United States requiring a full retaliatory response upon North Korea.

This is how you keep Kim Jong Il from proliferating. Make him understand that his survival would be hostage to the actions of whatever terrorist group he sold his weapons to. Any terrorist detonation would be assumed to have his address on it. The United States would then return postage. Automaticity of this kind concentrates the mind.

This policy has a hitch, however. It works only in a world where there is but a single rogue nuclear state. Once that club expands to two, the policy evaporates, because a nuclear terror attack would no longer have a single automatic return address.

Which is another reason why keeping Iran from going nuclear is so important. With North Korea there is no going back. But Iran is not there yet. One rogue country is tolerable because it can be held accountable. Two rogue countries guarantees undeterrable and therefore inevitable nuclear terrorism.

Bush Gets Bum Rap (WT)

By Yearn Hong Choi

The Washington Times, October 13, 2006

President Bush has been bombarded by criticism from Democratic politicians and the so-called liberal intellectuals since North Korea announced Monday that it had tested its first nuclear bomb. This is ridiculous. Although Mr. Bush's supposed inaction has been criticized, he has been trying to operate the six-party talks to disarm North Korea. I am not sympathetic to the criticisms, because they should instead be targeting North Korea's Kim Jong-il, as well as China and South Korea, the two nations that have been financing North Korea's nuclear programs indirectly, if not directly.

There is a legitimate question to be asked: Who violated the agreement signed by North Korea and the United States in Geneva in 1994? The United States was faithful to the agreement and supplied heavy oil to North Korea, while South Korea was constructing light water reactors in North Korea. But North Korea was secretly making nuclear bombs, and subsequently disclosed the fact that it has such weapons. Mr. Bush stopped the supply of heavy oil. There was no other way. North Korea was a rogue state. It did not know how to act as a civilized partner to the Agreed Framework signed with the United States 12 years ago. As a matter of fact, North Korea and South Korea had an agreement to keep the Korean Peninsula a nuclear-free zone as early as the 1970s. But Pyongyang did not care about the signed agreement.

North Korea kidnapped South Korean fishermen from the open sea and Japanese citizens from the seashore of Japan, and bombed a South Korean plane. The DPRK sold opium and produced counterfeit U.S. dollars. It has been starving its own people. But it has produced nuclear bomb(s) and long-distance missiles in order to threaten South Korea, Japan and the United States.

How could American liberal intellectuals trust North Korea's Kim Jong-il and distrust Mr. Bush? President Clinton's engagement policy was betrayed by Kim Jong-il, and he has also betrayed South Korea's "Sunshine Policy." The appeasement policy and Sunshine policy just helped the North Korean dictator sustain his power, rather than have his country go bankrupt.

Mr. Bush's understanding of North Korea's dependence on China was admirable. China has always been behind North Korea. Kim Jong-il has been visiting Beijing seeking help, and China has warmly greeted and embraced him. So, China should participate in the six-party talks to change North Korean behavior. Could Mr. Bush have done more? I don't know, China is joining the United States in supporting a U.N. Security Council resolution imposing sanctions on North Korea. It was a good response from Beijing — for the first time. It was a success for Mr. Bush. I appreciate China's new stance towards North Korea, and believe South Korea will follow China's steps. I hope China will keep a distance from its colony-like North Korea, as long as it is an "Animal Farm." China should be proud of its superpower status, and should act accordingly.

Who are liberal intellectuals? They are supposed to admire civil rights of citizens and civil liberties of citizens — not to support the "Animal Farm" of the 21st century. They are supposed to admire freedom of religion, freedom of expression and freedom of movement. There are no such things in North Korea. That is why it is a rogue state.

Why don't they want regime change in North Korea — something they should be advocating? There is no way to negotiate with a man like Kim Jong-il.

The United States has limited power to punish the North Korean dictator beyond rhetoric and U.N. sanctions, however effective they may be. Should the United States target a North Korean nuclear-weapons production site, South Korea will beg Washington not to carry out an attack because of concern that Pyongyang will retaliate against its southern neighbor. Under the circumstances, South Korea has been the North Korean dictator's hostage. Former South Korean President Kim Dae-jung and current President Roh Moo-hyun have been trying to "please" Kim Jong-il. They have been pathetic. They have been seeking Kim Jong-il's mercy.

Former Secretary of Defense William Perry should know that whatever conciliatory actions South Korean people made to North Korea have failed. Washington should expect the same result from dealing with North Korea: betrayal. Mr. Bush should not be blamed for "inaction." He worked hard to establish the six-party talks to disarm North Korea's nuclear weapons. Now, China is doing something good with regard to North Korea.

General: U.S. Has Troops To Fight N. Korea (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — The U.S. military's top officer said Thursday that the Pentagon would have sufficient forces to win if called on to fight a war in North Korea, but the conflict would be more difficult without the intelligence and guidance systems devoted to Iraq and Afghanistan.

Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said that about 200,000 U.S. troops were deployed in Iraq and Afghanistan, leaving more than 2 million troops available for a war in Asia.

Pace said a conflict with North Korea, which both he and President Bush have said is highly unlikely, would rely heavily on the Navy and Air Force because of the significant deployment of land forces in Iraq. In addition, such an attack would not be "as clean as we would like," he said, because guidance systems used to aim bombs were in use in the Middle East.

"You wouldn't have the precision in combat going to a second theater of war that you would if you were only going to the first theater of war," Pace told a group of military reporters. "You end up dropping more bombs potentially to get the job done, and it would mean more brute force."

Although Pace did not name specific guidance and intelligence systems, Air Force officers have said they do not have surveillance aircraft such as Global Hawk and Predator reconnaissance drones available for East Asia because of their heavy use in Iraq and Afghanistan. The unmanned aircraft are used to spy on enemy territory.

Pace said a war in Asia would further strain U.S. troop rotations.

Pentagon officials have acknowledged in recent weeks that the Army is struggling to maintain a rotation that allows troops to return home for a year before redeploying to Iraq and Afghanistan. A third major conflict, Pace said, would probably end such yearlong respites.

One senior Pentagon official said if there were another war, most troops currently in Iraq would be forced into extended deployments, while those preparing to be sent to the Middle East would go to Asia.

Pace said the U.S. government had not confirmed whether North Korea tested a nuclear weapon, as the government in Pyongyang claimed.

The general said that even with nuclear capability, North Korea would be more worrisome to the U.S. military as a source of nuclear materials for terrorists than as a potential military foe.

Another U.S. official said intelligence agencies were still gathering data to determine whether the test blast, small by atomic standards, was a nuclear detonation.

"The working assumption has been, and continues to be, that they tried to conduct a nuclear test and that it didn't go particularly well, that it was more fizzle than pop," the official said.

Analysts think the explosion was smaller than initially reported — generating the force of perhaps as little as 200 tons of TNT, a fraction of the power of the atomic bombs the United States dropped on Japan more than 60 years ago.

U.S. intelligence officials cautioned that the shock waves from the North Korean explosion could have been muffled if the underground test site was surrounded by caverns and tunnels that absorbed the bomb's force.

Officials said there was no confirmation of a nuclear test pending the longer-than-expected collection of atmospheric samples over Japan, downwind from the blast. The samples will be analyzed for the presence of nuclear fallout.

"It depends on meteorological conditions, and it turns out that they were not very favorable," said Daniela Rozgonova, a spokeswoman for the Vienna-based Comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban Treaty Organization. "It can take weeks."

If North Korea contained the fallout from the blast, as the country claimed, it might not be possible to confirm that it was a nuclear explosion, officials said.

Weighing Carrots Or Sticks For North Korea (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen And Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

As U.S. Weighs Response To Pyongyang, Both Parties Trade Blame for Failed Diplomacy

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration has a simple explanation for why it won't restart one-on-one talks with North Korea to persuade Pyongyang to abandon its nuclear weapons program:

"Bilateral negotiations didn't work. I appreciate the efforts of previous administrations. It just didn't work," President Bush said Wednesday, referring to the Clinton administration's years of talks with North Korea. "And therefore I thought it was important to change how we approached the problem."

Since North Korea claimed a successful nuclear detonation early this week, Democrats and Republicans have traded barbs about which administration bears more responsibility for allowing the reclusive country to acquire such weapons.

Republicans accused the Clinton administration of failing to take tough steps in the 1990s to persuade North Korea to abandon its nuclear-weapons program. Democrats say Mr. Bush's refusal to engage Pyongyang drove North Korea to accelerate that program, culminating in the announced test this week.

"It's difficult to say that the Clinton policy failed, but it's crystal clear that the current policy has failed," said Larry Wilkerson, who was chief of staff to former Secretary of State Colin Powell. "You need a carrot-and-stick approach -- you can't just use the stick."

Neither approach has succeeded, underscoring the challenges for the U.S. and its allies in deciding how to respond to the test, and ultimately, how to get Pyongyang to stop its nuclear program.

Yesterday, the U.S. and key Asian partners remained divided over how to proceed. U.S. diplomats circulated a draft Security Council resolution that, among other measures, calls for international inspections of cargo coming in or out of North Korea to prevent the transfer of weapons-related material. U.S. officials said they want to see the resolution brought to a vote today, but Russia and China said they prefer delaying the vote to allow more time for arriving at an international consensus.

China opposes the cargo inspection measure and doesn't like that the American draft resolution comes under Chapter 7 of the U.N. charter, which would preserve the option of military action against North Korea. China wants the resolution to be introduced under Article 41, which permits only nonmilitary sanctions.

A senior Chinese envoy, State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan, met with Mr. Bush and members of the president's national security team in Washington yesterday to discuss China's preference for more moderate sanctions.

The disagreements over what to do next are being shaped, in part, by the various assessments of what happened the last time the U.S. tried direct negotiations with the North Koreans.

National-security experts from both parties say the Clinton approach of engaging in talks succeeded in temporarily lowering tensions between the two sides and curbing North Korea's nuclear ambitions. Some argue that the U.S. should, for this reason, resume talks while also preparing punitive measures that could be used if Pyongyang refused to alter course.

In 1993, North Korea threatened to withdraw from the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. The Clinton administration, fearing that Pyongyang was close to deploying nuclear weapons, considered a pre-emptive military strike. President Clinton ordered the Pentagon to craft plans to send tens of thousands of additional U.S. forces to South Korea, along with war planes and other combat vehicles.

At the same time, the Clinton administration began negotiations with Pyongyang, which culminated in a 1994 deal. The so-called Agreed Framework provided a blueprint for gradually normalizing relations between the U.S. and North Korea. It called for Pyongyang to halt efforts to build nuclear weapons, and in return, the U.S. would help build two light-water reactors for power generation and provide North Korea with hundreds of thousands of tons of heavy fuel oil.

Key parts of the deal held for eight years: North Korea halted its plutonium-reprocessing work and allowed international inspectors to return. But other aspects of the agreement frayed. A Republican sweep of Congress weeks after the signing of the deal undermined the Clinton administration's ability to implement it.

Congressional opposition to building the light-water reactors delayed their construction for several years. The U.S. and its allies ended the program earlier this year without completing either plant. The U.S. suspended shipments of the heavy fuel oil in November 2002 and did little to normalize ties between the two countries.

Supporters of the Clinton administration's approach say its strength was that it prioritized the threats North Korea posed to U.S. national security interests and systematically sought to address them. They say the Agreed Framework stopped Pyongyang's most advanced nuclear program, using plutonium fuel, and secured a promise from North Korean leader Kim Jong Il in 2000 to shelve missile tests. Officials had hoped to build on these gains to address other security challenges posed by North Korea, particularly its illicit businesses, human-rights abuses, and its placement of conventional forces within striking distance of the South Korean capital of Seoul.

The Bush administration's approach, in contrast, has tried to address all the issues at once and -- critics say -- resolved none. Some current and former U.S. diplomats say the Bush administration's hard-line approach has resulted in Pyongyang restarting its plutonium-based nuclear program and its missile tests. And there are no signs that Pyongyang plans to address the other issues.

"My biggest concern has always been the nukes," said one State Department official who has worked on Korea policy during both administrations. "But if you allow these other issues to distract from the most important one, you'll get nowhere. And this has happened."

The Clinton approach wasn't a total success, either, analysts note. Both critics and supporters say it failed to spur North Korea to decisively abandon its nuclear-weapons ambitions. U.S. intelligence officials now believe that North Korea launched a secret uranium enrichment program a few years after signing the 1994 agreement.

That agreement formally collapsed when the Bush administration confronted Pyongyang in October 2002 with evidence of its secret nuclear-weapons program and North Korea acknowledged its existence.

"It's true that we've talked to our enemies in the past, but I don't know if it would do a ... bit of good because North Korea hasn't shown any willingness to give up its nuclear program once and for all," said David Asher, a former senior State Department official.

After North Korea conducted what it said was a nuclear test Sunday, many Republicans blamed the Agreed Framework negotiated by the Clinton administration -- under which a five-megawatt reactor was shut down and spent fuel rods were kept under 24-hour international supervision -- for causing the problem. But in 2003, after North Korea was discovered to have violated the agreement and the Bush administration terminated it, then-Secretary of State Colin S. Powell told The Washington Post:

"The previous administration I give great credit to for freezing that plutonium site. Lots of nuclear weapons were not made because of the Agreed Framework and the work of President Clinton and his team."

US No-talks Policy Comes Under Fire (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON

President Bush has made his stance clear: The US doesn't negotiate directly with its enemies.

But after North Korea's apparent nuclear test this week - and problems with getting severe sanctions approved by the UN - that stance is now setting off a vigorous debate.

"In my view, it is not appeasement to talk to your enemies," James Baker, secretary of State for the former President Bush, said this week.

In key election states, the Republican National Committee is offering a different view. It's airing TV ads showing Madeleine Albright, secretary of State for former President Clinton, clinking glasses with Kim Jong Il and presenting the North Korean dictator with a basketball signed by Michael Jordan. Its point: "basketball diplomacy" doesn't work.

The debate shows how the White House's policy of not directly engaging adversaries - whether North Korea, Iran, Syria, or organizations like the Palestinians' Hamas and Lebanon's Hizbullah - is under intensifying fire, including from friendly circles.

Now is probably not the moment for the United States to approve the kind of bilateral negotiations North Korea wants, many agree. "There's going to have to be a timeout chair for North Korea," says Michael Green, who served as Asia director in the Bush White House's National Security Council until last December.

But others say the North Korea nuclear crisis, following questionable US diplomacy on this summer's war in Lebanon and a stalemate with Iran over its nuclear ambitions, is raising new challenges for the Bush administration's "no-talk-with- enemies" diplomatic approach.

"The reason we're hearing so much about this right now is that the policies towards Iran and North Korea are not working," says Geoffrey Kemp, a national security expert at the Nixon Center in Washington.

The Bush administration in its second term has embraced "multilateralism" - six-party talks with North Korea and the European Union as a go-between with Iran - without accepting direct talks with parties President Bush has termed "evil," Kemp says.

He adds, "if the multilateral approach is not going anywhere either, that really does lead you back to bilateral discussions."

Some appear to think snubbing adversaries was invented by the Bush White House, while the more adamant Bush advocates would have us believe the Clinton White House never had a foreign enemy it didn't cozy up to. But some say the seesaw of pragmatic engagement with adversaries balancing a moralistic refusal to talk has been teeter-tottering at least since the triumph of the Bolshevik revolution.

"There is a moralist streak in American foreign policy, this idea that you don't talk to bad people, that is not new," says Kemp, who served on the National Security Council in the Reagan White House.

Indeed President Reagan was famous for calling the Soviet Union "the evil empire" - but then embracing Mikhail Gorbachev, saying "I can work with this guy." Kemp says the Reagan administration was "initially standoffish" towards the Soviet Union and took years to receive a Soviet leader. But things changed, he adds, after the president was "won over by the leading pragmatists around him - those being Nancy Reagan and George Schulz."

For years it was taboo for US leaders to speak with the Palestinian Liberation Organization - so much so that Andrew Young lost his job as US ambassador to the United Nations for doing just that. Kemp remembered Alexander Haig's first Middle East trip as secretary of state, when Mr. Haig's insistence that he wouldn't stop in Damascus became the trip's major topic.

The seesaw tipped by the time Clinton took office when PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat, having renounced the doctrine of Israel's destruction, was a repeat visitor to the White House and "official visits to Damascus were almost every hour on the hour," Kemp quips.

In a news conference Wednesday President Bush fielded questions about his refusal to directly engage with Kim Jong Il's regime, saying the Clinton administration's approach "just didn't work."

Clinton administration officials refute this. Ms. Albright said in a statement Wednesday that "through our policy of constructive engagement, the world was safer" because North Korea did not develop new nuclear weapons or proceed to a nuclear test. Former Clinton Defense Secretary William Perry said it's a "lost cause" for the the US to try to deal with North Korea unless it agrees to one-on-one talks.

Bush emphasized Wednesday that his approach to North Korea is to rely on diplomacy. That suggests the debate over talking or not talking comes down to a definition of diplomacy. Administration hard-liners have argued against direct talks with the North because they say it would legitimize an abhorrent regime. But critics of the Bush approach say diplomacy is not only about dealing with allies.

Kurt Campbell, who served in both the White House and Pentagon under Clinton, says he would not "view diplomacy as a gift or as something we bestow on others, but [as] really designed for dealing with bad people on issues you care about."

Still, for others, the attraction of the Bush approach is not that it shuns talking, but that it offers talks in the context of broader bilateral negotiations - so that success or failure does not ride exclusively on American shoulders.

"The question is how do you rein in rogue regimes, and in the case of both North Korea and Iran the Bush administration has this exactly right," says Raymond Tanter, a professor at Georgetown University in Washington who served under the first President Bush.

Mr. Tanter says the Clinton administration's engagement with North Korea did not prevent the North from cheating, and exposed the US to the full blame for that. "But if North Korea is cheating on five countries, that isolates them much more, it prevents them from blaming just the US," he adds, "and it makes them subject to the weight of the international community."

White House Reverts To Cold War Containment (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, October 13, 2006

Lacking a viable military option in dealing with a nuclear North Korea or Iran, the Bush administration is adopting a cold war-style strategy of containment and deterrence that does not completely close the door on negotiated settlements.

While analysts and diplomats in Washington do not rule out the possibility of US military strikes against Iran – some even wager a better than 50 per cent chance by next summer – there is a sense that the Bush doctrine of pre-emptive or preventive war is buried in the wreckage of Iraq.

There will be tough bargaining at the UN as the Bush administration seeks the legitimacy afforded by Security Council resolutions to press sanctions.

But the success of US strategy in both regions will depend more on developing ad hoc coalitions of allies and overcoming opposition from China and Russia.

Imposition of financial and trade sanctions, freezing of assets, international isolation through travel bans and interceptions of cargo at sea will be accompanied by efforts to strengthen the military capabilities of allies. This means closer military cooperation with the Gulf Arab states and a sympathetic ear to suggestions by Japan's new government that it might rewrite the postwar pacifist constitution.

Interviews with US officials, who asked not to be identified, reveal that the liberation theology that dominated the post-September 11 2001 discourse, notably President George W. Bush's second inaugural speech last year, has given way to a more pragmatic approach.

The shift is so pronounced that both neoconservatives and liberal hawks among Democrats are alarmed that the Bush administration's apparent embrace of realpolitik will mean abandoning promises made to oppressed peoples while entering into nuclear-reduction deals with the Iranian and North Korean regimes.

Beyond the US, more than 100 Arab and Muslim activists have written to Mr Bush calling on him to reaffirm his commitment to sustained democratic reform in the Arab world. They write that autocrats are intensifying their repression, emboldened by the impression that the US is wavering.

Reinforcing such impressions, one US official even suggested the administration would be willing to negotiate trade-offs at the UN in parallel discussions over North Korea, Iran and Sudan. "There are competing interests," he said.

Cliff Kupchan, analyst at the Eurasia Group consultancy, sees the Bush administration groping for an alternative to the "binary choice" of living with a nuclear Iran or staging surgical strikes.

"This administration has not reconciled itself to a nuclear Iran, but it has with North Korea," he says. But he sees any containment strategy – should it exist – complicated by a serious deterioration in the US relationship with Russia.

According to one senior US official, pressure on Iran cannot change the regime, but it might buttress the more pragmatic forces in Tehran who want to negotiate a settlement with the US.

Although the US has moved in the direction of talking to Iran – to the relief of its European allies – it still rejects one-on-one negotiations and insists that the Iranians first suspend their nuclear fuel programme.

Similarly with North Korea, the US is resisting direct talks outside the six-party process that has stalled for nearly a year. Responding to its claim of a nuclear test on Monday, the US is speaking the language of isolation and deterrence.

"Well, I think the North Koreans know that firing a nuclear missile, shall we say, would not be good for North Korean security," Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, stated.

"The North Koreans are not confused about what it would mean to launch a nuclear attack against the United States, one of our allies or somebody in the neighbourhood."

John Hillen, assistant secretary of state for political and military affairs, is leading the push for a "new security architecture" in the Persian Gulf to counter the perceived threat from Iran. This involves beefed up military co-operation, including big ticket hardware sales, with Arab states in the Gulf Co-operation Council who are enjoying the windfall from higher oil prices.

Not surprisingly, the Arab states that feared both the wrath of the US and the threat of Islamist extremists after September 11 welcome such solicitations.

But Emile El-Hokayem, analyst at the Stimson Center in Washington, says the Arab Gulf states have a predicament. He recalls that Qatar, which hosts a US military base, was the only Security Council member not to vote in favour of the July 31 resolution demanding that Iran stop its uranium enrichment.

He also argues that a containment strategy relying heavily on a build-up of GCC military capabilities could backfire "by validating Iran's security concerns and justifying Tehran's need for a deterrent".

A less adventurist foreign policy would be welcomed by the US public, according to a poll by the Chicago Council on Global Affairs. Three out of four Americans feel the US is overdoing the job of global policeman, only 17 per cent rank spreading democracy as an important foreign policy goal, while 61 per cent say the war in Iraq has not reduced the threat of terrorism.

In Iran, Two Power Centers Vie Amid Standoff Over Nuclear Fuel (WSJ)

By Bill Spindle

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

TEHRAN, Iran -- As the West debates how to deal with North Korea after its defiant nuclear test, another atomic confrontation awaits the world's attention, the showdown with Iran. In some ways, it is even trickier.

Both nations' leaders taunt America with bombastic rhetoric. But unlike Kim Jong Il's North Korea, Iran isn't a one-man dictatorship. Contrary to a common view of an Iran as being firmly in the hands of its fiery president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, Iran is torn by competing power centers that wage a daily battle for supremacy.

On one side is a mostly youthful group of fundamentalist hard-liners, typified by Mr. Ahmadinejad, who are determined to keep the revolutionary spirit vibrant. On the other is Iran's elite class of clerics, aging former revolutionaries and businessmen -- also deeply conservative and wary of reform, but far less interested in confronting the world and risking the isolation of their country.

Typifying this less-recognized power center is Iran's tough but suave chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani. He is a fluent English speaker whose appointment to the critical negotiating role was seen inside Iran as a way to counterbalance the mercurial president.

Mr. Ahmadinejad tries to shake things up and sometimes succeeds, says Nassar Hadian, a political-science professor at Tehran University, "but the entire establishment of Iran is opposed to him."

Both factions vow to proceed with Iran's uranium enrichment program, which they insist is solely for peaceful purposes. Both also seek a bigger role for Iran in the regional and world stages. But they have quite different ideas about how to achieve it and about just what kind of role Iran should play in the world.

President Ahmadinejad's group favors confrontation with the West, figuring Russia and China will never back tough sanctions but instead will always offer Iran access to world markets. Iran's more traditional and establishment conservatives, by contrast, put emphasis on maintaining economic and political ties to the West, and perhaps even opening some sort of dialogue with the U.S.

All this makes for a complicated task facing the United Nations Security Council as it tries to hash out sanctions over Iran, following its defiance of an Aug. 31 U.N. deadline to accept economic incentives in exchange for giving up nuclear-fuel enrichment. The U.S. argues that only the pressure of tough sanctions will induce Iran's hard-liners to back down. Others argue that lowering tensions, perhaps by direct U.S.-Iran dialogue, would bolster pragmatic Iranian leaders who don't want to see the country outside the international fold.

The two strains of Iranian conservatism wrangle endlessly, from the oil ministry to the parliament to the backrooms where much authority really rests. Establishment conservatives have often checked the 50-year-old Mr. Ahmadinejad's ambitious plans for change. For instance, parliament ignored his drive to overhaul the oil ministry, the spigot for 80% of Iran's export income. Parliament rejected three attempts by Mr. Ahmadinejad to place loyalists as oil minister.

But Mr. Ahmadinejad has stretched the limited powers of the presidency with bombast and provocative rhetoric, thereby sometimes managing to dominate policy decisions, especially on the nuclear issue. His ability to create public furors, such as by taunting Israel and questioning the Holocaust, have brought him Western condemnation but a burst of popularity in the Muslim world. The result has been to further his agenda of defiance, as the West's negative reaction creates a sense in Iran that it is under siege and thus shouldn't give ground.

"He's tried to provoke a crisis in order to achieve better control," says Saeed Laylaz, a political analyst in Tehran.

Mr. Ahmadinejad isn't Iran's top official. That is Ali Khamenei, 67, the Supreme Leader. He gets the last word, and everyone in the system pays homage to him. But Ayatollah Khamenei is a power broker who tests the political winds in the country and moves carefully with them.

It wasn't many years ago that Iran's big political battles pitted hard-liners against liberal reformers pushing democracy and social freedom. The champion of reform, Mohammed Khatami, was president for eight years until 2005 but delivered little change. Liberals lost control first of parliament and then of the presidency. Conservatives have been in the clear ascendancy since President Ahmadinejad's election last year.

But it didn't take long after that for tensions in the conservative camp to emerge. Ayatollah Khamenei appointed Mr. Larijani -- from the camp opposite to the president-elect -- to oversee Iran's nuclear negotiations, as Secretary of the Supreme National Security Council.

Ayatollah Khamenei had backed Mr. Larijani in the presidential race just weeks earlier. His appointment was seen as a signal the nuclear portfolio would be kept out of Mr. Ahmadinejad's control.

Mr. Larijani is as close to an establishment blue-blood as there is here. He is the son of a Grand Ayatollah, the pinnacle of the Shiite Muslim world's religious hierarchy. He and his three brothers were reared in protected religious centers and have held various high political positions over many years. He is married to a daughter of a famous Iranian cleric and is close to the powerful speaker of Iran's parliament.

Refined and intellectual, Mr. Larijani, 49, has studied math, computer science and Western philosophy. In his last role, heading the government broadcasting operation, he introduced sports and entertainment channels -- in addition to a bigger stream of state propaganda and religious programming -- as the regime tried to keep up with satellite TV that is spreading in Iran despite being illegal.

Like the president, Mr. Larijani is a true believer in the Iranian Revolution, say diplomats who know him. "He's a real hard-liner, purely in it for the survival of the regime," says a European diplomat who's been involved with the nuclear talks. He strikes diplomats as a smooth conveyor of a steely message. "In the way Larijani acts and talks, even the way he walks...he is the opposite of a populist or a demagogue," says another European diplomat who has dealt with him in the current talks.

It's a contrast to Mr. Ahmadinejad's public embrace of U.S. antagonists like Venezuela. Mr. Larijani has talked up another model for Iran: India, a nation that, even while developing nuclear weapons, has deepened its ties with the U.S. and international community.

Ayatollah Khamenei, the Supreme Leader who made Mr. Larijani the nuclear negotiator, has nonetheless not stopped Mr. Ahmadinejad from speaking out on the nuclear issue. And Mr. Ahmadinejad has proved adept at using his pulpit to influence the Supreme Leader.

Mr. Khamenei got the top position in a period of intense political maneuvering following Ayatollah Khomeini's death in 1989. Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, the late hero of the 1979 revolution, had fused, in the Supreme Leader role, the Islamic Republic's two founding values: religious faith and revolutionary spirit.

The Supreme Leader enforces the values through a network that includes the judiciary, the military and the Guardian and Expediency Councils. The 12-member Guardian Council, whose membership is controlled by the Supreme Leader, is especially powerful: It decides who is allowed to run for office, and it has overturned hundreds of laws passed by parliament.

Ayatollah Khamenei after 1997 went along with some moves by the reformist president then in office to relax political and social rules. But by 2004, the Supreme Leader was working with conservatives to oust the reformers.

Critics of Mr. Ahmadinejad believe he has used the crisis atmosphere of nuclear dealings to offer Ayatollah Khamenei something that previously eluded him: a chance to make Iran a leader in the wider Muslim world. They say this dynamic gives Mr. Ahmadinejad pull with the ayatollah on nuclear issues, where the president has little formal role.

Critics of the radical president worry that his clout may be growing, based on two key diplomatic exchanges this year.

One was in March, when Mr. Larijani announced Iran was willing to discuss Iraq with the U.S. Mr. Ahmadinejad and his backers attacked the idea bitterly in speeches and newspaper editorials. Ayatollah Khamenei publicly backed Mr. Larijani. But it turned out the U.S., whose offer to talk had been on the table for months, had by this time lost interest. Mr. Ahmadinejad then stole Mr. Larijani's thunder by writing a rambling letter to Mr. Bush that renewed Iran's defiant stance -- and that spoke to a wider Muslim populace angry with America.

Mr. Larijani fared worse in the second exchange. It involved the U.N.'s Aug. 31 deadline for Iran to give up uranium enrichment in return for economic benefits. After the deadline passed with no compliance by Iran, President Ahmadinejad sent one of his top aides to Paris to meet French President Jacques Chirac. Among issues they would discuss was Lebanon, where France was reluctant to contribute to a U.N. peacekeeping force because of the risk of coming into conflict with Hezbollah. Iran has long supported and advised that group.

Just two days later, Mr. Larijani was talking about a softer line on the nuclear issue. As before, President Ahmadinejad was assailing the softer line. Ayatollah Khamenei remained silent. Soon, Mr. Larijani gave up discussing any sort of enrichment suspension, in what appeared to be a tactical victory for Mr. Ahmadinejad.

Yet, the struggle for power over Iran's policy has hardly ended. And as always, it's taking place in the larger context of the establishment's attempts to keep Mr. Ahmadinejad in check. Consider a recent move by a former president of Iran, Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, a man who is hard to categorize politically but is surely part of the Iranian establishment.

Mr. Rafsanjani is a man Mr. Ahmadinejad defeated in the 2005 presidential vote. He also is a candidate for the Assembly of Experts, a panel that could have a big say over who becomes the next Supreme Leader.

This month, Mr. Rafsanjani released a secret letter that the late Ayatollah Khomeini wrote almost two decades ago, explaining why he was willing to end the eight-year war with Saddam Hussein's Iraq short of victory. Ayatollah Khomeini said military officers had told him that to continue, they would need far more firepower, perhaps even a nuclear weapon. A newspaper close to Mr. Rafsanjani then editorialized that Ayatollah Khomeini was wise not to let his revolutionary ideology get in the way of "a realistic understanding of the international situation." For Mr. Rafsanjani's supporters, the message was unmistakable: Today's Iran, too, should proceed with caution and pragmatism.

Mr. Ahmadinejad now is striking back. He spent much of the week denouncing Mr. Rafsanjani for releasing the letter. He also put his right-hand aide into a key position in the Interior Ministry -- one that oversees Iran's elections.

Iran Defies Call To Drop Nuclear Plans (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

TEHRAN, Oct. 12 — The Iranian leadership is vowing to continue to defy an international demand to stop nuclear activities while refusing to condemn North Korea for its reported test of a small nuclear device.

Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, said in a speech on Tuesday that Iran would continue its uranium enrichment program, asserting, as other senior Iranian leaders have done, that the program was intended for peaceful civilian purposes.

He said the decision was made easier by the fact that Iran voluntarily suspended enrichment three years ago, a cooperative gesture that proved fruitless. "If we had not experienced that path, perhaps we would have criticized ourselves today," he said. "But now we will pursue with a strong heart."

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said in a speech on Tuesday that Iran would "continue its path of dignity based on resistance, wisdom and without fear."

The government spokesman, Gholam Hossein Elham, while saying that "Iran opposes any use of weapons of mass destruction," nevertheless blamed the United States for the nuclear test that North Korea said it conducted Monday. "The root cause of this should be sought in the policy, behavior and method adopted by the rulers of the United States," he said Tuesday in his weekly news conference.

It appeared that Iran was emboldened by North Korea's action, and what seemed to be light penalties proposed Wednesday in the United Nations Security Council. Iran and North Korea face possible Security Council sanctions over nuclear activities.

"It looks like the message of North Korea's test for Iran was that it can also continue its program," said Saeed Leylaz, an economist and political analyst in Tehran. "They felt that if they act forcefully and confrontationally, they can also proceed with their program like North Korea."

Iran, unlike North Korea, contends that its program is for civilian purposes, and Ayatollah Khamenei has repeatedly spoken out against nuclear weapons. Although Iran's facilities are visited by inspectors from the International Atomic Energy Agency, the United States contends that Tehran is using its civilian nuclear activities as a cover for a nuclear weapons program.

In an editorial on Tuesday, Kargozaran, a moderate daily newspaper, said North Korea could proceed with its program because it had China as its ally.

"The international community was less tough with North Korea, which has a nuclear bomb, than with Iran, which does not have a nuclear bomb," the newspaper said.

Iranians were mixed about whether Iran should continue with its nuclear program.

Some said they felt strongly that their country should pursue nuclear weapons, and dismissed efforts by the United States to halt proliferation. "A country that has nuclear bombs has no right to tell other countries that they should not have one," said Javad

Tabatabai, a retired schoolteacher, as he browsed at a newsstand in north Tehran. "We are a superpower in the region, and no one will dare to stop our program."

Others said just as strongly that Iran should give up the quest. "People are hungry," said Armin Manouchehri, a 33-year-old mechanic. "Why do we need a nuclear program when the government is not capable of controlling the inflation?" Inflation is running in double digits in Iran, with items like bread and fuel rising even more.

Some people said they feared that the Security Council might be even tougher on Iran now. "North Korea's tests will make the West more sensitive toward Iran because Iran is in a more sensitive place in the Middle East than North Korea," said Fazl ali Mahmoudi, 80, a pharmacist. "I am afraid that our leaders' policies would drag the country to the brink of war."

Israeli Forces Kill At Least 7 Palestinians In Gaza Fighting (WP)

By Scott Wilson, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 12 -- Israeli forces killed at least seven Palestinians on Thursday in the Gaza Strip during hours of sporadic ground fighting and airstrikes. Five of those killed were from a single family.

Israeli military officials said forces entered the strip before dawn near the central Gaza city of Khan Younis in search of cross-border tunnels that Palestinian armed groups use for smuggling.

The troops were fired on soon after, Israeli military officials said, and returned fire during a series of small-scale attacks for the next few hours. In addition to the dead, at least 11 Palestinians were reported wounded in the exchanges.

The most severe strike occurred when an Israeli military aircraft, which Palestinian witnesses identified as an Apache attack helicopter, fired on ground targets near the eastern border town of Abassan.

Palestinian medics reported that five members of the Gdaih family were killed in the strike, including three gunmen from the Izzedine al-Qassam Brigades, Hamas's military arm. The two others were identified as Adel Gdaih, 40, and his 13-year-old son, Suhaib. Witnesses said they were unarmed.

An Israeli airstrike in the Shajaiyeh neighborhood of Gaza City killed at least two Palestinians and injured four others just after nightfall, according to Palestinian health officials. The target was the home of Ashraf Forwana, a Hamas gunman, who was not there at the time.

One of those killed was an 8-year-old girl, hospital officials said, and the other was Forwana's 40-year-old brother. It was unclear whether he was affiliated with Hamas's military wing.

Israel seized Gaza in the 1967 Middle East war but evacuated its settlements and military posts there last year. Israeli forces reentered the strip after the June 25 capture of an army corporal in a cross-border raid carried out by Hamas's military wing and two smaller armed groups at war with the Jewish state.

Negotiations are underway to exchange the captured Israeli soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, for some of the roughly 8,500 Palestinians being held in Israeli jails.

The Palestinian Health Ministry reports that the Israeli military operation, known as Summer Rains, has killed 290 Palestinians, including at least 35 children. International and Israeli human rights agencies also put the number of dead at more than 200, many of them civilians.

Israeli forces are also operating in northern Gaza to stop the firing of crude rockets into southern Israel. At least five rockets landed in southern Israel in the hours after the fighting, including one that disrupted electrical service in the city of Sderot. No injuries were reported.

Special correspondent Islam Abdelkareem in Gaza contributed to this report.

Israeli Operations In Gaza Leave 8 Dead (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, October 13, 2006

JERUSALEM — Israeli forces killed eight people in separate operations in the Gaza Strip on Thursday, Palestinian officials said, as militants fired several rockets into southern Israel.

Six people were killed in the southern Gaza Strip during an Israeli operation early in the day near the town of Khan Yunis.

DOJ_NMG_0080298

At least three of those killed in the clashes were identified as fighters belonging to the military wing of Hamas, the ruling Palestinian movement. The others were bystanders, including a man and his 13-year-old son, who were from the same extended family as the slain militants, neighbors said.

Two people, including a 2-year-old girl, died Thursday night during an Israeli airstrike on a house on the eastern edge of Gaza City, Palestinian officials said.

The strike, which targeted the home of Ashraf Farwana, a senior Hamas militant, also killed his 38-year-old brother, Ayman. Israeli officials said Ashraf Farwana had been involved in attacks against Israel and was making and distributing weapons to Hamas militants.

The eight fatalities marked the highest one-day death toll stemming from Israeli military actions in more than a month. At least 13 Palestinians were wounded in the Khan Yunis clashes and seven others were hurt in the evening airstrike in the Shajaiyeh neighborhood, hospital officials in Khan Yunis and Gaza City said.

Hamas responded to the morning raid by firing at least six Kassam rockets toward Israel, and four made it over the border, the Israeli army said. The rocket salvos caused no injuries and only minor damage to farms, the military said.

The Israeli operation began before dawn Thursday in the village of Abasan, just outside Khan Yunis.

An Israeli spokeswoman said troops were searching for cross-border tunnels and "any kind of terror threat." But Palestinian officials said they suspected that the Israelis were after a Hamas militant living in the area.

The army said soldiers shot at Palestinian gunmen who had fired on them with rifles and antitank missiles. The spokeswoman said the troops believed they had struck gunmen during at least three separate encounters.

Later, an Israeli aircraft fired a missile at a group of armed men who approached the soldiers on the ground, the military said. Palestinians said the missile killed the three militants, all from the Qudeh clan, and that a second projectile hit a house, killing the man and his son.

Israel has conducted sporadic raids since launching a broad incursion into the Gaza Strip after militants killed two soldiers and captured a third by tunneling under the border June 25. Hamas claimed partial responsibility for the cross-border raid.

The fate of the abducted soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, remains unknown. Mediation efforts to win his release as part of a prisoner exchange with Israel have so far failed.

The military operations since June have left more than 200 Palestinians dead.

Hamas is locked in a power struggle with the once-dominant Fatah movement of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. Negotiations over a coalition government have bogged down over Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel.

Abbas and Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh last month said they had agreed on an alliance. But the deal unraveled, and clashes last week between the two factions left 10 dead and ratcheted up a feeling of lawlessness on the streets of the Gaza Strip and West Bank.

On Thursday, a 30-year-old Palestinian intelligence officer died after being wounded in a shooting in Gaza City. Last month, gunmen in Gaza killed Jad Tayeh, a ranking Palestinian intelligence officer.

French Pass Bill That Punishes Denial Of Armenian Genocide (NYT)

By Thomas Crampton

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

PARIS, Oct. 12 — The National Assembly, defying appeals from Turkey, approved legislation Thursday that would make it a crime to deny that the mass killings of Armenians in Turkey during and after World War I were genocide.

The legislation, which was criticized by Turkey's government and some European Union officials, could further complicate talks for Turkey's admission to the Union.

With 106 deputies voting in favor and 19 against, the law sets fines of up to 45,000 euros, or about $56,000, and a year in prison for denying the genocide. Of the 577 members of the Assembly, 4 abstained and 448 did not vote at all, raising the question of whether there would be enough political will to push the law through the Senate.

Scholars and most Western governments have recognized the killing of more than a million Armenians by Ottoman Turks from 1915 to 1919 as genocide. But the subject is still taboo in Turkey, and charges have been pressed against writers and others who have brought attention to the genocide, including Orhan Pamuk, who was just awarded the Nobel Prize in literature.

"The Turkish people refuse the limitation of freedom of expression on the basis of groundless claims," the Turkish Foreign Ministry said in a statement. "With this draft law, France unfortunately loses its privileged status in the eyes of Turkish public opinion."

Ali Babacan, the Turkish economy minister and the country's lead negotiator on talks with Europe, said he could not rule out consequences for French companies.

"What happened in France today, we believe, is not in line with the core values of the European Union," Mr. Babacan said, adding that the government would not encourage a boycott of French goods.

In Brussels, the European Union warned that the law could have a harmful effect on negotiations. "It would prohibit dialogue which is necessary for reconciliation on the issue," said Krisztina Nagy, a spokeswoman for the Union. "It is not up to law to write history. Historians need to have debate."

Turkey's potential membership in the European Union has been a hot political topic here ahead of the presidential elections next spring. The leading candidates to succeed President Jacques Chirac, including Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy and Ségolène Royal, have agreed that Turkey must acknowledge the genocide before gaining membership. But the new legislation has been more of a campaign issue in France, which has one of Europe's largest Armenian populations.

Although most of France's top politicians supported the European Union's planned constitution, the French rejected it last year in a referendum that was also seen as a vote against further European expansion. The problem for politicians seeking to succeed Mr. Chirac is how to oppose Turkish entry without taking on the xenophobic tones of the far right.

After the vote, Mr. Chirac's government, which opposed the legislation, expressed eagerness for dialogue with Turkey and said the bill was unnecessary and inopportune. "We are very committed to dialogue with Turkey, as well as to the strong ties of friendship and cooperation which link us to that country," said Jean-Baptiste Mattéi, a spokesman for the Foreign Ministry.

Ms. Royal, who is the leading Socialist candidate for president, has loudly supported the bill. On Wednesday, she reiterated that "obviously," Turkey would have to recognize the genocide, and added, "My opinion is that of the French people."

Two other senior Socialists, Dominique Strauss-Kahn and Jack Lang, had reservations about the bill.

On the center right, Mr. Sarkozy has opposed Turkey's joining the European Union, but he kept silent about the genocide bill, which was sponsored by the Socialists.

A leading Turkish analyst of the European Union, Can Baydarol, said that although the decision would seem to have no direct effect on Turkey's relations with Europe, the hostile attitude of French lawmakers demonstrated some of the obstacles to Turkish membership.

"Now people see that more than the technical details, political maneuvers will mark the years-long process on the way to full membership," he said.

French 'Genocide' Bill Raises Worry On Turkish Trade Ties (WSJ)

By Geraldine Amiel

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

PARIS -- French lawmakers in the National Assembly approved a bill that would make it a crime to deny that the mass killings of Armenians in Turkey during and after World War I amounted to genocide.

The action by the lower house of the French Parliament poses a threat to France's trade relationship with Turkey and "puts at stake what is an important economic relationship for us," said French Trade Minister Christine Lagarde.

The bill -- introduced by the opposition Socialists -- still would need to be approved by the Senate and signed by French President Jacques Chirac. "It's going to be a long trip before it is passed, and I hope it won't succeed," Ms. Lagarde said.

Turkey represents "a €10 billion [$12.5 billion] relationship, with €5 billion worth of exports with an annual growth of 20%," she added. According to data for 2005 on the Turkish Treasury Web site, France is the third-largest foreign investor in Turkey after Germany and the U.S.

In Brussels, Turkey's economy minister, Ali Babacan, warned that the French vote "might have economic consequences." The European Commission, the executive arm of the European Union, also noted that the bill -- if approved by the French legislature's other chamber and signed into law -- would hamper reconciliation between Turkey and Armenia.

An estimated 1.5 million Armenians were killed from 1915 to 1919. Turkey maintains the deaths occurred during civil unrest, disputes the numbers and rejects the genocide label. The French government declared in January 2001 that the killings of Armenians at the end of World War I constituted genocide.

Turkey Dealt Blow Over EU Accession (FT)

By Martin Arnold And Vincent Boland

Financial Times, October 13, 2006

Turkey's prospects of joining the European Union took a heavy blow on Thursday night, after France's National Assembly approved a bill which outraged Ankara and that critics say will set back the cause of reform within Turkey itself.

The French legislation, which could still be blocked by the senate, would make it a crime to deny that Armenians were the victims of genocide in the last years of the Ottoman Empire.

The bill was read in Turkey as a sign that France was now permanently opposed to Ankara's bid to join the EU. Bulent Arinc, the parliamentary speaker, criticised France's "hostile attitude" towards Turkey. "This is a shameful decision. We are very sorry to see that this [bill] was passed only because of internal [French] politics."

Turkey itself denies genocide and the judicial authorities have prosecuted writers who have used the term to describe the killings of Armenians.

One of the most prominent such figures is Orhan Pamuk, the Turkish novelist, who was awarded the Nobel prize for literature on Thursday minutes after the French vote.

Opinion polls show a majority of French voters oppose Turkish membership. The issue is sensitive in France because of the country's 450,000-strong Armenian community, which has grown rich and influential.

Armenians say as many as 1.5m people died in 1915-18, while Turkey admits only that hundreds of thousands of both Armenians and Turks died, largely as a result of civil war and famine.

Anti-EU sentiment in Turkey has risen sharply recently, ahead of a crucial European Commission report next month that is likely to be critical of Turkey's lack of progress over reforms.

Even before Thursay's vote, many diplomats believed that the EU membership talks could be formally suspended this year and might never be revived.

Politicians in Ankara have threatened to retaliate with economic sanctions and have even toyed with a law making it a crime to deny that North Africans were massacred by French colonial rulers.

While Mr Chirac favours Turkish accession to the EU, prominent ministers such as Nicolas Sarkozy are firmly opposed. Ségolène Royal, the Socialists' leading presidential candidate, has been non-committal, saying this week she would defer to public opinion on the question.

But Mr Chirac said on a visit to Armenia this month that Turkish recognition of the Armenian genocide should become a pre-condition of EU membership.

Diplomats and political commentators said French companies could be frozen out of the bidding as Turkey prepares to build three nuclear power stations and to replace parts of its defence infrastructure.

French Bill Enrages Turkey (WT/AP)

By Emmanuel Georges-Picot

The Washington Times, October 13, 2006

PARIS -- France's lower house of parliament approved a bill yesterday that would make it a crime to deny that mass killings of Armenians in Turkey during the World War I era amounted to genocide, provoking anger in Turkey.

In Ankara, Turks threw eggs at the French Embassy amid growing calls to boycott French goods, although the bill faces a major struggle to become law.

"No one should harbor the conviction that Turkey will take this lightly," Turkish Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul said.

The bill passed 106-19, but the majority of the 557 lawmakers in France's lower house did not take part in the vote.

President Jacques Chirac's government opposed the bill, brought by the opposition Socialist Party, but did not use its majority in the lower house to vote it down.

Mr. Chirac did not comment on the vote yesterday, although he has said that the bill "is more of a polemic than legal reality." Catherine Colonna, his former spokeswoman and current minister for European affairs, told parliament that "it is not for the law to write history."

France's Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen, enacted in 1789 and considered to carry the legal force of a constitution, states: "The free communication of ideas and opinions is one of the most precious of the rights of man. Every citizen may, accordingly, speak, write, and print with freedom, but shall be responsible for such abuses of this freedom as shall be defined by law."

In practice, French law prohibits public speech or writings that incite racial or religious hatred, as well as those that deny the Jewish Holocaust during World War II.

The Armenia genocide issue has become intertwined with ongoing debate in France and across Europe about whether to admit mostly Muslim Turkey into the European Union. France is home to hundreds of thousands of people whose families came from Armenia.

An hour after the vote, Turkish novelist Orhan Pamuk won the Nobel Prize in literature for his works dealing with the symbols of clashing cultures.

Mr. Pamuk was charged last year with insulting Turkish identity after he told a Swiss newspaper that Turkey was unwilling to deal with two of the most painful episodes in its recent history: the massacre of Armenians and guerrilla fighting in Turkey's overwhelmingly Kurdish southeast. The charge was later dropped.

Mr. Chirac has urged Turkey to recognize "the genocide of Armenians" in order to join the bloc. "Each country grows by acknowledging its dramas and errors of the past," he said.

France already recognizes the killings of up to 1.5 million Armenians from 1915 to 1919 as genocide; under yesterday's bill, those who contest it was genocide would risk up to a year in prison and fines of up to $56,000.

French Bill Complicates Turkey's EU Bid (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, October 13, 2006

ISTANBUL, TURKEY

By a wide margin, the French parliament voted Thursday to make it a criminal act to deny an Armenian genocide at the hands of Ottoman Turks, enraging Turkey and further deepening its suspicion of the European Union.

Islamic Turkey - which has sought for decades to join the EU and is now in membership negotiations - vowed retaliation against France that could disrupt billions of dollars in trade, even as both sides explore the limits of free speech.

The vote came the same day that Orhan Pamuk, the celebrated Turkish novelist, was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature. Charges of "denigrating Turkishness" against Mr. Pamuk - brought after he publicly spoke of the killing of 1 million Armenians during World War I, and 30,000 Kurds - were dropped earlier this year in a case seen as a test of Turkey's commitment to EU-driven reforms.

The two events get at the heart of contradictions in modern Turkey, where democratic and West-leaning EU aspirations often clash with history. The staunchly secular state - a full member of the NATO military alliance - casts itself as an indispensable bridge between East and West, but has yet to be accepted as such by Europe.

Many Turks see the genocide vote - a hot- button issue - as just one more obstacle to keep them out of the 25-member EU club.

"Turks find it very hard to swallow this; even Francophile Turks educated there are turning their backs on France," says Sami Kohen, a foreign affairs columnist for Milliyet newspaper. "A lot of us fear this will further encourage critics of the EU [who] will say: 'Enough is enough; we should give up on this EU.' "

Turkish lawmakers Wednesday proposed a counter-bill that would recognize an "Algerian genocide" carried out by colonial French forces in 1945.

Turkish columnists are also raising France's considerable role in Rwanda's 1994 genocide, as they seek to even the moral playing field.

Analysts say the French vote is likely to embolden Turkish nationalists and those who oppose EU membership for Turkey. Recent polls show that Turkish support for joining the EU has dropped from nearly 70 to around 50 percent now.

To become law, the bill must pass the French senate, which is not certain, and be signed by President Jacques Chirac. Punishment would include a one-year prison term, and a €45,000 ($56,500) fine, the same penalty now on French books for denying the Holocaust.

One Turkish newspaper headline took aim at France's reputation as the home of human rights and justice. It read: "Liberté, égalité, stupidité."

"French-Turkish relations, which have developed over centuries ... have been dealt a blow today as a result of the irresponsible false claims of French politicians who do not see the political consequences of their actions," Turkey's foreign ministry Abdullah Gul said in a statement.

"If this bill is passed, Turkey will not lose anything but France will lose Turkey," Mr. Gul had warned before the vote. "[France] will turn into a country that jails people who express their views."

The vote has become a political issue in France, where a majority is against Turkey's membership in the EU, where 400,000 ethnic Armenians live, and presidential elections are to be held in seven months. French exports to Turkey in 2005 totaled $5 billion.

During a visit to Armenia last week, Mr. Chirac stated that Turkey should not be allowed to join the EU unless it officially accepts that the death of more than 1 million Armenians, which took place in the last years of the Ottoman Empire, constitute a "genocide."

Though the French government said Thursday it opposed the legislation as "unnecessary and untimely," Chirac says Turkey must recognize the genocide before it joins the EU.

But while EU officials have been at pains to note that no such genocide criterion applies to Turkey, the sentiment matches widening unease in Europe over Turkey's EU application. Such fears in France are believed to be one reason the French last year rejected the proposed EU constitution.

"France has done its best to hamper Turkey's relations with the EU" and has been seeking "a kind of vengeance" against Turkey since the EU constitution failure, says Seyfi Tashan, director of the Turkish Foreign Policy Institute in Ankara, Turkey's capital. "So politically, the more damage they do to Turkey, the better."

Armenians say that 1.5 million died in 1915 in the first systematic genocide of the 20th century, though historians often count 1 million. Turkey officially argues that some 300,000 Armenians died in a partisan conflict that took just as many Turkish lives, when Armenians sided with invading Russian armies during World War I.

While Turkey has declared that it would open its files to historians, a host of Turkish writers and academics who have challenged official versions of events, sometimes using the word "genocide," have been charged with insulting the state by hard-line prosecutors.

Treading that line has been Mr. Pamuk, whose novels have dug into Turkey's imperial past to explore the contradictions and dilemmas of modern Turkey. The Nobel citation praised the work: "In the quest for the melancholic soul of his native city, [Pamuk] has discovered new symbols for the clash and interlacing of cultures." In February 2005, Pamuk told a Swiss newspaper that "30,000 Kurds and a million Armenians were killed in these lands and nobody but me dares to talk about it."

"What I said is not an insult, it is the truth," Pamuk said during his trial. "But what if it is wrong? Right or wrong, do people not have the right express their ideas peacefully?"

Pamuk The Provocative (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0080303

The Swedish Academy has shown it's once again plugged into the Zeitgeist by awarding the Nobel Prize for Literature to Turkish novelist Orhan Pamuk. The award might be better named the Nobel Prize for Most Provocative Public Intellectual.

In seven novels, one memoir and countless public statements, the 54-year-old product of Istanbul's Europeanized upper classes explores tensions not so much between Islam and the West as within Muslim society itself. In that sense, Mr. Pamuk comes as a relief from the blind anti-Americanism of such recent European winners as Harold Pinter.

In an interview with the Journal last December, Mr. Pamuk said he believed in a "liberal outlook" in which democracy, Western freedoms and Islam are compatible. But as his life and work bear out, clashes are inevitable. "Snow" (2002), which he called "my first and last political novel," explored the violent assault of political Islam on Turkey's rigid secular order. Three years later, ultra-nationalists persecuted Mr. Pamuk for speaking out against Turkey's historical amnesia about the 1915 massacre of Armenians; the charges of "insulting Turkishness" were later dropped.

In Mr. Pamuk's vision of a free Muslim society, space exists for religious conservatives, nationalists and Westernized people like himself. He rejects attempts by Islamists and Kemalists alike to impose their order by force, and sees in Turkey's attempts to join the European Union protection against both camps. Still, the overriding tone of his work is melancholy and betrays doubts about whether his open Muslim state can ever be.

After the death of the Egyptian Nobelist Naguib Mahfouz in late August, Mr. Pamuk took on the role of the world's best-known Muslim novelist, the West's literary guide to the East. It is a heavy burden for a writer of innovative but often plodding and windy work. Yesterday's honor will make him better known world-wide. If it also helps to make his vision of a modern Muslim society better known, so much the better.

U.S. Cuts Funding For AIDS Program (AP)

By Michael M. Phillips

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration cut funding for the only U.S. foreign-assistance project that provided male circumcision as a method of AIDS prevention.

At a time when scientists are lining up behind the idea that circumcision provides substantial protection against HIV transmission, the U.S. Agency for International Development pulled out of a small, $150,000 program in Swaziland that had circumcised more than 325 men since it was launched in January.

David Snider, a USAID spokesman, said the agency had been wrong to provide its initial funding for the program, which is run by a private non-profit called Family Life Association of Swaziland. U.S. foreign-assistance guidelines allow American money to be used for "formative assessments related to male circumcision but will not support the actual provision of clinical services" until further scientific evidence of its effectiveness is available.

The initial U.S. funding for the FLAS project "should not have occurred, and there will be no further circumcisions performed with U.S. government funds" until the scientific steering committee that guides U.S. aid so recommends, Mr. Snider said in a written response to questions.

"This was the one donor-funded program that was making male circumcision more available anywhere in Africa," said a Western AIDS official who works with Swaziland. "The other donors aren't doing anything to actually provide the services, and people are dying in huge numbers."

Swaziland, a tiny kingdom in southern Africa, has the world's highest HIV prevalence rate, with 33.4% of adults thought to be infected, according to UNAIDS. Almost 39 million people worldwide carry the AIDS virus, 24.5 million of them in sub-Saharan Africa, according to UNAIDS.

At least three major studies have looked at the effect of circumcision on HIV transmission. One study in South Africa concluded that circumcision reduced the risk of HIV infection by 60% to 75%. The other studies are still underway.

Word of the initial findings, however, has spread around Africa, sparking a surge of demand for circumcision.

"The demand will not lose its momentum," predicted Dr. Adam Groeneveld, Swaziland's only urologist, who performs circumcisions at the Government Hospital in the capital city of Mbabane. "That's why FLAS will have to find some other source of money. There will be a temporary dip in the number of circumcisions, and an increase in the waiting list."

Dr. Groeneveld said the FLAS project, while small, provided a substantial increase in circumcision services. Doctors at Government Hospital perform just 10 circumcisions a week, and someone asking to be circumcised today would have to wait until February for the procedure, he said. The hospital is experimenting with the idea of devoting one entire day each weekend exclusively to circumcision procedures, he said.

AIDS Tests, Everywhere (NYT)

At the beginning of 2004, AIDS treatment in Botswana — a country with the world's second-highest rate of H.I.V. cases — was stagnating. The country was providing free antiretrovirals, but only one in 10 who needed the drugs was taking them.

Then Botswana made a simple change in the rules for AIDS testing that allowed the program to soar. Previously, Botswanans could get tested only after providing written consent and accepting extensive counseling. Now, unless they object, all patients entering a clinic or hospital are routinely given an AIDS test. The rate of testing has quadrupled. A third of Botswanans now know their H.I.V. status, and 85 percent of those who need treatment get it.

The American Centers for Disease Control and Prevention recommended late last month that such routine AIDS testing — called opt-out — become the standard in the United States. This is an important reform. It is even more crucial for poor countries, where 90 percent of those infected do not know it.

Unaids and the World Health Organization should move quickly to endorse opt-out AIDS testing. Their guidance is followed worldwide and will help rally needed help from outside donors.

The current protocols for testing — with their strong emphasis on privacy and consent — were designed when little could be done to help people with H.I.V. Now antiretrovirals are being rolled out in every country. But without easy access to testing, people may find out they have AIDS only when it is too late to save their lives. They will also have spent years unknowingly passing on the infection.

Where opt-out testing has been used, few patients decline tests. Treating H.I.V. like any other disease could also help lessen the stigma. People who have been tested before they feel sick also start AIDS treatment earlier, and do better on it. And studies show that those who know their status are only half as likely to infect someone else, when compared with an H.I.V. carrier who is still in the dark.

Governments need to follow Botswana's lead and make AIDS testing routine in every health clinic and hospital. And donors should ensure that every clinic has a reliable supply of AIDS tests.

Venezuela Challenges U.S.-backed Guatemala For U.N. Seat (MCT)

By Pablo Bachelet

McClatchy Newspapers, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON - Elections to seats on the United Nations Security Council are usually drab affairs, beyond the diplomatic chatter and a sense of international respect for the winners. But not this year.

Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez is challenging U.S.-backed Guatemala for a seat, triggering what many analysts and diplomats are calling the hottest Security Council race in nearly 30 years.

The 192 U.N. member nations will vote at a General Assembly session Monday on which of the two countries will succeed Argentina for a two-year term in the council seat reserved for Latin America. A two-thirds vote is required to win. There's a chance that neither will prevail and another country will be chosen as a compromise.

Chavez's self-avowed campaign to forge a Third World bloc against Washington's "hegemonistic tendencies" has transformed the race into a popularity contest between President Bush and the Venezuelan leader, who called Bush a devil last month during a speech to the General Assembly.

"In many ways, we can take this vote as a plebiscite on the U.S. position and how it's perceived within the U.N.," said Don Kraus, the executive vice president of Citizens for Global Solutions, a nonpartisan organization that advocates more cooperation among countries.

U.N. member nations also will vote Monday on council seats for representatives from Africa, Europe and Asia, but most of the attention will be on the Guatemala-Venezuela contest.

"I have never recalled so many media headlines" on a council election, said Heraldo Munoz, the U.N. ambassador from Chile. "The awareness has almost come to a man-on-the-street level."

To find a more contentious race, he added, one has to go back to Cuba's bids during the Cold War. In 1979, Cuba and Colombia went through 154 rounds of voting over three months - each failing to get the votes required for victory - before Mexico finally was picked as a consensus alternative.

Cuba ran again the following year, and after 23 rounds of voting in which several contenders rotated in and out, Panama emerged as the winner. Cuba eventually won a term, for 1990 and 1991.

A Chavez defeat would be a blow for his ambitions to become a leading voice of the underdeveloped world, while a victory would be an embarrassment for the Bush administration, which accuses the left-wing leader of everything from undermining democracy in Venezuela and around Latin America to failing to cooperate in the fight against drug trafficking and terrorism.

"This is about whether or not a state is responsible or simply wishes to have a constant struggle with the United States every day on every issue, thereby making the Security Council unworkable," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told The Wall Street Journal last month.

Chavez retorts that he's defending himself from U.S. plans to topple him or invade his country and says Washington's policies are impoverishing people around the world. Each side denies the other's accusations.

Viewed as the world's premier multilateral conflict-resolving institution, the Security Council oversees 70,000 blue-helmeted peacekeepers worldwide and can slap sanctions on wayward nations.

The Bush administration fears that Chavez will use a Security Council seat not only as a platform to berate Bush but also to play an obstructionist role as the council debates hot-button issues such as Iran and North Korea. U.S. officials have complained that Chavez is using his oil wealth to expand his influence around the globe - and is looking for General Assembly votes.

The council's five permanent members - the United States, China, Great Britain, Russia and France - mostly call the shots, thanks to their veto power. But passing a resolution still requires at least nine votes in the 15-member body.

The presidency of the council is rotated among members for a one-month period, meaning that Venezuela could chair the body at least once during its term, serving as its representative and influencing its agenda.

Plus, the Security Council operates about a dozen committees, usually chaired by nonpermanent members, that monitor everything from sanctions against Sudan to counterterrorism and nuclear-proliferation issues.

Venezuela's candidacy has divided Latin America along its political and regional fault lines.

Central America, ruled mostly by conservative, pro-U.S. governments, is backing Guatemala. South America, run mostly by moderate leftist governments more critical of Washington, has tended to side with Chavez.

But there are exceptions: Colombia, one of the world's top beneficiaries of U.S. military aid, backs Guatemala. Peru, where a Chavez-backed presidential candidate was defeated in recent elections, plans to abstain.

The Caribbean Community - potentially benefiting from oil subsidies offered by Venezuela and opposed to Guatemala over its long-standing border dispute with Belize - has indicated that its 14 votes in the U.N. General Assembly might go to Venezuela.

Guatemala beat Venezuela in a vote earlier this year for a seat on the U.N.'s Human Rights Council, but Chavez has since traveled the globe in search of support, including trips to a vote-rich summit of 116 nonaligned nations in Havana last month and a July summit of 53 African Union countries in Gambia.

Venezuelan officials say they've secured the votes of most African nations and the 22-member League of Arab Nations plus China and Russia, among others. U.S. officials expect Guatemala to win the votes of many European and Asian democracies.

Observers think that Venezuela will receive more votes than Guatemala on Monday but will fall short of the two-thirds threshold. Already, news reports in Latin America are suggesting that the Dominican Republic, Costa Rica, Uruguay or Panama may step forward as alternatives.

Guatemala has tried to shake off the notion that it's simply doing Washington's bidding. The country argues that it launched its election bid in 2002 - well ahead of Venezuela - and that despite being a founding member of the United Nations and a contributor to some of its peacekeeping missions, it's never sat on the council.

Venezuela has had four previous stints on the Security Council, all before Chavez was elected president in 1998.

India, EU Work Toward Trade Pact (WSJ)

By John W. Miller

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

HELSINKI -- The European Union and India stepped up free-trade negotiations that could one day link two of the world's biggest markets. Both sides said they hope to complete a deal by early 2009.

"India is a market the EU has to get closer to before it goes off with another partner," EU Trade Commissioner Peter Mandelson said yesterday in an interview here in the Finnish capital, as top political and business leaders from India and Europe began two days of meetings.

The push for a bilateral deal is a strong signal that countries are putting aside hopes of resuming talks toward a global trade deal that would slash tariffs among the World Trade Organization's 149 members. The so-called Doha round of WTO negotiations collapsed in July, primarily because of farm-subsidy disagreements among the U.S., Europe and developing nations.

Like other officials, Mr. Mandelson still expresses hope that a comprehensive global deal isn't dead. "But Doha first never meant Doha alone," he said.

In private, EU officials say their motivation to move ahead with bilateral talks stems partly from a belief that rising protectionist sentiment among U.S. lawmakers eager to protect farm subsidies will make Doha impossible to achieve until after the 2008 presidential election. In an official policy declaration last week, Mr. Mandelson said the EU would work hard to sign bilateral trade deals with Russia, India and several countries in Latin America, Asia and the Middle East.

"Europe has for too long overlooked opportunities in Asia," Mr. Mandelson said. "I am now trying to correct that imbalance." Today, the Indians and Europeans expect to set a date for formal bilateral-trade talks.

Despite optimism about an EU-India deal -- including a pledge by Indian Commerce and Industry Minister Kamal Nath to move toward no tariffs for EU goods -- negotiations promise to be long and complicated. Decades of socialist rule have left India with cumbersome regulations and steep tariffs that shut out foreign companies and goods, while its own businesses struggle to meet strict environmental, safety and social standards the EU requires before opening the door to its 450 million consumers.

"Most European businesses face so many technical barriers to their investments that they make a U-turn and go home," says Marco Felisati, the top trade official for Confindustria, Italy's business lobby. Consequently, despite the size of their economies, trade between the EU and India remains relatively small.

EU trade with India amounted to €40 billion, or about $50 billion, of goods and services last year, with exports to India accounting for less than 2% of the EU total. By comparison, trade between the 25-nation bloc and China totaled €261 billion last year. Of course, European companies have been outsourcing much of their information-technology and call-center work to India, while India exports some €2 billion of precious stones, mostly diamonds, to the EU every year.

The EU wants India to remove regulations that prevent foreign companies from setting up shop and to cut high tariffs on certain goods Europeans produce, especially wine and spirits, said Mr. Mandelson. Because of levies as high as 264%, EU producers sold only €4 million of wine to India in 2004.

European companies are increasingly frustrated at being shut out of selling goods and services to a country of one billion people whose gross domestic product rose 8.3% in 2005 and 8.1% in 2004. Rules currently prohibit large retailers such as Tesco PLC, Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and Carrefour SA from building in India.

The picture is even worse for services, says Pascal Kerneis, managing director of the European Services Forum, a Brussels-based lobbying group. For example, the pension market is still entirely closed to foreign companies, to the frustration of European giants such as Allianz AG, which does sell insurance in India but only through a local partner. "You can argue whether it's 200 million potential consumers or 300 million, but it's a market with a huge potential," says Heinz Dollberg, Allianz's executive vice president.

Indian companies and politicians complain that EU regulations unfairly benefit European companies. For example, Europe requires farmers to certify that pesticide levels in their crops aren't dangerous, and compliance costs €1,700 per Indian farmer, according to the Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industry -- a fortune in India. The EU is readying legislation requiring firms importing chemical-based products into the EU to prove they are safe. That would cost as much as €325,000 per chemical, according to the federation.

Georgia Halts Talks On Russia's WTO Bid (AP)

By Misha Dzhindzhikhashvili, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 13, 2006

Georgia has blocked the next round of talks on Russia's bid to join the World Trade Organization in retaliation for Moscow's blockade of its small southern neighbor, the government said Thursday.

The next meeting of the group working with Russia on its membership talks had been postponed indefinitely at Georgia's request, the Foreign Ministry said. The working group met in Geneva on Thursday and had been expected to set a date for the next round of consultations.

Russia's top WTO negotiator, Maxim Medvedkov, confirmed that that no date had been set for the next round of talks. The ITAR-Tass news agency quoted him as saying that this was because Russia needed time to resolve some issues with certain countries at a bilateral and multilateral level.

In a statement, the Georgian ministry said Russia had banned Georgian wine and mineral water from its market. "And after the recent imposition of new economic sanctions, the situation got even worse. This has practically led to an economic blockade of Georgia by Russia," it said.

Last week, Georgian National Bank President Roman Gotsiridze had said that Georgia, which is already a member of the powerful global trade body, could demand that Russia be barred from the organization unless it ended its sanctions against Tbilisi.

Russia had been expected to sign a membership agreement with the United States at the Group of Eight summit it hosted in St. Petersburg this year — one of the last countries it has yet to clinch an agreement with — but talks stumbled on the question of sanitary controls for U.S. meat imports. Russia is the largest economy outside the 149-nation WTO.

Furious at the arrest of four Russian officers accused of spying two weeks ago, Russia responded by slapping a sweeping transport and postal blockade on Georgia despite the alleged spies' release.

Relations in recent years have become increasingly hostile between Russia and Georgia, whose pro-Western President Mikhail Saakashvili has sought to join NATO and throw off historic Russian influence since coming to power in 2003.

Slain Reporter’s Last Story Bares Chechen Torture (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 12 — The newspaper Novaya Gazeta on Thursday published the last article by its slain special correspondent, Anna Politkovskaya, along with transcripts of videotaped torture sessions of Chechens that she had obtained in her work.

The article, an unfinished column that presented new allegations of torture by security forces in Chechnya, appeared on the same day that the European Court of Human Rights issued a ruling holding Russia responsible for the killings of five Chechen civilians in early 2000 by Russian police officers.

The victims of that incident included a 1-year-old boy and his young mother, who was eight months pregnant. All of the victims were shot, and the mother’s jewelry was stolen, the court said.

The article also appeared as the federal prosecutor’s office in Grozny, the capital of Chechnya, said it was checking into reports of the disappearance of another prominent Chechen: the mother of the last wife of Shamil Basayev, the terrorist leader who died in an explosion in June. The woman, Rita Ersenoyeva, has been missing since Oct. 2, human rights workers say, and had spent the last several weeks searching for her daughter, who had been kidnapped as well after what her mother had described as a forced marriage to the terrorist leader.

Ms. Politkovskaya, one of Russia’s best-known journalists and human rights advocates, was fatally shot on Saturday, apparently the victim of a contract killing. The events on Thursday together served as a sort of coda on her life, reminders of the lingering chaos and human costs of the war in Chechnya, which Russia insists has been won.

Ms. Politkovskaya, 48, was a leader among the shrinking group of Russian journalists who dared to keep challenging that thinking, by writing frankly about the violence and disorder in the republic. Chechnya, her work said, remains a place where open fighting has slowed but murky police and military operations continue, and chilling behavior by Russian forces and the Kremlin's proxies is a dark norm.

Her final article, a column under the headline "We Declare You a Terrorist," presented allegations of the use of torture to exact confessions and manufacture good news from the war.

"When prosecutors and the courts work, not for the sake of the law, but on political commission and with the only goal of providing good reports for the Kremlin, then criminal cases are baked like pancakes," she wrote. "An assembly line producing 'open-hearted confessions' effectively guarantees good data on the war on terror."

She asked: "Are we, the lawful, fighting against the unlawful? Or are we battling 'their' lawlessness with 'ours?' "

The article described the case of Beslan Gadayev, a Chechen migrant deported from Ukraine to Chechnya, where he claimed in a letter to Ms. Politkovskaya that he had been asked if he committed certain unsolved murders.

When he said he had not, he wrote, he was punched near an eye, beaten, tied up, handcuffed, hung from a pipe and then connected to electric cable, whose current was switched on. In time, he said, he confessed and the next day he was told to confess again in front of journalists and to say that his injuries were a result of an escape attempt.

The article was accompanied by images from videos that Ms. Politkovskaya had obtained of an armed Chechen, who her newspaper said was presumably a member of the Chechen armed forces, torturing at least one man.

Not long after the newspaper was published Thursday morning, the European Court of Human Rights released a unanimous decision blaming Russia for deaths of five members of the Estamirov family in Grozny in early 2000, a period when Russian forces had just wrested control of the capital from separatists.

It also found that Russia had failed to adequately investigate the killings, which were part of a sweep operation that Human Rights Watch, the American-based organization, investigated and called a massacre.

At least 60 civilians were killed, shot at close range, human rights workers said, apparently by enraged police units from St. Petersburg and Ryazan who were looting the neighborhood. Nobody has ever been charged for the crimes. The court on Thursday ordered Russia to pay about 230,000 euros, or about $290,000, in damages to the victims' relatives.

Ole Solvang, executive director of the Stitching Russian Justice Initiative, a private organization that has helped survivors of the Chechen war seek justice in the European Court, said the evidence showed that the deaths were deliberate. For example, he said, the slain 1-year-old boy, Khasan Estamirov, was shot multiple times at close range. At least one shot was to the head.

"They just went completely nuts that day," Mr. Solvang said. "It was horrible."

Russia, which earlier this year also was found responsible by the court for the summary execution of a young Ingush fighter at about the same time, made no comment on the case. It has three months to appeal.

Later in the day, Valery Kuznetsov, the top federal prosecutor in Chechnya, said by telephone that his office was looking into reports that Rita Ersenoyeva had been abducted.

Kidnappings, both to gain ransom and to kill suspected rebels and their supporters, have been a part of life in Chechnya for more than a decade. Human rights groups say Russian forces or Chechens loyal to the Kremlin premier are often responsible.

Ms. Ersenoyeva disappeared on Oct. 2 after being summoned by telephone to an administration building in the village of Stariye Atagi, according to Tanya Lokshina, chairwoman of Center Demos, a human rights group. Neither Ms. Lokshina nor Mr. Kuznetsov said they had found witnesses to the abduction.

But Ms. Ersenoyeva has not been heard from since she left for the meeting, Ms. Lokshina said, adding that Ms. Ersenoyeva left eagerly after a caller told her that there was good news about her daughter, who in August had vanished as well after gunmen seized her from the street.

China's Oil Imports Surge Amid Relentless Demand (WSJ)

By Shai Oster And David Winning

DOJ_NMG_0080309

BEIJING -- China, the world's second-biggest oil consumer, imported a record volume of crude last month, underscoring that petroleum demand here and in other developing economies, such as India and the Middle East, continues to rise despite lofty petroleum prices.

Despite Beijing's efforts to conserve energy and curb runaway economic growth, crude imports in September jumped to 13.46 million metric tons, or an average of about 3.3 million barrels a day -- 24% more than in September 2005 and 2.4% more than the previous record in January, according to China's General Administration of Customs.

Meanwhile, China's overall trade surplus eased to $15.3 billion last month, the customs agency said, snapping a string of four straight monthly records that culminated in an August surplus of $18.8 billion. The country's exports last month rose 30.6% from a year earlier to $91.64 billion, while imports rose 22% to $76.34 billion. For the first nine months of the year, China's trade surplus reached $109.85 billion, surpassing its $102 billion surplus for all of 2005.

Economists expect China's trade surplus to return to record levels as soon as this month. "I expect [the surplus] to bounce up to $19 billion in October," said Ben Simpfendorfer, an economist at Royal Bank of Scotland Group in Hong Kong. But he added he wouldn't be surprised if it hit $20 billion.

China's mounting trade surplus has been a sore point in relations with its major trading partners, and has added pressure on the country to allow the value of its currency to rise. Its strong exports also are driving the rapid economic growth which in turn has fueled its fast-growing thirst for both foreign and domestically produced oil.

Another factor in the growth of China's oil imports last month was a move by Chinese refiners to snap up crude now that prices have fallen about 25% from a peak of around $77 a barrel in July. The lower prices have given more breathing room to companies like PetroChina Co. and China Petroleum & Chemical Corp., or Sinopec, which have had their profits squeezed by a state-set ceiling on fuel prices.

Yesterday on the New York Mercantile Exchange, crude oil for November delivery settled at $57.86 a barrel, up 27 cents. Oil remains about twice the price it was three years ago but far below the inflation-adjusted high of $99.56 it reached in April 1980.

Analyst also attribute part of China's oil-import growth to the country's efforts to build emergency stockpiles of oil. Chinese officials have been reluctant to disclose how much oil they are putting into their strategic oil reserve, because they fear such information could contribute to an increase in world prices. Last week, Xu Dingming, vice director of the State Energy Office under the State Council, said China has begun filling an oil reserve at Zhenhai in the eastern province of Zhejiang.

The International Energy Agency, a Paris group that advises major industrialized nations on energy policy, forecast in a monthly report Wednesday that China's oil demand would rise 6.4% this year, to about seven million barrels of oil a day. While the figure was revised down a bit from earlier estimates, it still is more than double the pace of growth in 2005, which was 2.6%. The U.S., however, remains the world's largest oil consumer by far, with projected oil consumption this year of about 21 million barrels a day, little changed from last year.

In 2004, China's appetite for oil rose nearly 16%, startling global markets and helping fuel a huge rise in international oil prices. That year's demand surge was caused by widespread electrical-power shortages, which forced many factories to use diesel generators to keep operating. The electricity shortage has eased, but China's rising middle class has bought millions of new cars and homes -- further driving up fuel needs.

Oil traders watching the recent import rise are much less concerned with China's outlook than in the past, partly because there appears to be plenty of supply sloshing around.

China Drafts Law To Empower Unions And End Labor Abuse (NYT)

By David Barboza

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

SHANGHAI, Oct. 12 — China is planning to adopt a new law that seeks to crack down on sweatshops and protect workers' rights by giving labor unions real power for the first time since it introduced market forces in the 1980's.

The move, which underscores the government's growing concern about the widening income gap and threats of social unrest, is setting off a battle with American and other foreign corporations that have lobbied against it by hinting that they may build fewer factories here.

The proposed rules are being considered after the Chinese Communist Party endorsed a new doctrine that will put greater emphasis on tackling the severe side effects of the country's remarkable growth.

Whether the foreign corporations will follow through on their warnings is unclear because of the many advantages of being in China — even with restrictions and higher costs that may stem from the new law. It could go into effect as early as next May.

It would apply to all companies in China, but its emphasis is on foreign-owned companies and the suppliers to those companies.

The conflict with the foreign corporations is significant partly because it comes at a time when labor, energy and land costs are rising in this country, all indications that doing business in China is likely to get much more expensive in the coming years.

But it is not clear how effectively such a new labor law would be carried out through this vast land because local officials have tended to ignore directives from the central government or seek ways around them.

China's economy has become one of the most robust in the world since the emphasis on free markets in the 80's encouraged millions of young workers to labor for low wages at companies that made cheap exports. As a result, foreign investment has poured into China.

Some of the world's big companies have expressed concern that the new rules would revive some aspects of socialism and borrow too heavily from labor laws in union-friendly countries like France and Germany.

The Chinese government proposal, for example, would make it more difficult to lay off workers, a condition that some companies contend would be so onerous that they might slow their investments in China.

"This is really two steps backward after three steps forward," said Kenneth Tung, Asia-Pacific director of legal affairs at the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company in Hong Kong and a legal adviser to the American Chamber of Commerce here.

The proposed law is being debated after Wal-Mart Stores, the world's biggest retailer, was forced to accept unions in its Chinese outlets.

State-controlled unions here have not wielded much power in the past, but after years of reports of worker abuse, the government seems determined to give its union new powers to negotiate worker contracts, safety protection and workplace ground rules.

Hoping to head off some of the rules, representatives of some American companies are waging an intense lobbying campaign to persuade the Chinese government to revise or abandon the proposed law.

The skirmish has pitted the American Chamber of Commerce — which represents corporations including Dell, Ford, General Electric, Microsoft and Nike — against labor activists and the All-China Federation of Trade Unions, the Communist Party's official union organization.

The workers' advocates say that the proposed labor rules — and more important, enforcement powers — are long overdue, and they accuse the American businesses of favoring a system that has led to widespread labor abuse.

On Friday, Global Labor Strategies, a group that supports labor rights policies, is expected to release a report in New York and Boston denouncing American corporations for opposing legislation that would give Chinese workers stronger rights.

"You have big corporations opposing basically modest reforms," said Tim Costello, an official of the group and a longtime labor union advocate. "This flies in the face of the idea that globalization and corporations will raise standards around the world."

China's Labor Ministry declined to comment Thursday, saying the law is still in the drafting stages. Several American corporations also declined to comment on the case, saying it was a delicate matter and referring calls to the American Chamber of Commerce.

But Andreas Lauffs, a Hong Kong-based lawyer who runs the China employment-law practice at the international law firm of Baker & McKenzie, said some American companies considered the proposed rules too costly and restrictive.

Mr. Lauffs said the new rules would give unions collective-bargaining power and control over certain factory rules, and they would also make it difficult to fire employees for poor performance.

"You could hire a sales manager, give him a quota and he doesn't sell anything, and you couldn't get rid of him," Mr. Lauffs said. "It's not easy to get rid of someone now, but under these rules it would be impossible."

It is not clear what the final law will look like, and only an updated draft is expected soon. But specialists say the trend suggests that there may be new challenges ahead for foreign companies doing business in this country.

Under China's "iron rice bowl" system of the 1950's and 60's, all workers were protected by the government or by state-owned companies, which often supplied housing and local health coverage.

But by the 1980's, when the old Maoist model had given way to economic restructuring and the beginning of an emphasis on market forces, China began eliminating many of those protections — giving rise to mass layoffs, unemployment, huge gaps in income and pervasive labor abuse.

The worst off have been migrant workers, most of them exiles from the poorest provinces who travel far from home to live in cramped company dormitories while working long hours under poor conditions.

Migrant workers in virtually every city complain about abuses like having their pay withheld or being forced to work without a contract.

"I don't know about the labor law," said Zhang Yin, an 18-year-old migrant who washes dishes in Shanghai. "During the three months I've been here, my boss has delayed the salary payment twice. I want to quit."

Having grown increasingly concerned about the nation's widening income gap and fearing social unrest, officials in Beijing now seem determined to improve worker protection. In recent years, more and more factory workers have gone to court or taken to the streets to protest poor working conditions and overdue pay.

"The government is concerned because social turmoil can happen at any moment," says Liu Cheng, a professor of law at Shanghai Normal University and an adviser to the authorities on drafting the proposed law. "The government stresses social stability, so it needs to solve existing problems in the society."

In a surprisingly democratic move, China asked for public comment on the draft law last spring and received more than 190,000 responses, mostly from labor activists. The American Chamber of Commerce sent in a lengthy response with objections to the proposals. The European Chamber of Commerce also responded.

The law would impose heavy fines on companies that do not comply. And the state-controlled union — the only legal union in China — would gain greater power through new collective-bargaining rights or pursuing worker grievances and establishing work rules. One provision in the proposed law reads, "Labor unions or employee representatives have the right, following bargaining conducted on an equal basis, to execute with employers collective contracts on such matters as labor compensation, working hours, rest, leave, work safety and hygiene, insurance, benefits, etc."

If approved and strictly enforced, specialists say the new laws would strikingly alter the country's vast labor market and significantly push up the wages of everyday workers.

"If you really abide by the Chinese labor laws," said Anita Chan, an expert on labor issues in this country and a visiting fellow at the Australian National University, "migrant-worker wages would go up by 50 percent or more."

Until now, though, existing Chinese labor laws have gone largely unenforced, which has further complicated the debate here. Opponents of the proposed law argue that enforcing existing labor laws would be enough to solve the country's nagging problems. Advocates respond that adopting new laws would set the stage for stricter enforcement.

Even lawyers working for multinational corporations seem to agree that there is an epidemic of cheating.

Mr. Liu, the Shanghai lawyer who advised the government on the draft proposal, says many companies avoid existing laws by using employment agencies to hire workers. He says the new law will do more to protect workers from such abuse by holding companies accountable.

"The principle is not to raise the labor standard dramatically," he said, "but to raise the cost of violating the law. The current labor law is a paper tiger and is a disadvantage to those who obey it. If you don't obey the law, you won't be punished."

Official Union In China Says All Wal-Marts Are Organized (NYT)

By David Lague

DOJ_NMG_0080312

BEIJING, Oct. 12 — Workers have set up unions at all 66 Wal-Mart outlets in China, beginning what a Chinese union official described Thursday as a wider campaign aimed at other foreign companies.

Wal-Mart has long battled to ban unions from its stores and distribution centers, and Guo Wencai, a senior organizer of the government-sanctioned All-China Federation of Trade Unions, called the establishment of union branches at the Wal-Mart stores a "breakthrough" for organized labor.

Mr. Guo said at a news conference here that the success at Wal-Mart would be a springboard to similar efforts aimed at Eastman Kodak, Dell and other companies.

"We are going to exert very high pressure on all these types of companies until unions are established there," Mr. Guo said. "It is an irreversible trend." He said union membership would lead to better conditions for employees, including higher wages and safer workplaces.

The effort to unionize workers at foreign companies is strictly limited to expanding the membership of the officially sanctioned labor federation, which says it has 150 million members.

But some labor market analysts and human rights groups say establishing branches of the official union in foreign companies is aimed more at allowing the Chinese authorities to tighten control over the rapidly expanding private-sector work force.

Under Chinese law, employees are barred from organizing independent unions, and workers or activists seeking to challenge these rules are routinely prosecuted and jailed, according to human rights groups.

Already, many foreign businesses have allowed their workers to form unions in China. In the economic and technological development area of Tianjin, southeast of Beijing, union branches have been established at more than 300 foreign companies including the food giant Nestlé, Mr. Guo said. In Beijing, there are unions at 44 foreign enterprises.

The labor federation, with strong backing from the Chinese government, has applied intense pressure on Wal-Mart as the first phase of the wider effort to establish branches in all foreign-financed enterprises.

There are now more than 100,000 such companies operating in China, including businesses from Taiwan and Macao, according to government statistics quoted in the official media.

It is unlikely, though, that the existence of branches of the official union will lead to increased worker militancy. Labor activists at times accuse the labor federation of siding with management rather than acting as a champion of workers' rights. At best, they say, the official union sometimes tries to mediate disputes.

Labor unrest is common these days in China, particularly among the 150 million migrant workers, and some specialists suggest that an improved network of official union branches could assist the authorities in defusing protests that could potentially pose a threat to Communist Party rule. The heightened unrest is one reason that the Chinese government has announced plans for greater worker protection, including a crackdown on sweatshops.

"They are afraid that public protests or strikes might get out of hand," said Robin Munro, research director of the China Labor Bulletin, a workers' rights group in Hong Kong. "Hence, the big drive to impose unions and provide greater union coverage; I think this is seen as a way of crisis management."

Other analysts suggest that the authorities also want to expand the reach of the official union because the decline of state-owned industries has stripped away much of the Communist Party's traditional power base in the Chinese economy.

Wal-Mart, in keeping with its efforts to ban labor organizing among its work force in the United States and elsewhere, resisted official efforts to unionize until late in July, when workers at one of its stores in Fujian Province set up a union branch. Within two months, branches were established in other stores as labor federation officials and local governments encouraged workers to organize and promised that they would be protected if the company tried to retaliate.

Mr. Guo, the organizer of the official union, said about 6,000 of Wal-Mart's 30,000 employees in China were now union members and efforts were under way to improve their welfare.

A spokeswoman for Wal-Mart's international division, Beth Keck, said she was unable to provide the exact number of union branches at company stores in China. "But our position is very clear," she said. "We have committed to having branches in all our stores."

DOJ_NMG_0080313

Mr. Guo said the labor federation would now assist workers in their negotiations with Wal-Mart management for new contracts and would seek to improve conditions for part-time workers.

Something In Hong Kong's Air (NYT)

Anyone who has ever fallen under Hong Kong's exotic spell in recent years knows how taking a deep breath can make the magic disappear. The air throughout Hong Kong's tropical landscape has grown steadily more polluted — tainted by dark, unhealthy clouds from power plants, traffic and underregulated smokestacks from the Chinese mainland.

Hong Kong's average air pollution levels can be so high — double or even triple the World Health Organization limit — that some analysts estimate the air contributes to an extra 2,000 deaths a year. Leaders in Beijing and Hong Kong have repeatedly promised to cut down on environmental toxins in the air, land and water.

But with China's booming economy, such promises keep sliding down the real priority lists. What might change that attitude is how the outside business world views the quality of life for employees. As one businessman explained to The Wall Street Journal about his family's recent retreat to Australia: "You can drink bottled water. But with the air — you have to breathe it."

Such departures have finally begun to raise concerns in Hong Kong's business community. The local Chamber of Commerce issued an urgent request for the government to commit to "genuine reductions in air pollution" after it found that "an alarming 95 percent" of executives interviewed were worried or very worried about air quality and its effects on their health. But in a disheartening development this week, Hong Kong's chief executive, Donald Tsang, missed yet another opportunity to lay out a workable plan for clearing the air quickly.

This is not a hopeless situation, as leaders in Mexico City could attest. Once a place where residents courted asthma with every step outside, Mexico City approved what is generally regarded as one of the best and most comprehensive approaches to air pollution in 1990. The measures included everything from new fuel composition standards to new emission standards for vehicles. As a result, Mexico City halved some forms of air pollution in only five years. If Hong Kong even committed to cutting its pollution in half, that would be a good start.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Charge Of Treason Difficult To Prove, Legal Experts Say (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

The decision to charge alleged al-Qaeda propagandist Adam Gadahn with treason is something of a gamble by the U.S. government, which has not pursued such a case in more than 50 years and has a mixed track record for convictions over the course of American history, according to legal experts and historic accounts.

Gadahn, 28, was indicted Wednesday by a federal grand jury in Santa Ana, Calif., based on his alleged appearance in numerous al-Qaeda videotapes calling for the death of Americans and for attacks on U.S. targets.

Many legal experts said yesterday that although Gadahn may be a suitable candidate for a treason charge, federal prosecutors may face serious difficulties in securing a conviction if he is ever brought to trial.

Gadahn, a fugitive believed to be living in Pakistan, grew up on a Southern California goat farm, converting to Islam as a teenager and later moving overseas. He allegedly says in one video that U.S. "streets will run red with blood" and in another refers to the United States as "enemy soil."

"One of the reasons that I think Gadahn was charged was because of his intentional, brazen and conspicuous activities," said Brian Levin, director of the Center for the Study of Hate and Extremism at California State University at San Bernardino. "All the stars lined up to virtually hand the required elements to prosecutors on a silver platter. . . . But it's not a slam-dunk by any means."

Fewer than three dozen U.S. citizens have ever been charged with treason, which is specifically defined in the Constitution and requires two witnesses or a confession in court for a conviction. The framers -- who bristled at England's frequent prosecution of dissidents for alleged treason -- defined it narrowly as "levying war" against the United States or providing "aid and comfort" to its enemies.

The penalties for treason were left to Congress, which set the range of punishment from five years in prison to death.

The roster of previous treason defendants includes former vice president and malcontent Aaron Burr, who was acquitted of attempting to set up his own republic, and abolitionist John Brown, who was hanged for treason after he and his followers captured the federal arsenal at Harpers Ferry. The last flurry of treason cases was prosecuted during and after World War II, culminating in the 1952 conviction of a Japanese American for abusing U.S. prisoners of war.

The Justice Department's legal arguments in the Gadahn case rely heavily on the "broadcast cases," a series of treason prosecutions of U.S. citizens providing propaganda services to the Germans or Japanese. The most famous of these involved Iva Toguri D'Aquino, accused of being "Tokyo Rose," who served six years in prison but was later pardoned after the two key witnesses recanted.

In the Gadahn case, the Justice Department argues that the defendant's appearance in five incendiary al-Qaeda videos -- particularly three recent broadcasts in which he is clearly visible -- provide enough evidence to fulfill the Constitution's witness requirements for treason.

Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty, in announcing the indictment Wednesday, said prosecutors "are very confident about the satisfaction of the two-witness rule," in part because "a number of individuals would be in a position to be able to identify Adam Gadahn" in the videos.

"We understand our burden," McNulty said. "We have to meet a burden that includes a number of elements in addition to the two-witness rule to show that there has been aid and comfort given to the enemy. And the elements will be met . . . if and when we have an opportunity to present our case in court."

But some liberal legal scholars are already raising questions about the strength of the government's case.

Leon Friedman, a professor at Hofstra University School of Law in Hempstead, N.Y., said the Supreme Court may take a dim view of bringing a treason charge as part of the "war on terrorism," which does not have the limits common to traditional armed conflicts. "The only time we've used treason in the past is in cases that resemble a traditional war," Friedman said. "It's just not the same thing. . . . We don't want the treason charge thrown around indiscriminately."

Bobby Chesney, a specialist in national security law at Wake Forest University, said he is not aware of any other case in which treason has been alleged involving a terrorist group.

Chesney noted that a number of al-Qaeda suspects both before and after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks have been charged with seditious conspiracy, which is similar to the crime of treason but is easier to prove in court.

"It can be argued you can't get much better than the American front man for al-Qaeda for a treason charge," Chesney said. "But it's always a very difficult crime to prove."

Red Cross Meets Khalid Sheik Mohammed, Others (MH)

By Carol Rosenberg

The Miami Herald, October 13, 2006

The International Committee of the Red Cross confirmed today that it has met the 14 so-called "high value" detainees at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, who include alleged Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Sheik Mohammed.

A 12-member Red Cross delegation is still on the remote base in southeast Cuba, still working on gathering detainee notes and messages home -- but has interviewed 454 international U.S.-held captives, said Simon Schorno, an ICRC spokesman.

"We have seen the 14 as of today," said Schorno, speaking from Washington, D.C., following what he called a premature leak by the Pentagon of the meeting with Mohammed and other former CIA held captives.

"We're confirming having visited and registered the 14 detainees, and provided them with the means to exchange Red Cross messages with their families," he added.

He declined to say which, if any, of the 14 detainees had used the format to write home, probably for the first time since they were captured by the CIA and taken to so-called "black sites" somewhere overseas for U.S. interrogation.

President Bush revealed to the world on Sept. 6 that the United States had held the 14 men at secret offshore CIA detention spots, and had over Labor Day had them transferred to military custody at the U.S. Navy base in Cuba.

Their private meetings with Red Cross delegates, who included a doctor and translators, are not monitored by the military, Schorno said.

The "high value detainees" include Mohammed, whom the president referred to by his CIA nickname, "KSM," as well as other men who the United States claims were architects of the 2000 bombing of the USS Cole on Yemen's coast and the U.S. Embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania.

Their health conditions are not known after as much as four years of secret CIA captivity. Schorno deflected a question on whether the Red Cross observed signs that the men had been tortured with this: ``The ICRC does not comment publicly on current or past circumstances of detention or treatment of detainees."

Instead, the delegates relay their concerns about conditions secretly to the country holding prisoners. The Swiss based organization first got access to the prison soon after the detention center opened in Jan. 2002, and they have never commented publicly on the conditions at the base in southeast Cuba.

But the 14 men had been held in secret U.S.-controlled locations -- off the books and out of reach of the International Red Cross, which under the Geneva Conventions has long been responsible for inspecting prisons the world over and verifying that prisoners of war are treated humanely and don't disappear while in custody.

The Pentagon told media in Washington about the completed Red Cross interviews on the same day that it released a formal announcement that the U.S. had sent away 17 captives from the base -- 16 to Afghanistan and another to Morocco.

It did not name the men, but said they had been freed after a series of internal reviews and diplomatic dialogue with their native countries.

Given the ICRC figure of 454 detainees interviewed, minus the 17 unnamed captives the Pentagon said it released Thursday, that left the prison population there at 437.

The Pentagon statement put the number of detainees at ``approximately 440."

At Guantánamo, Navy Cmdr. Robert Durand called the Red Cross consultations "meaningful, useful and confidential" -- meaning he would not spell out any criticisms, if any, the international relief agency made of the captives' conditions.

Durand said the men are entitled to the same health care as U.S. forces on overseas duty.

"As with all other detainees they receive adequate food, shelter, and clothing. They are afforded the opportunity to worship and have access to the Koran in their native language and other prayer accessories," Durand said in a statement.

``Consistent with established policies, they are allowed to send and receive mail."

Red Cross officials arrived on the remote base in southeast Cuba about two weeks ago, after Army Gen. Bantz Craddock, head of the Southern Command, said former CIA-held captives were undergoing a month-long orientation.

They are theoretically to face internal U.S. military reviews to see if they meet Bush administration definitions of "enemy combatants," and potentially future trial by U.S. military tribunal.

Still unclear is when precisely the men now cast as "the worst of the worst" of the Guantánamo population might face the Combatant Status Review Tribunals, which had been open to media coverage in the past.

If the Pentagon provides access similar to earlier hearings, reporters will get the first glimpse of Mohammed, Ramzi Bin al Shibh, and others who were publicly identified by the president as captives at Guantánamo as part of a policy speech on evolving U.S. detention policy.

Senior Defense and Justice Department officials had earlier said reviews would be held within three months of the arrival of the men. That means they should be complete by Christmas.

Red Cross Interviews 14 Qaeda Terrorism Suspects At Guantánamo (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 12 — A team from the Red Cross has met in recent days at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, with Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, who is thought to have been the chief planner of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, and 13 other prisoners identified by the United States government as senior officials of Al Qaeda, Red Cross officials said Thursday.

Until recently, the 14 had been held by the Central Intelligence Agency at undisclosed prisons for as long as four years. The meetings with the delegation from the International Committee of the Red Cross are believed to be, for many, their first contact since their capture with someone not connected with the United States government.

Simon Schorno, an International Red Cross official in Washington, said the visits occurred over the last 10 days, but he declined to say what the Red Cross visitors had learned or observed about the prisoners' conditions, assertions or experiences in C.I.A. custody.

"We do not comment about the past and present condition of detention and treatment," Mr. Schorno said. Under the agreement by which it is allowed access to the prisoners, the Red Cross discusses its findings, and any complaints or recommendations it might have, only with the United States government.

The prisoners were examined by a Red Cross doctor, Mr. Schorno said. The Red Cross also arranged for each of the 14 prisoners to write messages to family members.

President Bush announced the transfer of the detainees to Guantánamo Bay last month, and has said they will be charged with war crimes and tried before a system of military commissions recently approved by Congress.

Mr. Bush is scheduled next week to sign the legislation, which specifies the kinds of tribunals before which the prisoners may be tried and also limits their access to federal courts for legal challenges.

The Red Cross visits are the first step in what will be the public surfacing of this group of detainees.

Military officials have said they will move swiftly to put in place the new military commission procedures for those of the 14 who will be charged with war crimes.

But the officials have said that the earliest the charges will come is sometime in January, meaning that any trials for those identified as senior Qaeda operatives will not occur before spring.

When they are charged, the prisoners will be assigned military defense lawyers, who may speak publicly about what the prisoners have to say. Shortly after that, the prisoners are also likely to acquire civilian defense lawyers, who may be even more likely to speak publicly about what the Qaeda prisoners may say in their defense and about their accounts of their treatment at the hands of C.I.A. interrogators.

The Red Cross interviews with the 14 transferred prisoners at Guantánamo were conducted outside the presence of American officials, with Red Cross officials serving as translators when necessary, Mr. Schorno said.

The letters to their families are written on one side of a Red Cross form and subject to censorship by United States military authorities.

The Red Cross delegation also visited the other 440 prisoners at Guantánamo.

Red Cross Meets With 14 Moved To Guantanamo Bay (WP)

By Josh White, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

An International Committee of the Red Cross delegation that visited the U.S. detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, met with the 14 detainees who had been held for years in secret CIA custody, the first time the alleged high-value terrorism suspects had contact with the outside world since their initial confinement.

The U.S. military and ICRC officials confirmed yesterday that Red Cross representatives spent time with each of the 14 men in the weeks after they were transferred to Guantanamo, a series of standard meetings during which the detainees were officially registered with the international humanitarian organization and had an opportunity to meet with a doctor.

Among the men is Khalid Sheik Mohammed, the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. Red Cross officials do not comment on the details of such meetings or their recommendations to government captors, citing confidentiality agreements that allow them unfettered access. They also declined to comment on the conditions the detainees faced while in secret U.S. custody and on their mental and physical well-being.

Simon Schorno, an ICRC spokesman in Washington, said yesterday that representatives met with the 14 men who had been in CIA custody and shared their observations with Guantanamo authorities.

"We were able to work according to our standard modalities," Schorno said.

During a visit that began on Sept. 25 and ends today, the Red Cross met with a total of 454 detainees -- believed to be the facility's entire detainee population -- as part of a regular series of visits aimed at assessing their treatment and facilitating contact with their families through official letters.

Cmdr. Robert Durand, a Guantanamo spokesman, said yesterday that the ICRC had the opportunity to meet with all detainees and specifically cited the humane treatment afforded both the general detainee population and the 14 high-value detainees who recently arrived. In an e-mail statement, Durand said they receive "adequate food, shelter and clothing," may worship and have access to a Koran, and are given exercise and reading opportunities.

Also yesterday, Pentagon officials announced that they had transferred 17 detainees out of Guantanamo Bay as part of an ongoing effort to reduce the facility's population and to share the detention burden with allies. Sixteen men were released to Afghanistan and one was released to Morocco, bringing the total number of detainees held at Guantanamo to approximately 440. The U.S. military has deemed an additional 110 detainees eligible for release or transfer.

Staff researcher Julie Tate contributed to this report.

Pentagon: Red Cross Met Gitmo Detainees (AP)

By Andrew O. Selsky, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 13, 2006

The Red Cross met at Guantanamo Bay with 14 new "high-value detainees," including Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged mastermind of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, a Pentagon spokesman said Thursday.

The encounters apparently mark the first time the 14 detainees have met with anyone other than their captors since they were arrested, held in CIA custody at secret locations, and transferred weeks ago to Guantanamo Bay Naval Base in Cuba. Among them are the alleged architects of the 2000 bombing of the USS Cole and the U.S. Embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania.

Simon Schorno, spokesman in Washington for the International Committee of the Red Cross, declined to discuss specifics or even confirm the encounters had taken place. In meetings with prisoners, Red Cross officials explain that they are visiting as monitors.

"The detainee is not forced to speak to us," Schorno said. "It is up to the detainee to raise any issues that fall within our concern, for example past detentions and current conditions. It's up to the detainee to address whatever he wants to address."

The Red Cross also can take messages the detainees write, subject to military censorship, for delivery to their families, he said.

But even as the Red Cross wrapped up a more than two-week visit to Guantanamo Bay, the detention center came under increasing criticism.

British Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett, releasing Britain's annual report on human rights around the world, said holding hundreds of terror suspects at the camp for years was "unacceptable in terms of human rights" and "ineffective in terms of counterterrorism."

"It's widely argued now that the existence of the camp is as much a radicalizing and discrediting influence as it is a safeguard for security," she said.

Beckett was the highest-ranking British official to criticize the United States so directly for holding suspects for years without trial at Guantanamo. Prime Minister Tony Blair has gone no further in public than calling the camp an "anomaly" which sooner or later must end.

In response to Beckett's comments, Sean McCormack, a State Department spokesman, said: "Look, we don't want Guantanamo open forever. We don't want to be the world's jailers. We certainly would look forward to the day when Guantanamo is closed.

"At the moment, it's housing some very dangerous people, including those who were responsible for the attack on this country which killed 3,000 people."

The Red Cross, which arrived at Guantanamo Bay on Sept. 25, met the 14 newest detainees this week, Navy Lt. Cmdr. Jeffrey Gordon said at the Pentagon.

Mohammed was believed to be the No. 3 al-Qaida leader before he was captured in Pakistan in 2003. Also among the 14 new detainees are Ramzi Binalshibh, who is accused of helping plan the Sept. 11 attacks and being a lead operative for a foiled plot to crash aircraft into London's Heathrow Airport, and Abu Zubaydah, who was believed to be a link between Osama bin Laden and many al-Qaida cells before he was captured in Pakistan in 2002.

President Bush on Sept. 6 announced they had been moved from CIA custody to Guantanamo for trial.

The detainees reportedly underwent coercive interrogations while being held by the CIA. Bush declined to disclose the techniques but denied they constituted torture.

With the repatriation Thursday of 17 detainees — all but one of them Afghan — there are currently some 440 detainees at Guantanamo, said Lt. Cmdr. Chito Peppler, a Pentagon spokesman.

Most of the 16 released Afghans were innocent and had been turned in to the U.S. military by other Afghans because of personal disputes, said Sibghatullah Mujaddedi, head of Afghanistan's reconciliation commission. Many had been held for four years, he said.

One of the released prisoners, Sayed Mohammead Ali Shah, said he had been a delegate at the country's first loya jirga, a council of leaders that helped establish the interim government in 2002 after the U.S.-led invasion to oust the Taliban in 2001.

"For four years they put me in jail in Cuba for nothing," said Shah, a doctor from the eastern province of Paktia whose hands shook from nervousness when he spoke.

"All these people (the other prisoners) and all those Afghans still in Cuba, they are innocent," he told reporters. "All were arrested because of false reports, and the Americans, without investigating, they arrested innocent people and put them in jail for a long time."

Associated Press writers Robert Burns in the Pentagon and Rahim Faiez in Kabul, Afghanistan, contributed to this report.

Computer Firm Official Sentenced For Dealings With Terrorist (FWST)

By David Koenig

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, October 13, 2006

DALLAS - A Middle East-born businessman was sentenced Thursday to nearly seven years in prison for having financial ties to a high-ranking terrorist and for making illegal computer exports to countries that support terrorism.

Ghassan Elashi was convicted during two separate trials on 27 counts, including conspiracy and money laundering.

Elashi faces a third trial in February for his role in helping run the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, a Muslim charity that federal agents shut down in 2001 after the government accused it of funneling millions to the Palestinian militant group Hamas.

Federal District Court Judge Sam A. Lindsay allowed Elashi to remain free until January, saying he wasn't a flight risk. He is a U.S. citizen with six children and shares a duplex with his mother.

Prosecutors asked the judge to put Elashi in prison immediately. Elashi bristled when a prosecutor suggested he might flee the country rather than serve his 80-month prison term.

"I do not plan to flee the United States," Elashi said. "I plan to stay here and defend myself (against) your accusations about me and the Holy Land Foundation."

Holy Land officials have said the group aided hospitals, schools and orphans in the West Bank and Gaza.

Last year, a jury in federal district court convicted Elashi of financial dealings with a top Hamas official, who was married to Elashi's cousin. The U.S. government had designated the man, Mousa Abu Marzook, a terrorist in 1995, which made transactions with him illegal.

In a 2004 trial, Elashi and four of his brothers were convicted of making computer shipments to Libya and Syria without the special permits needed because the U.S. government deemed both countries as supporters of terrorism.

Elashi's lawyer, Tim Evans, said he would appeal the convictions.

Evans said the transactions with Marzook were innocent dealings with the man's wife, and that the export violations didn't merit more than two years in prison. He said the equipment the Elashis shipped to Libya and Syria could have been purchased at any U.S. computer store.

"What they were doing just wasn't that dangerous," Evans said.

But prosecutor Barry Jonas said an FBI agent was prepared to testify about Elashi's background and that the government would show in the next trial that as chairman of Holy Land Foundation, he supported terrorism.

Jonas also said that the export violations were serious. Because the Elashis didn't obtain export permits, the U.S. government doesn't know who bought the computers or why, he said.

"Those policies are one front in the United States' war on terrorism," Jonas said.

Judge Lindsay said Elashi's convictions "had nothing to do with people blowing up buildings." During the 2004 and 2005 trials, he limited references to terrorism to focus on the charges in the indictment.

Elashi, 52, was born in a Palestinian enclave that is now occupied by Israeli. His lawyer said Elashi's mother's was thrown off her orange orchard by the Israelis.

Carrying an Egyptian passport, Elashi came to the United States as a young adult. He attended college and started a computer company with his brothers in California, then moved it to the Dallas suburb of Richardson.

Elashi declined to speak to the judge before sentencing, but later he took the witness stand to seek a delay in going to prison.

Three of Elashi's brothers received sentences of 5 1/2 to seven years each, and a fourth is scheduled to be sentenced Friday in Lindsay's court. Ghassan was the only brother indicted in the Holy Land case.

Jury Selection Begins In Terrorism Trial (WP/AP)

By Mike Robinson, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

CHICAGO -- Jury selection began Thursday in the trial of two men charged with bankrolling terrorism aimed at toppling Israel's government.

Muhammad Salah, 53, from suburban Bridgeview, and Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, of Alexandria, Va., are charged with operating a 15-year racketeering conspiracy to supply the Palestinian terrorist group Hamas with money to carry out a campaign of murders and kidnappings.

U.S. District Judge Amy J. St. Eve said she hopes to have a jury chosen Monday, with opening statements set for Tuesday or Wednesday.

Salah was arrested by Israeli soldiers in January 1993 at a checkpoint as he sought to leave the Gaza Strip. The same day, agents found $97,000 in cash in his room at a hotel in East Jerusalem.

Under interrogation, he admitted that he had visited Hamas military leaders and distributed money to them. He pleaded guilty and served five years in Israeli prisons.

The statements he made in Israel 12 years ago now are a key part of the evidence against Salah. The agents who interrogated him are expected to testify at the new trial _ in a courtroom cleared of spectators while wearing disguises and using aliases.

Prosecutors say the security measures are needed to prevent terrorists from taking reprisals against the two Israeli agents and their families.

But Salah defense attorney Michael E. Deutsch said the admissions his client made were the result of torture and should not be in evidence.

"He was tortured for 14 days," Deutsch said. "He was deprived of sleep for 45 of the first 50 hours, tied to a small chair, hooded and isolated."

According to the indictment, thousands of dollars from a number of Ashqar bank accounts was funneled overseas to pay for Hamas operations. Agents also found a cache of Hamas documents when they searched his home.

Ashqar's attorney, William Moffitt, secured the December acquittal of professor Sami al-Arian on a number of charges that he helped lead the Palestinian Islamic Jihad terrorist group.

The Florida jury deadlocked on other charges against al-Arian in what amounted to a stunning defeat for the federal government.

"Not much has been said about Dr. Ashqar's defense, and I'd like to keep it that way for a few more days," Moffitt told a reporter Wednesday. "But I can guarantee you that we're going to have some serious fireworks."

Charity Without Fear (WLS-TV)

DOJ_NMG_0080323

By Cheryl Burton

WLS-TV, October 13, 2006

October 12, 2006 - The long awaited civil trial of Mohammed Salah began this week. The former college professor is accused of funneling money to terrorist groups in Palestine through an Islamic charity in Oak Lawn. Cheryl Burton explains why some other Muslim groups now say they, too, feel like they are under attack.

Mohammed Salah is one of several local Muslims who the government accuses of using "good will" to cover up evil deeds. And now some unlikely backlash has fallen on other Arab and Muslim charities. Donations are down and worry is way up. But the groups are not taking it lying down. They're using the same legal process to seek government protection.

The new home of Arab-American Family Services is nestled in the basement of a non-descript US Bank building in southwest suburban Burbank. The founders say their last landlord kicked them out -- afraid of possible backlash.

"If five years or 10 years down the road you say the government finds this institution or this charity something is wrong with it, then you're going to be charged with helping fund some terrorist activity that the community didn't know about," said Itedal Shalabi, Arab-American Family Services.

Services offered range from helping victims of domestic abuse to translating forms for Arabic speakers. The non-profit group has not been accused of having terrorists ties. Yet its donations have dropped some 15 percent since 9/11.

"A lot of people said give me the list of what you need. I'd rather go buy it and bring you the stuff you need than give cash," said Shalabi.

Another concern is that donated money will never get where it was intended to go.

"Following 9/11, the government and the Treasury Department froze the funds of the five largest Islamic charities in the US," said Dr. Mohammed Sahloul, president of the Mosque Foundation.

In 2004, the 9/11 Commission concluded the shutdown of two Chicago-area charities raised "substantial" concerns about civil rights. The government dropped charges of terrorism against the former head of the Benevolence International Foundation in Palos Hills in 2003. They cut a deal with Enaam Arnaout. He pleaded guilty to using donated money to finance Islamic fighters in Bosnia and Chechnya.

No convictions were made in connection with Bridgeview-based Global Relief, but that group's co-founder was judged a security risk and deported. Both groups are still closed, leaving millions untouchable.

One man told us he has now changed the way he helps the poor in his homeland of Jordan.

"We used to do it through charity before September 11th. We used to do that. Right now, as much as I can, I send it directly to the people," said Wail Ziyad.

Others echo the fear.

"People have given money and it has been held with no kind of pre-warning or explanation only to be labeled and that's it. It's closed down," said Jeanean Othman.

"We know that a lot of locals that used to donate were visited by some government officials, asked questions about those organizations and that created some sort of fear," said Kifah Mustafa.

On the other side, FBI Special Agent Rob Grant contends that fear not only hurts the Muslim community itself, but also hinders the war on terror.

"One of the things that we've been trying to do for the last five years is convince the community to come forward, and unfortunately, in cases overseas and in some cases here, evidence of people wanting to commit terrorist acts or support terrorist acts has been present in some of these communities, and they have not come to law enforcement and that is the great bridge that we have to cross," said Robert Grant, Chicago FBI director.

This fear prompted a number of community leaders to head to Springfield for relief last year. The result? A resolution called "Charity Without Fear." It asks the federal government to provide a so-called "clean" list of Muslim organizations deemed safe and to protect donors from prosecution if a charity misuses funds.

So far, there has been no official response.

"There was no laws implemented as part of this resolution, and as far as I know, there was no follow up by Homeland Security to provide American Muslims with a safe list of charities, you know, the charities where they can donate without fear," said Dr. Mohammed Sahloul, president of the Mosque Foundation.

During this month of Ramadan, Muslims are obligated by their faith to give away 2.5 percent of their wealth through what is called zakat. Arab leaders say when assets are frozen for charitable organizations, they would like to see the government return the money to the donors or distribute it amongst other charities the government deems acceptable.

Briton Pleads Guilty In Plots Tied To Al-Qaeda (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

LONDON, Oct. 12 -- An alleged al-Qaeda operative pleaded guilty in a British court Thursday to plotting to bomb the International Monetary Fund and other financial centers in Washington and New York in August 2004.

Those schemes led President Bush to authorize an orange, or high risk, security alert that sent police officers with automatic weapons into the streets to guard government and financial buildings as well as tunnels leading into Manhattan.

Dhiren Barot, 34, of north London, also pleaded guilty to planning attacks in Britain involving radiological devices known as dirty bombs and a scheme to blow up three limousines packed with gas cylinders in underground parking garages. Prosecutors said these plans were detailed on computer files seized in Pakistan.

Prosecutor Edmund Lawson said in Woolwich Crown Court in south London that the attacks planned for the United States were "designed to kill as many innocent people as possible" and those in Britain to cause "injury, fear, terror and chaos."

Barot, wearing a khaki-colored zip-up sweater, black shirt and closely cropped beard, told the judge, "I plead guilty," in a calm and emotionless voice, according to Britain's Press Association.

Barot was one of eight alleged al-Qaeda operatives, all British citizens, charged in the plot; the seven others are scheduled to be tried next year. Barot and two others, Nadeem Tarmohamed and Qaisar Shaffi, also have been indicted in the United States on terrorism-related charges.

U.S. and British officials accused them of conducting scouting missions in 2000 and 2001 to the New York Stock Exchange and Citigroup Center in New York, the Prudential Financial building in Newark, and the IMF and World Bank headquarters in Washington.

Barot, who was raised in a Hindu home and converted to Islam, was mentioned by an alias, Issa al-Britani, in the final report of the commission that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States.

The report said an al-Qaeda leader in custody told interrogators that in early 2001 Osama bin Laden had sent "Britani" to the United States "to case potential economic and 'Jewish' targets in New York City" for possible attack.

It remained unclear how far the plot had advanced. Lawson told the judge he had no evidence to contradict a defense contention that the conspirators had acquired no funding, vehicles or bomb-making materials for their plot.

Lawson also did not dispute a defense contention that the planned dirty bomb would have caused fear and disruption but would have been unlikely to kill anyone.

Officials said files containing information about the British plot were found on the computer of Mohammad Naeem Noor Khan, an alleged al-Qaeda computer expert who was arrested in Pakistan in July 2004.

Senior Pakistani intelligence officials have said that Barot met Khan in Pakistan in March 2004. They said British officials had spoken extensively to Khan about the plot involving Barot and the other Britons.

No date has been set for Barot's sentencing.

Man Pleads Guilty In U.S. Bomb Plot (WT/AP)

By Jill Lawless

The Washington Times, October 13, 2006

LONDON -- A British man identified by U.S. officials as a senior al Qaeda figure pleaded guilty yesterday to conspiracy to murder in a plot to bomb high-profile targets in the United States including the International Monetary Fund headquarters in Washington and the New York Stock Exchange.

"I plead guilty," Dhiren Barot, 34, said in a clear voice at London's high-security Woolwich Crown Court.

Prosecutors said the plot involved targets in both Britain and the United States. Other purported targets included the World Bank headquarters in Washington, the Citigroup building in New York and the Prudential building in Newark, N.J.

Barot, a British citizen who was raised a Hindu before converting to Islam, was arrested in August 2004 amid a heightened security alert for financial institutions in the United States. Seven other men are due to face trial next year.

Prosecutor Edmund Lawson said Barot planned "to carry out explosions at those premises with no warning. They were plainly designed to kill as many people as possible."

U.S. officials claim Barot is a senior al Qaeda figure, known variously as Abu Eisa al-Hindi, Abu Musa al-Hindi and Issa al-Britani, who scouted prominent financial targets in the United States at the behest of Osama bin Laden.

He was indicted last year in New York, along with two others, on charges of plotting to attack the buildings.

Under British law, domestic legal proceedings take precedence over a U.S. extradition attempt.

DOJ_NMG_0080325

In Britain, Barot planned to pack three limousines with gas cylinders and explosives and detonate them in underground parking garages, Mr. Lawson said.

The "gas limos" plan, found on a computer, was "described by Mr. Barot as the main cornerstone of attacks planned to take place in the U.K.," Mr. Lawson said.

He said the "back-to-back" attacks involved three other projects, including "the rough presentation for radiation or dirty-bomb projects."

A dirty bomb combines radioactive material with conventional explosives, though prosecutors did not offer detail on the components of the planned device.

Mr. Lawson said the dirty bomb was designed to cause "injury, fear, terror and chaos" although it was unlikely to kill anyone.

"The radiation project was designed, among other things, to affect some 500 people," Mr. Lawson said.

The clerk of the court told Barot he was charged with conspiracy to murder -- "the particulars of the offense being that on diverse days between Jan. 1, 2000, and Aug. 4, 2004, you conspired together with other persons unknown to murder other persons."

Barot, wearing a gray zip-up sweater and dark trousers and sporting a closely trimmed beard, stared intently ahead but betrayed no emotion as he entered his guilty plea.

By pleading guilty, Barot "makes no admission with regard to the involvement of any of his seven co-defendants in the conspiracy," Mr. Lawson said.

Mr. Lawson said plans outlining details of the attacks had been found on a computer after Barot's arrest in August 2004. He acknowledged that no funding had been received for Barot's projects, nor any vehicles or bomb-making materials acquired.

Judge Neil Butterfield deferred sentencing to a later date.

The judge ordered that 12 other charges faced by Barot -- one of conspiracy to commit public nuisance, seven of making a record of information for terrorist purposes and four of possessing a record of information for terrorist purposes -- be suspended.

Under Britain's tight media laws, the judge ordered that further details of the conspiracy not be reported to prevent prejudicing the trials of any future defendants.

Barot was arrested by British police in August 2004 after a massive security alert in the United States.

Briton Admits US Terror Plot (FT)

By Nikki Tait

Financial Times, October 13, 2006

A London man on Thursday pleaded guilty to planning terror attacks in Britain and the US, including plots to blow up financial centres in New York, New Jersey and Washington.

Dhiren Barot, a Muslim convert, pleaded guilty Woolwich Crown Court to one count of conspiring to murder people between January 2000 and August 2004.

Prosecutors said that Mr Barot, who was arrested in August 2004, had indicated that the plea encompassed terrorism plans in both the US and UK. On the former score, Edmund Lawson, QC, told a judge at the south London court that there had been proposals found by police on a computer after the August arrests two years ago.

Those, he said, involved "plans for attacks on the International Monetary Fund and World Bank buildings in Washington, the New York Stock Exchange and Citigroup buildings in New York, and the Prudential buildings in Newark".

He added these were plans "to carry out explosions at those premises with no warning – they were basically designed to kill as many innocent people as possible"

But there had also been separate plots aimed at targets in the UK, prosecutors claimed.

One involved a plan to pack limousines with gas cylinders and explosives, which would be blown up in underground car parks. Another was a "dirty bomb" project, which could be executed in a "sychronised, concurrent and back-to-back" way with the previous scheme.

The plans, however, did not appear to have reached an advanced stage, and prosecutors said that accepted Mr Barot's claim that no finances or bomb-making equipment had been in place.

Mr Barot, who has been held at the Belmarsh high-security prison in south London, had been facing 12 further charges – seven of which focused on making a record of information for terrorist purposes and four of possessing a record of information for terrorist purposes. These will "lie on the file" in the light of his single guilty plea. He will be sentenced at a later date.

Another seven individuals have been charged in the alleged conspiracy and await trial. However, prosecutors made clear that, by his guilty plea, Mr Barot was making no admission about the involvement of any of the other co-defendants.

Briton Admits To Plotting Attacks On U.S. (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, October 13, 2006

LONDON — A 34-year-old British man pleaded guilty Thursday to murder conspiracy in what authorities said was a plot to blow up the New York Stock Exchange and other high-profile financial targets across the eastern United States.

Computer records also revealed that the plot, still in its infancy, included plans to explode a radioactive "dirty bomb" in Britain capable of causing "injury, fear, terror and chaos," authorities said.

Dhiren Barot, a native of India who grew up in North London and converted to Islam, admitted his role in both parts of the conspiracy. But there was no evidence presented that he and his codefendants had raised any money or acquired any materials to carry out the attacks.

The arrests of Barot and seven other suspects in 2004 led to a high-level security alert in the U.S. aimed at securing buildings in financial districts in New York, New Jersey and Washington believed to be targets in the plot.

Computer records that U.S. authorities said were seized in separate investigations in London and Pakistan revealed plans to attack not only the New York Stock Exchange, but also the International Monetary Fund and World Bank buildings in Washington, the Citigroup building in New York and the Prudential building in Newark, N.J., prosecutors said.

The plan was "to carry out explosions at those premises with no warning. They were basically designed to kill as many innocent people as possible," prosecutor Edmund Lawson told the Woolwich Crown Court in South London.

Investigators said that, in addition to evidence of a plot to explode a dirty bomb in Britain, they uncovered plans for "back-to-back" attacks using three limousines packed with gas cylinders, explosives and detonators that were to be blown up in underground parking lots, Lawson said.

The original indictment charged Barot with possessing reconnaissance plans of the IMF headquarters, the stock exchange and Citigroup building, along with two notebooks containing information on explosives, poisons, chemicals and related matters. The defendant, however, entered a plea only on the conspiracy charge, suspending for now the other charges.

"I plead guilty," he said quietly in response to the judge's query.

Barot and two of the other defendants awaiting trial in Britain also face charges in the United States in connection with the same alleged conspiracy, but U.S. prosecutors have said they will await the completion of legal proceedings in Britain before pursuing the case.

Neither indictment has expressly linked the defendants to the Al Qaeda terrorist network. But one of the aliases attributed to Barot in the U.S. indictment is similar to the name of a man identified in the final report by the federal commission investigating the Sept. 11 attacks as a senior Al Qaeda leader. The report says the man, identified as Issa al Britani, was dispatched by Al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden to scout for "potential economic and 'Jewish' targets in New York City."

The report also says Britani had been dispatched by self-declared Sept. 11 mastermind Khalid Shaikh Mohammed to Malaysia to learn about the jihad in Southeast Asia from a senior leader of the Jemaah Islamiah organization, now in custody in the U.S.

According to the U.S. indictment filed in New York, Barot used the aliases Esa al-Britani, Abu Esa al-Britani, Esa al-Hindi and Issa al-Hindi. It says Barot had enrolled in college in New York as cover for a series of reconnaissance missions he undertook with his codefendants in New York and Washington between Aug. 17, 2000, and April 8, 2001.

No sentencing date was scheduled. Lawson said that in his guilty plea, Barot made "no admission with regard to the involvement of any of his seven codefendants in the conspiracy." They are scheduled to face trial next year.

U.S. State Dept. Lawyer: Up To 80 Terror Suspects Face Military Commission Trials (FINDLAW/AP)

AP, October 13, 2006

(AP) - BERLIN-Up to 80 terror suspects at Guantanamo Bay face the prospect of a trial before U.S. military commissions, an U.S. government adviser said Thursday.

U.S. President George W. Bush is to sign a law allowing the creation of the commissions on Tuesday, John Bellinger, a legal adviser to the U.S. State Department, said during a visit to Germany.

"We hope that that will allow the military commission trials finally to go forward ... including the trials of the additional 14 senior members of al-Qaida and al-Qaida operatives who were brought in," Bellinger said.

He did not say when the trials might begin or who would be tried first. However, he said that up to 80 individuals will go on trial.

"As far as to how many we expect there to be, there have been several dozen individuals charged already," Bellinger said during a discussion of legal aspects of U.S. counterterrorism efforts with reporters, human rights campaigners and academics.

DOJ_NMG_0080327

"The best estimates that I have seen from our Defense Department and our Justice Department are in the neighborhood of 60 to 80 we hope can be charged on the evidence we have collected so far," he said.

The U.S. Congress passed legislation last month designed to put the CIA's clandestine interrogation program back on track as well as opening the way for terrorist trials.

The Bush administration is expected to try some or all of 14 former CIA suspects held at secret prisons now held by the military at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The group includes Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the suspected mastermind of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

FBI Names Counterterrorism Office Chief (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, October 13, 2006

A veteran FBI agent who served as the on-scene commander for agents deployed to Tanzania during the 1998 investigation of the al Qaeda terrorist attack on the U.S. Embassy has been named to lead the bureau's Counterterrorism Division.

FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III made the announcement yesterday, noting that Joseph Billy Jr. has been credited by top Justice Department officials with pioneering several initiatives to help fight against international terrorism.

"Joe Billy's broad experience in counterterrorism and counterintelligence over his FBI career makes him uniquely qualified to fill the position of assistant director of the Counterterrorism Division," Mr. Mueller said.

Mr. Billy, who has served as acting assistant director since June, has worked as a field agent in New York City; a supervisor in the Foreign Counterintelligence Program; a supervisor of an FBI/New York City Police Department Joint Terrorism Task Force; and as an assistant special agent in charge.

In addition to his command position in Tanzania, he led an FBI contingent of experienced terrorist agents to Northern Ireland in 1998 to assist the police in a terrorist investigation.

Mr. Billy, a 28-year FBI veteran, recently told reporters of his concerns about weapons of mass destruction, undetected homegrown terrorists and the possibility that mobsters in this country could team up with al Qaeda terrorists for the right price.

While there is no direct evidence that mob figures in this country have made any effort to hook up with terrorists, his concerns about a possible connection continues.

Those concerns were heightened when undercover FBI agents stopped a man with suspected mob ties from selling missiles to an informant posing as a terrorist middleman.

"We are continuing to look for a nexus. We are looking at this very aggressively," Mr. Billy said. "We have developed an ability to look harder and broader in a greatly enhanced way to see if there is any crossover."

Mr. Billy was promoted in 1999 to section chief in charge of international training at the FBI Academy in Quantico, Va., where he was responsible for a wide range of programs, including leadership training and continuing professional development training for FBI employees. During his tenure at the academy, he served as acting assistant director in charge, where he was responsible for all aspects of FBI training.

In February 2002, he was appointed special agent in charge of the New York field office's National Security Division and later as special agent in charge of the new Counterterrorism Division, which was formed in New York. In February 2004, he was named as special agent in charge of the Newark, N.J., field office and in March 2005, he returned to Washington headquarters to oversee the FBI's international terrorism operations.

Mr. Billy holds a masters degree in public administration from the University of Southern California.

Crossover Extremists Pose Big Threat (NSDY/AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Terrorists from different extremist groups who unite against a common cause -- such as the United States -- may be among the next big threats to America, the FBI's newly promoted counterterror chief says.

FBI Assistant Director Joseph Billy Jr., named Thursday as the permanent chief of the agency's counterterrorism division, said there's no evidence yet of "crossover" extremists in the U.S.

But "there's always the potential of the like-minded individuals rising up against their home country," Billy said in an interview with The Associated Press.

"Groups cross lines, and we have to look at it less defined (instead of) to say we're looking strictly at Hezbollah, looking at Hamas," Billy said. "In a coffee shop, it doesn't take much for the rhetoric to incite and recruit people. You may be aligned with one particular cause, but the fact is you have a common enemy. And the common enemy means that people can team up."

Billy had been the FBI's acting counterterror chief since June. He heads up one of the FBI's largest divisions, overseeing 101 Joint Terror Task Force teams nationwide, with thousands of ongoing investigations at any given time.

August's foiled plot by British nationals conspiring to blow up as many as 10 U.S.-bound airlines underscored the need for international counterterror coordination, Billy said. Such work, he said, could be likened to a sort of global terror task force -- even though the FBI's investigations would remain in the United States.

"We've really moved beyond the borders of the United States, and really working as partners against this threat that faces many counties, not just the United States," he said.

The soft-spoken FBI veteran of 28 years whose name plate on his desk is spelled out in Arabic, led the investigation of the 1998 U.S. embassy bombing in Tanzania. That same year, he led a delegation of FBI agents to Northern Ireland to help local police on a terror investigation.

He also has worked in FBI field offices in New York and New Jersey.

Congress Lets Mob-tied Felons Work At U.S. Ports (SH)

By Deroy Murdock

Scripps News, October 13, 2006

Before Congress passed a port-security bill on Sept. 30, a House-Senate panel deleted a proposed ban by Sen. Jim DeMint, R-S.C., on current or future dockworkers convicted of murder, conspiracy, explosives trafficking and transporting hazardous materials, among other felonies. As The Wall Street Journal's John Fund reported Oct. 2, conferees stripped this language "in the dead of night at the behest of unions fearful that too many of their members could lose their jobs." Call this measure "No Longshoreman Left Behind."

Among the 9,000 truck drivers the Department of Homeland Security investigated in New York's and New Jersey's ports, about half carried convictions for such crimes as homicide, arson and drug distribution. DHS concluded: These are "vulnerabilities that could be capitalized by terrorist organizations." Former customs agent Joseph King wondered: "Instead of bringing in 50 kilograms of heroin, what would stop them from bringing in five kilograms of plutonium?"

Station WTVJ "checked more than 1,300 members of the three major longshoremen's unions listed in port records," NBC's Miami affiliate reported in March 2001. "We found nearly one in five are convicted felons in Florida. Their offenses include: attempted murder, armed robbery, assault and battery, trafficking in cocaine, grand theft, auto theft and sex with a child. Despite a county law with strict guidelines on hiring convicted felons, nearly half who appeal to a special panel to work at the port are approved."

Miami's deputy port director, Khalid Salahuddin, said: "From our standpoint, what benefit would it do to kick him out on the street? We see none."

UnionFacts.com reported that in the 2004 election the International Longshoremen's Association (ILA) made $463,500 in political contributions _ 89 percent to Democrats, 10 percent to Republicans. The International Longshore and Warehouse Union gave $367,035 _ 98 percent to Democrats. Like other AFL-CIO affiliates, these unions help deliver Big Labor's vote on Election Day.

Longshoremen also have colluded with the Mafia.

"To control and dominate the New York/New Jersey waterfront and The Port of Miami," the Justice Department announced July 6, 2005, "the Genovese and Gambino families placed organized-crime members, associates and relatives into high-ranking positions on the ILA's governing Executive Council and into positions as trustees of ILA pension, welfare and benefit funds." Former Brooklyn ILA boss Frank "Red" Scollo, indicted with Gambino capo Peter Gotti and 15 others in June 2002, pleaded guilty to racketeering in 2004.

Genovese control of ILA Local 1588 included enforcer Joseph Lore's embezzlement of the New Jersey union as its presidents, Eugene G'Sell and John Angelone, acquiesced. According to the National Legal and Policy Center, Lore "got rough if the union front men were uncooperative, at one point threatening to use a blowtorch on Angelone's crotch."

The FBI frets that terrorists could exploit the greed of underworld figures.

DOJ_NMG_0080329

"They will deal with anybody if they can make a buck," Matt Heron, the FBI's top New York City mob fighter, told the Associated Press' Pat Milton. "They will sell to a terrorist just as easily as they would sell to an order of Franciscan monks. It's a business relationship to them."

La Cosa Nostra's economic philosophy is simple, explained Pasquale D'Amuro, an FBI alumnus and now chief of Giuliani Security.

"I am aware of a high-level Mafia figure, who was cooperating with authorities, being asked if the Mafia would assist terrorists in smuggling people into Europe through Italy," D'Amuro told AP. "He said, 'The Mafia will help who ever can pay.' "

Even if most wiseguys would spurn al Qaeda's advances, the weak link could be a lone mobbed-up watchman, say, on a Staten Island dock. Desperate to pay his impatient bookie, terrorists _ or local sympathizers _ could bribe him to take a long walk along a short pier, just before a small boat unloads a nondescript box at 3:15 one morning.

"I ain't seen nuttin'," he truthfully could tell cops days later, as they investigated how an atomic device rearranged Times Square.

Bipartisan congressional conferees took an oath to "defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign or domestic." Invited by DeMint to do precisely that, they chose instead to keep U.S. ports safe for politically connected, criminally infested labor unions.

No wonder Americans hold Congress beneath contempt.

Documents Reveal Scope Of U.S. Database On Antiwar Protests (NYT)

By Eric Lichtblau

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 12 — Internal military documents released Thursday provided new details about the Defense Department's collection of information on demonstrations nationwide last year by students, Quakers and others opposed to the Iraq war.

The documents, obtained by the American Civil Liberties Union under a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit, show, for instance, that military officials labeled as "potential terrorist activity" events like a "Stop the War Now" rally in Akron, Ohio, in March 2005.

The Defense Department acknowledged last year that its analysts had maintained records on war protests in an internal database past the 90 days its guidelines allowed, and even after it was determined there was no threat.

A department spokesman said Thursday that the "questionable data collection" had led to a tightening of military procedures to ensure that only information relevant to terrorism and other threats was collected. The spokesman, Maj. Patrick Ryder, said in response to the release of the documents that the department "views with great concern any potential violation" of the policy.

"There is nothing more important or integral to the effectiveness of the U.S. military than the trust and good will of the American people," Major Ryder said.

A document first disclosed last December by NBC News showed that the military had maintained a database, known as Talon, containing information about more than 1,500 "suspicious incidents" around the country in 2004 and 2005. Dozens of alerts on antiwar meetings and peaceful protests appear to have remained in the database even after analysts had decided that they posed no threat to military bases or personnel.

Some documents obtained by the A.C.L.U. referred to the potential for disruption to military recruiting and the threat posed to military personnel as a result.

An internal report produced in May 2005, for instance, discussed antiwar protests at the University of California, Santa Cruz, and was issued "to clarify why the Students for Peace and Justice represent a potential threat to D.O.D. personnel."

The memorandum noted that several hundred students had recently protested the presence of military recruiters at a career fair and demanded that they leave.

"The clear purpose of these civil disobedience actions was to disrupt the recruiting mission of the U.S. Army Recruiting Command by blocking the entrance to the recruiting station and causing the stations to shut down early," it said.

But the document also noted that "to date, no reported incidents have occurred at these protests."

The documents indicated that intelligence reports and tips about antiwar protests, including mundane details like the schedule for weekly planning meetings, were widely shared among analysts from the military, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Department of Homeland Security.

"There is simply no reason why the United States military should be monitoring the peaceful activities of American citizens who oppose U.S. war policies," said Ben Wizner, a lawyer for the A.C.L.U.

Joyce Miller, an official with the American Friends Service Committee, a Quaker group that learned that information on some of its antiwar protests was in the military database, said she found the operation to be a "chilling" and troubling trend.

World Series Security In Works (DEN)

By Paul Egan

Detroit News, October 13, 2006

Area authorities begin planning crowd control, traffic in light of Tigers' 2-0 lead over Oakland.

Detroit Police, the FBI and other area law enforcement agencies are preparing for crowd control and heightened security in the event Detroit is the host of games in Major League Baseball's World Series.

Officials said they were working on plans in light of the Detroit Tigers' 2-0 lead in the American League Championship Series going into today's game in Detroit.

Officials said their work will be made easier by Detroit's experiences hosting the Super Bowl Feb. 5 and baseball's All-Star Game in July 2005.

Detroit Deputy Chief James Tate said officials were working on plans Thursday that may include changing two-way streets near Comerica Park to one-way streets and providing easier access to and from freeways.

It's not known whether an area around Comerica would be off-limits to nonticket-holders, as Ford Field was for those not attending the Super Bowl, Tate said. He noted the Super Bowl is deemed a "level one" security event by the U.S. Department of Homeland Security, but a World Series game and the All-Star Game is not.

U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy said an Anti-Terrorism Advisory Council, which includes all levels of law enforcement and representatives of private businesses, will likely meet in the next few days to discuss World Series plans.

Tragedy On The Skyline (NYT)

The sight of a Manhattan apartment tower set ablaze by a crashing airplane was chilling both for the immediate tragedy and for the memories it stirred of the 9/11 atrocities. Terrorism proved no factor in the crash of the single-propeller plane into the 30th floor of the East Side apartment house, a half block from the waterfront. But the accident, which cost the lives of the Yankees pitcher Cory Lidle and his flight instructor, laid bare a troubling situation unknown to most New Yorkers — a low-altitude, free-flying corridor over the northern stretch of the East River that many veteran small-plane pilots consider treacherous.

Small planes and helicopters had been permitted to fly the corridor below 1,100 feet without clearance. The policy relied on experienced pilots to use their own "see-and-avoid" capabilities in such low-speed traffic. In the aftermath of the crash, the Federal Aviation Administration was wise to order a temporary halt to the policy and to require instead that all planes flying below 1,500 feet over New York City first get authorization from air traffic control. Unfortunately, this was a one-day order.

The free-flying corridor, set safely below commercial flight paths, has been a boon to assorted helicopters used by business executives, tourists and highway traffic reporters. But on an overcast day with low cloud cover, as was the case Wednesday, wiser general aviation pilots avoid it. Some officials speculate that the Lidle plane's pilot, cruising above the river after a spin around the Statue of Liberty, may have crashed as he attempted a U-turn in the corridor to avoid the existing requirement that permission be requested to fly farther north.

Tighter controls should be restored indefinitely, at least until the details of the tragedy are clear, and the burden will then be on the F.A.A. to explain why small planes should not stay under restraint permanently. The most compelling argument is that closer tracking of all low-altitude fliers would greatly increase the tasks of the already burdened air traffic system, requiring more controllers and better radar equipment. But the answer is clearly to upgrade the system, not reduce precautions.

WAR NEWS:

Panel Reports Fraud By Some Nonprofits (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 12 — A report by Democratic investigators for the Senate Finance Committee said Thursday that several nonprofit groups linked to the corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff became arms of his lobbying operation and "appear to have perpetrated a fraud on other taxpayers."

The report found that officials of the nonprofit groups, including Americans for Tax Reform, a prominent conservative group run by the Republican strategist Grover G. Norquist, agreed to "carry out Mr. Abramoff's requests for help with his clients in exchange for cash payments."

The committee's ranking Democrat, Senator Max Baucus of Montana, said in releasing the report that the Justice Department and the Internal Revenue Service would "have to determine whether tax laws were broken, but in my view, these groups' dealings with Jack Abramoff certainly violated the spirit, and perhaps the letter, of the laws" on tax-exempt groups.

Mr. Abramoff's abuse of charitable groups, including one he founded, the Capitol Athletic Foundation, has been well-documented.

In January, the former lobbyist pleaded guilty to conspiring to corrupt public officials, including members of Congress, in a wide-ranging scheme that involved funneling his clients' money through tax-exempt groups. He is scheduled to begin serving a prison sentence next month.

None of the officers of the charities that were the focus of the new Senate report have been charged with a crime, and the charities have denied any wrongdoing in their dealings with Mr. Abramoff. But the report suggested that several of the charities had taken actions to benefit his lobbying operation that should put their tax-exempt status in question.

Spokesmen for Americans for Tax Reform did not return phone calls for comment Thursday night.

The Banking Committee report is especially critical of the group, which has close ties to the Bush administration through Mr. Norquist, as having apparently offered its support to causes championed by Mr. Abramoff's lobbying clients in exchange for large donations.

The report cited instances, based on Mr. Abramoff's e-mail, in which Mr. Norquist's group had taken money from the lobbyist "with tacit or explicit agreements to perform services, such as writing newspaper columns favorable to the clients" or with a promise to help his clients meet Karl Rove, President Bush's top political adviser, and other government officials. There was no accusation of wrongdoing by Mr. Rove, and the report did not suggest that he knew of the payments.

The report quoted a lawyer for Mr. Norquist, Cleta Mitchell, as having told the Finance Committee that Americans for Tax Reform had not abused its tax-exempt status and that the group had used its contributions "in keeping with its general purpose and permissible activities under the law."

Another of the nonprofit groups that was close to Mr. Abramoff, the National Center for Public Policy Research, criticized the Democratic report as "entirely unfair and inaccurate" and said the center had been "extremely conscientious at all times about complying with all regulations" on tax-exempt groups.

The center came under special scrutiny last year after it was disclosed that the group had underwritten overseas trips for lawmakers who were being courted by Mr. Abramoff, including a lavish visit to London for Tom DeLay, who was then House majority leader and who resigned from Congress this year. Mr. Abramoff had been a member of the center's board.

U.K. Army Head Said To Seek Iraq Pullout (AP)

By Tariq Panja, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 13, 2006

Britain's new army chief called for a withdrawal of British troops from Iraq, warning that the military's presence there only exacerbates security problems, according to an interview published Thursday.

Gen. Richard Dannatt described British Prime Minister Tony Blair's Iraq policies as "naive," declaring that while Iraqis might have welcomed coalition forces following the ouster of Saddam Hussein, the good will has since evaporated after years of violence.

The British military should "get ourselves out sometime soon because our presence exacerbates the security problems," Dannatt said in an interview with the Daily Mail released on the tabloid's Web site. "Whatever consent we may have had in the first place" from the Iraqi people "has largely turned to intolerance," he was quoted as saying.

The British government has not yet set a timetable for the departure of its 7,500 troops from Iraq.

The Defense Ministry responded to the interview by saying: "We have a clear strategy in Iraq. We are there with our international partners in support of the democratically elected government of Iraq, under a clear U.N. mandate."

Blair's office referred all questions to the Defense Ministry.

Dannatt's comments are certain to infuriate Blair, who is President Bush's key ally in the Iraq war. It is highly unusual for a sitting British military commander to publicly criticize the government's foreign policy. Dannatt took over as army commander in late August.

Britain's involvement in Iraq has proved highly controversial from the outset. Millions protested on the streets in the lead up to the war in 2003, while high profile cabinet ministers have quit the government as a result of Blair's support for the U.S.-led action.

The general's comments may signal an increasing boldness among senior military officials who fear that the army is overstretched on two fronts — Afghanistan and Iraq. Other commanders have been quoted as saying the military needs to provide greater support for troops in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Dannatt said Britain's presence in the country was worsening security problems domestically too, contrary to Blair's claims that the war in Iraq had no link to the terror threat facing Britain. Such fears have been heightened since last year's terror attacks on London's transport system that killed 52 people and four suicide bombers.

"I don't say that the difficulties we are experiencing round the world are caused by our presence in Iraq but undoubtedly our presence in Iraq exacerbates them," he said.

"We are in a Muslim country and Muslims' views of foreigners in their country are quite clear," he said. "As a foreigner, you can be welcomed by being invited in a country, but we weren't invited certainly by those in Iraq at the time."

Dannatt was severely critical of British and American planning for postwar Iraq, describing the rationale behind the invasion as flawed.

"I think history will show that the planning for what happened after the initial successful war fighting phase was poor, probably based more on optimism than sound planning," he said.

"The original intention was that we put in place a liberal democracy that was an exemplar for the region, was pro West and might have a beneficial effect on the balance within the Middle East.

"That was the hope, whether that was a sensible or naive hope history will judge. I don't think we are going to do that. I think we should aim for a lower ambition."

The comments come at a time when British defense officials are facing growing criticism on a number of fronts. In Afghanistan, Britain has suffered a number of casualties recently as the army continues its tough battle against the resurgent Taliban in the south of the country. Thirty British soldiers have been killed in Afghanistan since July.

Since March 2003, 119 British soldiers have died in Iraq.

The general's comments polarized opinion among lawmakers and military personnel.

Former Defense Secretary Douglas Hogg questioned his motives.

"One can only assume that Sir Richard has made his views known privately and that they've been ignored," he told the British Broadcasting Corp. "I think the government needs to very quickly make it clear what the position is."

Maj. Gen. Patrick Cordingly, a former British military commander in the 1991 Gulf War, told the BBC the army chief's opinion was "enormously pragmatic" and may be welcomed by some soldiers who have served several tours of duty in Iraq.

"I think it is a very brave thing for him to say. I do agree. I think there comes a time when you have got to let Iraq get on and look after its own security," he said.

UK Presence 'worsening Iraq Situation' (FT)

By Stephen Fidler, James Blitz And Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, October 13, 2006

Britain's new army chief said UK forces should leave Iraq soon because they are making the security problem there worse.

Such unusually frank remarks from a serving soldier suggest that General Sir Richard Dannatt disagrees with government policy, which calls for troops to stay until Iraqi forces can take over.

Sir Richard said Britain should "get ourselves out sometime soon because our presence exacerbates the security problems".

In comments reported in Friday's UK Daily Mail newspaper, the chief of the general staff said foreign forces might be welcomed into a country. But "the military campaign we fought in 2003 effectively kicked the door in. Whatever consent we may have had in the first place...has largely turned to intolerance.

"That is a fact. I don't say that the difficulties we are experiencing round the world are caused by our presence in Iraq but undoubtedly our presence in Iraq exacerbates them."

Sir Richard criticised the quality of planning for what happened after Baghdad fell. "History will show that the planning for what happened after the initial successful fighting phase was poor, probably based more on optimism than sound planning."

The general said the US-led coalition in Iraq would have to settle for less than the original ambition of a pro-western liberal democracy that would be an exemplar for the region.

"That was the hope, whether that was a sensible or naive hope, history will judge...we should aim for a lower ambition." The general expressed more optimism that "we can get it right in Afghanistan". But he added: "We can't wish the Islamist challenge to our society away and I believe that the army both in Iraq and Afghanistan and probably wherever we go next, is fighting the foreign dimension of the challenge to our accepted way of life."

DOJ_NMG_0080333

Dana Perino, White House spokeswoman, said: “I don’t know the context in which this was said but I would remind you that it’s the democratically elected Iraqi leaders themselves who have asked for reassurance that we will stay to help them gain control over the security situation.” She added: “We’re going to...ensure a democratic stronghold of liberty and freedom in the heart of the Middle East is fully established and serving as a beacon of hope for those moderate governments in the region who strive for the same.”

The UK prime minister’s office is certain to argue on Friday that Britain will stick to its commitment to maintain a military presence in Iraq until the country’s own forces are fully trained.

The Ministry of Defence said on Thursday night: “We are there with our international partners in support of the democratically elected government of Iraq under a clear United Nations mandate.”

The MoD refused to confirm reports that a meeting had been set up between Des Browne, defence secretary, and the general on Friday.

However, the army chief’s comments are certain to be a blow to Tony Blair as he seeks to maintain political authority in his final months in Downing Street.

Militiamen Kill 11 At TV Station In Iraq (AP)

By Lee Keath, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 13, 2006

Suspected Shiite militiamen, some dressed as police, broke into a television station and gunned down 11 Iraqi executives, producers and other staffers Thursday — the deadliest attack against the media in this country, where at least 81 other journalists have been killed in the past three years.

The station, Shaabiya, was new and had not started full broadcasting. So far it had aired only test programming of nationalist songs, including ones against the U.S. military presence in Iraq. That may have led Shiite militiamen to suspect it of a pro-Sunni ideology.

The brazen, morning attack underlined the danger for the media in a country where causing offense to one side or another can be a death sentence — either by Sunni insurgents or the Shiite and Sunni death squads behind sectarian violence.

In another attack on Iraqi media, the body of a Kurdish radio reporter was identified at the Baghdad morgue. Azad Mohammed Hussein, 29, was kidnapped in the capital Oct. 3 while on his way to Dar al-Salam radio headquarters. His body was found Tuesday.

At least 51 journalists — mostly Iraqis — have been kidnapped in Iraq, according to Reporters Without Borders, a Paris-based journalist watchdog group. The latest was the editor of weekly magazine Nabd al-Shabab, abducted Monday on the way to work.

About two dozen gunmen, some in police uniform, pulled up to the Shaabiya offices at 7 a.m. Thursday in civilian cars, stormed into the building and killed most of those inside, said the station's executive director, Hassan Kamil, who was not there at the time.

Staff members had been working around the clock to get the station ready to begin broadcasting at the end of the Islamic holy month of Ramadan, in mid-October. As a result, many people were in the office, some still sleeping at the time of the attack.

The gunmen fired some 100 shots, Kamil said. But survivors reported not hearing any shots and no windows were damaged, suggesting the attackers may have used silenced pistols and killed their victims at close range, he said.

After the attack, blood stained the polished floors of the station building, which housed Shaabiya's studio and offices, and pistol bullet casings lay scattered around.

Among the dead were the station's chairman of the board, Abdul-Raheem Nasrallah, along with station technicians and two guards, Kamil said. Several employees managed to run away, and there were two wounded survivors — the program director and chief producer — who were in critical condition.

Kamil said he could not speculate on who was behind the attack and said the station had received no threats. He insisted the station had no sectarian bent and pointed out that the staff was a mixture of Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds. Nasrallah, the slain chairman, was a Shiite — a former military officer who was jailed during Saddam Hussein's rule, fled to Norway after his release and then returned after Saddam's fall.

"We have good relations with all political and religious parties and groups, with the Sunnis and the Shiites, and we are keen to maintain such a balance," Kamil said in a telephone interview.

But there were signs Shiite militiamen were behind the assault. Many kidnap-slaying of Sunnis have been carried out by gunmen in police uniforms and Sunnis accuse the mainly Shiite police force of helping the death squads.

The test programming the station has done so far has included nationalist songs, some of them denouncing "the American occupation" — a cause of the Sunni insurgents, though also of some Shiite militia groups.

There were also rumors that the station was being financed by Libya. Reporters Without Borders said the militiamen may have been seeking to avenge the kidnapping of a revered Lebanese Shiite cleric, Imam Musa al-Sadr, 28 years ago, an attack often blamed on Libya. Al-Sadr is a distant uncle of Muqtada al-Sadr, head of the Mahdi Army, Iraq's most feared militia.

Kamil denied his station receives Libyan funding, saying it is still struggling to get the money to start up. But even a false rumor could be a motive for an attack.

Interior Ministry spokesman Brig. Abdel-Karim Khalaf blamed the slayings on "a gang of criminals" and said investigations were under way.

At least 81 journalists, 60 of them Iraqi, have been killed in Iraq since the March 2003 U.S. invasion of Iraq, according to an Associated Press tally based on figures provided by the Committee to Protect Journalists, a New York-based media rights group. That surpasses the 66 killed in Vietnam, and the 68 killed during World War II.

In addition, 28 employees of media outlets have been killed, including drivers, interpreters and guards — almost all of them Iraqis. The numbers do not include the Shaabiya attack, since it was not immediately known how many of the dead were journalists or support staff.

"Iraq is the most dangerous assignment in the world right now for journalists," said Joel Campagna, head of CPJ's Mideast desk. "There really aren't any battle lines. The danger begins right outside your door."

Not only are there no front lines in Iraq, but Western journalists are targeted by insurgents who consider them as little different from combatants. Baghdad's Palestine hotel, where many media organizations — including the AP — were based for extended periods of time, was attacked repeatedly; the attacks included a triple suicide vehicle assault last October that was claimed by al-Qaida in Iraq.

In one of the most graphic examples, an Iraqi television journalist, Atwar Bahjat, and two of her colleagues were abducted and slain while reporting on an explosion last February at a mosque in Samarra.

"The toll of journalists killed mounts from day to day," Reporters Without Borders said. "We are also alarmed by the number of kidnappings of journalists. Each week we learn of another journalist who has been abducted and then executed. ... Local journalists are the chief victims."

The deaths come amid a wave of violence in Iraq by both insurgents and militias. At least 34 Iraqis were killed in violence around the country Thursday, including the attack on Shaabiya.

The U.S. command announced that one American soldier was killed and two others injured in action in northern Iraq on Wednesday. The soldier's death brings the total number of American troops who have died in October in Iraq to 41.

Nine Staffers Slain At TV Station In Baghdad (USAT)

By Zaid Sabah And Rick Jervis

USA Today, October 13, 2006

BAGHDAD — The masked gunmen drove up to the studios of Baghdad's newest television station at 7:30 a.m., arriving before most of the journalists were awake.

Storming through the studios, they executed nine people, including seven journalists and two guards. The staffers — technicians, cameramen and producers — had been sleeping at the building after working late the previous evening.

Most of the dead at Shaabiya Satellite TV were shot in the head, said Talib al-Shawka, the station's news manager. Many were killed while sleeping in makeshift beds. One was shot in the bathroom as he readied for work, he said.

It was the single deadliest attack on the media since the start of the war.

“What happened today is happening every day in Iraq,” al-Shawka said. “Why it happened here today, I don't know.”

Iraq remains the most dangerous place in the world for journalists, according to the Paris-based Reporters Without Borders, a press advocacy group. Since the start of the fighting in March 2003, 118 journalists and media assistants have been killed in Iraq, the majority of them Iraqis, the organization said.

In World War II, 68 journalists were killed, and during the Vietnam conflict, 66, according to the Freedom Forum.

The gunmen drove into the station's neighborhood in white SUVs — vehicles commonly used by Iraq's security forces — and blocked off streets to the studio in Baghdad's Zayouna district, said Brig. Gen. Abdel Karim Khalaf al-Kenai, an Interior Ministry spokesman. The gunmen then stormed into the studio and began shooting employees and guards as they went, he said. There were no immediate arrests or leads, he said.

“I arrived this morning and was shocked when I saw my colleagues executed in this way,” said Sayed Nasser al-Hassani, a Shaabiya TV journalist. “I don't know why they did that with our channel. We don't even have programs yet.”

News employees often spend the night in the newsroom if they work late the preceding night because it's dangerous to be on the streets after dark. Vehicles are not allowed on Baghdad's roads after 9 p.m., and there's a ban on pedestrians starting at 11 p.m.

Most of Iraq's TV channels and newspapers are affiliated with political parties and broadcast a point of view. The killings could have been politically motivated.

Gunmen are increasingly targeting journalists, said Ammar Karim, an Iraqi reporter based in Baghdad for Agence France-Presse. “We're working in hell,” Karim said. “Things have changed 180 degrees compared to 2004 and 2005. Now, they're targeting journalists directly, whatever their affiliations are.”

Shaabiya is owned by the Justice and Democratic Progress Party, an independent secular party that ran in December elections but didn't win any seats in the Iraqi parliament.

The satellite station launched two months ago and has beamed only a few test broadcasts, al-Shawka said.

“The channel represented all sides in the Iraqi spectrum. We have Sunnis and Shiites and Christians and Kurds. One of the victims was Egyptian,” he said. “We are in a dilemma. If you are Sunni, this is a problem. If you are Shiite, it's also a problem. Christians are another problem. We don't know what to do.”

Gunmen Kill 11 In Iraqi TV Station Attack (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, October 13, 2006

BAGHDAD — Masked gunmen methodically executed 11 employees of a Baghdad television station this morning, shooting their victims in the station's offices with weapons muffled by silencers.

The victims were among at least 24 Iraqis killed in explosions and shootings or found dead as a result of sectarian murders today. One U.S. soldier was also reported killed, a member of the 25th Infantry Division wounded in combat Wednesday along with two other soldiers near Kirkuk.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, spokesman for coalition forces, told reporters that insurgent attacks in the capital have increased from 28 a day to 36 over the last 16 days, which coincides with the start of Ramadan, the Muslim holy month of fasting and atonement.

With security worsening, the Baghdad government has begun talks with U.S. commanders about lengthening the American stay at bases in the country, an Iraqi spokesman said.

Among those killed at the television station was the chairman of the Al Shaabiya channel's board of directors, Abdul Raheem Nasrallah. He also was leader of a small nationalist political party behind the station. Most of those killed in the 7 a.m. attack on the newly launched station were bodyguards. The programming manager clung to life today at a Baghdad hospital with bullet wounds to the neck and mouth, and another man also was wounded.

At least some of the killers in the Al Shaabiya killings wore police uniforms and arrived in cars that resembled official police vehicles, raising suspicions the killings were tied to Shiite Muslims militias that allegedly have infiltrated forces of the Ministry of Interior.

But Muqtada Sadr, the radical Shiite cleric whose Al Mahdi militia is suspected of involvement in sectarian killings, today denounced such slayings as sacrilegious.

"The wrongdoer cannot hide behind what is right, and the title of the Mahdi army is a title for righteousness," he said in a statement. "Those wrongdoers should make use of the Ramadan period, and repent as long as repentance doors are wide open."

The killers at the station appeared to have let the two female employees go, but shot all 13 men.

Hassan Kamil, the station's manager, found over 100 spent shells on the floor when he arrived an hour after the attack, but none of the bullets had damaged the fragile glass panels in the office. Nearby guards and neighbors told him they heard no gunfire.

"That there were no holes or cracks in these glass dividers which means that the executioners are professionals, not ordinary killers," he said. "They came to kill only."

The massacre was the latest attack on media personnel in a country that has become the most dangerous place in the world for journalists. Earlier this week authorities discovered the body of Azad Mohammed, a radio reporter who had been abducted Oct. 3. Gunmen on Monday also kidnapped Ali Kareem, editor in chief of a weekly newspaper.

Government spokesman Ali Dabbagh condemned the killings and said they were under investigation. "The terrorists want to censor the truth of what is actually happening Iraq," he said.

But he also acknowledged in a news conference that Iraqi security forces "need more training and experience."

In the meantime, Iraqi officials have begun negotiating with U.S.-led forces to extend their presence on bases throughout Iraq, he said. "This is not a new agreement, it's just an extension" of the old agreement, he told reporters.

Gunmen Attack TV Station In Baghdad (WP)

Uniformed Assailants Arrive in Police Cars And Kill at Least 8

BAGHDAD, Oct. 12 -- Gunmen in police cars and police uniforms stormed the offices of an Iraqi satellite television channel in Baghdad on Thursday and shot or slit the throats of all inside, killing at least eight people in the deadliest attack on journalists in Iraq, according to witnesses and the Interior Ministry.

Many of those killed in the 7 a.m. raid on al-Shaabiya TV were shot as they lay sleeping in their beds at the station. Neighbors said they heard no gunfire, leading the station's executive director, Hassan Kamil, to tell state-allied al-Iraqiya television that he believed silencers had been used.

"The killing police left the scene after killing those Iraqis," said Saad Saleem, a 43-year-old teacher who lives near the house where the station is located. Gesturing at police who responded to cordon off the station after the killings, Saleem said: "These police arrived only later. For us, Iraqis, we cannot tell the difference."

The attackers killed two guards outside, then attacked the workers inside, killing six of them. The dead included Abdul Raheem Nasrallah, the channel's general director and the general secretary of a small, secular political party, the Progress and Justice Movement.

The Shaabiya workers had spent the night at the station because of a long-standing Baghdad curfew that bans overnight vehicle traffic. The new station had yet to begin regular programming, playing only patriotic music.

Suspicion fell on militias connected with the Shiite Muslim religious parties that lead Iraq's government, with the militiamen either in the police force itself or working with the aid of the police, who are predominantly Shiite.

There was no explanation for why the station was targeted, however. One theory suggested that because it was playing nationalist tunes, it had created the impression that the station favored Sunni Arabs, although the slain station executive was Shiite.

Reporters Without Borders, a Paris-based organization, cited unidentified local sources as saying the station may have been hit because it received funding from Libya. Many Shiites blame Libyan leader Moammar Gaddafi for the assassination of a revered Shiite cleric in Lebanon nearly three decades ago.

A total of 118 journalists have been killed in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, according to Reporters Without Borders. The vast majority of them were Iraqi.

The organization said the body of another Iraqi journalist, radio reporter Azad Mohammed Hassan, was found Tuesday in the Baghdad morgue and bore signs of severe torture. He had been kidnapped a week earlier.

The Interior Ministry said Thursday that the bodies of another 42 men or boys had been found dumped around Baghdad in the previous 24 hours. All had been shot; many were blindfolded with their hands tied. Two of the victims were boys, both apparently about 10 years old, the ministry said.

In other violence, a bomb mounted on a motorcycle killed two policemen in Baghdad, the Interior Ministry said, and a car bomb followed by a roadside bomb killed nine civilians in central Baghdad.

Seven mortar rounds landed in the overwhelmingly Shiite neighborhood of Shula in northern Baghdad, killing five civilians, the Interior Ministry said.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, the top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, said Thursday that attacks in Baghdad had climbed 15 percent in the past two weeks. Caldwell tied the increased violence to the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, which ends in about two weeks.

"We assume it will still get worse before it gets better," Caldwell said. The death toll in Baghdad has more than doubled since summer, with Health Ministry officials reporting 2,600 civilians killed in the capital last month.

In the town of Hamza, about 110 miles south of Baghdad, police reported that about 30 detainees, most or all members of the Shiite militia known as the Mahdi Army, were freed from a provincial prison by attackers armed with grenades and guns.

In a statement, Moqtada al-Sadr, an influential Shiite cleric whose political bloc commands the Mahdi Army, renounced attacks blamed on his militia. "Even though this has not been proven, if it is proven, I will announce their names and declare my excommunication of them," he said.

Sadr said he spoke out "to safeguard the reputation of this dear, doctrine-following army."

Attacks On U.S. Troops In Iraq Up Sharply (MCT)

By Jay Price
McClatchy Newspapers, October 13, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Armed attacks on U.S. soldiers and Iraqis in Baghdad have increased by 43 percent since midsummer, despite an ongoing American-led campaign to secure individual neighborhoods, the top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq said Thursday.

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV said violence was down by 11 percent in neighborhoods where the sweeps had been focused. But that decline was more than offset by more attacks elsewhere, and Caldwell said the military was expecting the level of violence to keep rising during the remaining weeks of the Muslim month of Ramadan.

"Historical trends tell us that the attacks will generally increase by 20 percent during this holy month of Ramadan," Caldwell said. "We assume it will still get worse before it gets better."

In Washington, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, acknowledged that the American strategy of training tens of thousands of Iraqi soldiers and police hasn't curbed violence and that senior military commanders were puzzled by its failure. "We do need to take a look" at other factors that might be driving violence, he said.

Pace said a berm designed to encircle Baghdad and restrict the movement of death squad members and insurgents in and out of the city had been completed recently and that 28 checkpoints manned by Iraqis now controlled the entrances to the city.

But he said death squads continued to operate in the capital after dark even in neighborhoods that U.S. and Iraqi forces had swept. He said he saw no way for American troops to stop that violence until Iraqis tired of the slaughter.

"You cannot have enough men under arms 24-7 to stop the hatred killings," he said.

In Baghdad, Caldwell said the increase in attacks on U.S. troops as well as Iraqi soldiers, police officers and civilians might be the result of the campaign to root out armed insurgents and death-squad supporters in the capital. He said the operation, which involves as many as 15,000 American troops and more than 40,000 Iraqi police officers, was exposing more troops and police to attacks.

Caldwell didn't tie the attack statistics directly to casualties, but the number of Iraqis killed in Baghdad also has risen. Nearly 2,700 Iraqi civilians were killed in the city in September, according to the Iraqi Health Ministry, 400 more than in August and nearly as many as died in July, when deaths reached a record high.

At least 40 U.S. troops have been killed in combat so far this month, according to iCasualties.org, a Web site that tracks the numbers of dead and wounded coalition troops in Iraq from defense department releases.

Caldwell cited some signs that he called positive, including a more welcoming attitude among Sunni Muslims in some Baghdad neighborhoods, who to some degree view American troops as protection from Shiite Muslim death squads.

"There's no question we're seeing that the Sunni extremist elements are in fact being much more engaging with coalition forces," he said. "If you go into neighborhoods where traditionally in the past we found some real anti-coalition force sentiment, it's probably turned around almost 180 (degrees). ... They're very much welcoming us and supporting the ongoing activities that coalition and Iraqi security forces are conducting in their areas. And we have seen that throughout the Baghdad area."

Caldwell also said that the increase in U.S.-Iraqi operations in the city had prompted the death squads to change tactics. Now they're shooting some victims on the spot rather than kidnapping them and torturing them elsewhere before murdering them or holding them for ransom, he said.

Caldwell gave details of several raids on suspected death squads in the Baghdad area during the past nine days. These netted more than 60 detainees, including five suspected cell leaders, he said.

One raid on a suspected al-Qaida compound yielded a host of weapons, including an SA-7 shoulder-fired anti-aircraft missile, something that military and civilian pilots fear.

Violence continued apace Thursday in Baghdad. At 8 a.m., gunmen burst into offices belonging to the new satellite TV channel al-Shaabia in eastern Baghdad and killed at least nine workers, including the head of the channel and a news anchor, police said.

Nine more people died when two improvised bombs detonated in different parts of the city in the morning, police said, and two other civilians and a police officer were killed when a suicide bomber rode a motorcycle into a police patrol.

Between Wednesday morning and Thursday afternoon, about 65 bodies were found around Baghdad in groups of two or three, most with their arms bound and showing signs of torture.

South of the capital, where militias and other armed groups often are more powerful than official security forces, gunmen forced their way into two police stations and made officers release prisoners.

In Karbala, they freed three detainees accused of killing the sons of a former Najaf police commander.

In Diwaniyah, 11 detainees - including one who was to be executed - were let loose, according to a police officer who didn't want his name used for security reasons.

Even Picking Up Trash Is A High Risk In Baghdad (NYT)

By Michael Luo

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 12 — Sabah al-Atia sometimes calls home every 10 minutes when he is working to let his wife know he is still alive. After all, his job is one of the most dangerous in the city.

Mr. Atia is a trash collector.

In a city where a bomb could be lurking beneath any heap of refuse, and where insurgents are willing to kill to prevent them from being discovered, an occupation that pays only a few dollars a day has become one of the deadliest. Most of the 500 municipal workers who have been killed here since 2005 have been trash collectors, said Naeem al-Kaabi, the city's deputy mayor.

"When we are working, we are working nervously," said Mr. Atia, 29, who started collecting trash during Saddam Hussein's rule. "We are carrying our souls in our hands."

The danger to trash collectors is at the root of one of the most visible symptoms of collapse in Baghdad. Garbage is ubiquitous, especially in dangerous neighborhoods, blanketing street medians, alleys and vacant lots in stinking, fly-infested quilts. Trash collection has joined a long list of basic services, including electricity, water and sewerage, that have slipped badly in many places since the American-led invasion.

Trash collectors have frequently refused to venture into especially problem-plagued Baghdad neighborhoods, including Dora, Adhamiya, Jamiya and Ghazaliya, where spasms of violence have often been the norm. Or they have dashed in and out when the danger ebbed, hauling away what they could.

Insurgents have taken to hiding roadside bombs amid the refuse. Trash collectors sometimes stumble upon them and notify the police, but other times they are not so lucky.

To protect the bombs set for American and Iraqi convoys, insurgents have killed scores of trash collectors.

Most of the workers are Shiites, Mr. Atia said. They usually have few other options because of their limited schooling. Because they work in the open, he said, they are easy targets for Sunni extremists. Mr. Atia used to decorate the inside of his trash van with the images of Shiite clerics, but he took them down.

"We are afraid," he said.

Beyond the challenges posed by the violence, the city is woefully ill equipped to deal with the waste of six million people. It has just 380 working trash compacting trucks, compared with 1,200 before the fall of the Hussein government, Mr. Kaabi said. Most of the vehicles were destroyed or lost in the looting that seized this capital after the invasion. He estimated that Baghdad needed 1,500 garbage trucks.

With help from the Iraqi government and private organizations, the city is looking to acquire several hundred trucks, he said, and substantially upgrade its facilities for processing waste.

"We want to make Baghdad a civilized and bright city," Mr. Kaabi said.

But any tour of the capital demonstrates it has a long way to go to reach that goal. In Arasat, an upscale neighborhood, trash heaps are piled waist high in front of an electronics store in a street off the main road. In Saidiya, a middle-class neighborhood in western Baghdad, 10 piles of random garbage dot an area barely a quarter-mile square.

"I never see the trash collectors," said Aimen Amjad, 30, a shop owner in Saidiya. "If they do come, they come once in a blue moon."

Ola Sami, whose third-floor apartment balcony overlooks a large neighborhood dumping ground, said she was worried about the spread of disease.

"Forget about how badly it smells," she said. "My son got infected because of the piles. The area is like a barn."

Even in Masbah, a wealthy central Baghdad neighborhood that was once home to many of the foreign embassies in Iraq, mounds of refuse have accumulated in front of elegant homes and gardens.

"If we try to sit in the garden, we cannot because of flies and mosquitoes," said Muhammad Amin, 45, who lives next to one of the larger heaps of trash on his block. "We cannot even sit in the garden to enjoy the weather."

It had been months since trash collectors, who went door to door during Mr. Hussein's rule, had come down his street, he said, because of concrete barriers blocking the road.

In Mansour, the troubled western Baghdad district where municipal officials have struggled to keep trash from accumulating, a district councilman who would give only his last name, Naji, said he had fewer than half the trucks he needed. As a result, each garbage crew has to handle a much larger area than it should, which means the trucks make fewer trips through each neighborhood and the trash heaps grow.

Meanwhile, side streets are often ignored because the district does not have enough small garbage trucks that can squeeze down the alleys.

But security is by far the larger issue, Mr. Naji said. In dangerous areas in the district, the main roads, where many people have taken to dumping their trash, cannot be cleaned because roadside bombs are often hidden there.

Sadr City, the Shiite slum that was once notorious for its trash-strewn streets, is one place where conditions have improved. In the past, residents would often use the mounds of trash that dotted street medians as landmarks. (Turn right at the fourth trash pile.)

But over the last few months, the area, which has been relatively free of violence because it is dominated by the Mahdi Army, Moktada al-Sadr's militia, has become cleaner. Municipal work crews now go daily to shovel away trash dumped on the main roads. A median across a street from a busy food market that used to be piled high with garbage was closed off by a barbed-wire fence.

Still, it is hardly pristine. On a recent afternoon, children picked through an expanse of trash off the main road leading into the neighborhood. Deeper into the slum, near a fruit stand, rancid garbage lay in a wide ditch.

Usually just one garbage truck, with a driver and a worker, serves 20,000 to 30,000 people, said Satar Jabar, a district council member.

"It is not enough," he said.

In many places, a more profound change is needed, said Ali Hasan, a Mansour District Council member who represents Washash, a poor neighborhood where trash is a major blight. The fall of the government brought freedom, he said, which some interpret to mean freedom to dispose their trash as they please.

"During the time of Saddam, people were afraid of authorities," Mr. Hasan said. "But now people are not under anyone's control, and they don't have the awareness to keep their neighborhood clean."

Mr. Hasan said he had became so exasperated that people were not throwing their trash in bins, he assigned a person to each one, ordering them to carry trash from every home to the metal bin. But the police later took away the bins because of fears they could be hiding places for explosives, so the idea collapsed.

The city government has tried educational campaigns, posters, even seminars in schools and mosques to promote cleanliness. But in certain areas, only an armed presence has helped. Since August, the American military, with its Iraqi counterpart, has been conducting neighborhood sweeps of troubled sections of Baghdad. Once areas are secured, trash removal by Iraqi crews is among the first priorities.

The most recent statistics on the campaign contained a startling figure, alongside others on houses searched and weapons seized: 7,107,536 cubic feet of trash removed, about the size of the Hindenburg.

Muhammad Hasan was in charge of a crew of 40 working recently in Dora, one of the first neighborhoods secured.

"As you can see, the workers are working without any threat from insurgents," he said.

Before the Americans came through, trash collectors had not showed up for months in some places, several Dora residents said. The situation has begun to improve. At first, the main roads were cleared but the side streets remained repugnant. Now even those are being shoveled clean.

Elsewhere in the city, however, the piles continue to grow.

Iraq's Clerics To Issue Call For Peace From Mecca (FT)

By Roula Khalaf

Financial Times, October 13, 2006

Iraq's Sunni and Shia religious leaders are set to meet in the holy city of Mecca next week to endorse a call for an end to all sectarian bloodshed.

The meeting starting October 19, organised by the Organisation of the Islamic Conference and backed by Saudi Arabia, comes amid rising concern over a spill-over of Sunni-Shia violence into other parts of the Middle East.

Tensions between the two main branches of Islam have been fanned by the Iraq conflict – where sectarian killings leave an estimated 100 people dead every day – and by Sunni Arab regimes' alarm at the growing political influence of Shia Iran.

Yet analysts say the engagement of clerics is unlikely to have an impact on the ground, unless the meeting becomes a regular forum for a peace process.

The influence of religious figures, particularly on the Sunni side, is limited. Among Iraq's majority Shia, Ayatollah Ali Sistani, the highest ranking religious -figure, played an instrumental role in containing Shia frustrations with the US after the 2003 invasion. But he has become increasingly distant in recent months, as the -sectarian violence has intensified.

Some Iraqi officials say the lack of active containment by clerics has exacerbated the violence.

"Sectarian killings won't happen if you don't sanction them – so to contain [the violence] let's have religious leaders agree on some common foundations of Islam," said Hoshyar Zebari, Iraq's foreign minister.

"The idea is not to heal the Shia-Sunni rift in Mecca. But if influential leaders come together in calling on supporters to stop shedding Muslim blood, and it's done during Ramadam and in Mecca [birthplace of the Prophet Mohammed], it could have an impact."

A group of influential clerics, including the Shias' Jalal al-Deen al-Saghir, and the Sunni's Mahmoud al-Sumaydai, have already prepared a document that is expected to be signed in Mecca.

However, the list of participants has yet to be finalised and there have been reports of Saudi frustration because Shia Ayatollahs have decided not to travel abroad and are expected to send -representatives.

The US has been looking to Saudi Arabia to help stabilise Iraq. The kingdom faces its own domestic problems with a disgruntled Shia minority that has long been treated by the Sunni Wahabi clerics as heretic.

Saudi Arabia recently announced plans to build an 814km security fence along its border with Iraq to protect itself against a spread of violence.

Riyadh also appears anxious about deteriorating relations between Sunni and Shia leaders in Lebanon after the summer war between Israel and Hizbollah, the Shia militant group. Sunni political leaders in the country have been critical of Hizbollah and are seeking to counter the Shia party's efforts to change the existing government.

Beyond The Coup Rumors, Options For Iraq (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

As the security situation in Baghdad has deteriorated over the past month, there has been growing talk among Iraqi politicians about a "government of national salvation" -- a coup, in effect -- that would impose martial law throughout the country. This coup talk is probably unrealistic, but it illustrates the rising desperation among Iraqis as the country slips deeper into civil war.

The coup rumors come from several directions. U.S. officials have received reports that a prominent Sunni politician, Saleh al-Mutlak, visited Arab capitals over the summer and promoted the idea of a national salvation government, suggesting, erroneously, that it would have American support. Meanwhile, top officials of the Iraqi intelligence service have discussed a plan in which Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki would step aside in favor of a five-man ruling commission that would suspend parliament, declare martial law and call back some officers of the old Iraqi army.

Frustration with Maliki's Shiite-led government is strongest among Iraq's Sunni minority, which dominated the old regime of Saddam Hussein. But as sectarian violence has increased, the disillusionment has spread to some prominent Shiite and Kurdish politicians as well. Some are said to support the juntalike commission, which would represent the country's main factions and include former interim prime minister Ayad Allawi -- still seen by some Iraqis as a potential "strongman" who could pull the country back from the brink.

The situation is deteriorating so fast that even radical militia leaders are said to be complaining about the anarchy. Moqtada al-Sadr, a Shiite firebrand who heads the militia known as the Mahdi Army, recently told a top official of the Iraqi intelligence service that "an increasing number of Shia death squads, operating under the name of his Mahdi Army, are Iranian pasdaran [Revolutionary Guards] staff officers and Hezbollah fighters, who are executing operational activities that he is not aware of, nor can he control," according to one U.S. source.

Bush administration officials have been puzzling over why the coup rumors have become so widespread in Baghdad. One reason is that Iraqis remember the country's history of coups, including the 1958 putsch that overthrew the monarchy and the one in 1968 that brought the Baath Party to power. Another explanation is America's increasingly vocal frustration with Maliki and the perception in Iraq that he has been given a deadline to crack down on militias, or else. Finally, the rumors may reflect ongoing U.S. efforts to reach out to former Baath Party leaders and insurgents in an effort to stabilize the country.

The perception in Baghdad, as in Washington, is that Iraq is nearing the breaking point and that something has to give. But what? When you peel away the "stay the course" rhetoric, the Bush administration's best hope seems to be for a federal solution in Iraq in which the central government devolves power to the Kurdish, Shiite and Sunni regions; oil revenue is shared equitably; the Iraqi army maintains order in unruly areas such as Baghdad; and U.S. forces gradually pull back.

The biggest problem with that strategy is that it would leave the Sunni Triangle as a lawless zone from which terrorists could operate freely. U.S. officials were encouraged by a summit in Baghdad last weekend of Sunni tribal leaders who might be able to contain al-Qaeda forces in their region. But such tribal strategies have failed in the past.

Two opportunities exist over the next few months for creative diplomacy that could begin a process of orderly American withdrawal. The first is a December deadline for renewal of the U.N. legal mandate for coalition forces in Iraq. Maliki has been dragging his feet in seeking parliamentary or other formal Iraqi approval for continued occupation, knowing that in the current environment it would be explosive. But paradoxically, this issue provides a useful chance for U.S.-Iraqi negotiation of a phased timetable for reducing American forces and closing some U.S. bases. That discussion is in everyone's interest.

The second opportunity is the quasi-official mission of former secretary of state James A. Baker III, who co-chairs the Iraq Study Group launched by the U.S. Institute of Peace. Baker believes in talking to everyone, and his team recently met with Syrian Foreign Minister Walid al-Moualem and Iran's U.N. ambassador, Javad Zarif, to discuss ideas for stabilizing Iraq. Though the Washington rumor mill has Baker recommending some form of "federalism-plus" for Iraq, I suspect he'll move in another direction. The architect of the 1991 Madrid peace conference understands that the best chance for a breakthrough that could stabilize Iraq would be part of a broader settlement of Middle East issues. That's an ambitious exit strategy, but it may also be the most realistic one.

Hillary Clinton: Change Course In Iraq Before It's Too Late (NSDY/AP)

By John Kekis

Long Island Newsday - AP, October 13, 2006

SYRACUSE, N.Y. -- Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton on Thursday ratcheted up her calls for the Bush administration to change course in Iraq, saying something must be done "before it's too late."

"I'd like to see them start listening to different voices who might have a couple of good ideas about what should be done over there," Clinton said during a campaign stop at a community center on the city's predominantly black south side. "I'm trying to get people's attention. I'm just trying to get people to get smart about this."

Clinton's comments came a day after she told the New York Daily News that "if we could get some adult supervision right now in the administration with respect to their war strategy, this could be handled."

The former first lady also told the tabloid that time was running out in Iraq.

"What we've been doing is not working and we have maybe 60 to 90 days to try to put a different face on it and reverse it," she said.

Clinton said the ouster of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld might solve a lot of problems.

"I'm not going to be an armchair general here," Clinton said Thursday. "(But) I believe that if the president were to replace Secretary Rumsfeld, the whole world would breathe a sigh of relief and maybe would start helping us more than they're going to help us if he's the messenger."

Clinton has come under attack from some in her own party for voting for the war in 2002 and her current opposition to a deadline for U.S. troop withdrawal.

Widely considered the front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008, Clinton said she was focusing on her re-election campaign and nothing more. But her chances of securing the nomination improved with the announcement earlier in the day that Democrat Mark R. Warner had decided not to run for president in two years.

Warner, former governor of Virginia, was seen as a viable alternative to Clinton. Just last week, he traveled to Florida, a critical battleground state, to raise money and help other Democrats. He talked about how his ability to work with Republicans could appeal to Democratic primary voters.

"I respect his decision," Clinton said. "It's such an intensely personal decision. He's obviously been thinking about it quite hard."

Nuclear volleyball

Intelligence photographs of North Korea's nuclear test site showed technicians playing volleyball this week near the tunnel where a nuclear device was unsuccessfully set off on Sunday.

The facility where the test took place was identified by U.S. officials as a North Korean science and technology research center near the town of Kilchu and the northeastern coast.

Very high-resolution satellite images obtained by the Defense Intelligence Agency showed the volleyball game being played near dormitories at the facility.

The Japanese intelligence agency also had access to the photographs, and according to U.S. defense officials, they reported that a sports activity so close to a nuclear site was inconsistent with post-nuclear testing precautions, since the underground tunnel where the test took place was located several hundred yards away.

Doghouse

Aides to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld are dismayed over negative comments about him by a four-star general, whose career the secretary nurtured and extended at the cost of delaying the assumption of command by other generals.

A former senior Pentagon official said aides to Mr. Rumsfeld are taking offense at remarks by Marine Gen. James Jones, the current supreme allied commander, Europe, in the latest Bob Woodward book, "State of Denial."

In the book, Gen. Jones is quoted as telling his friend Marine Corps Gen. Peter Pace, Joint Chiefs chairman, that "military advice is being influenced on a political level" and that the Joint Chiefs had "surrendered" to Mr. Rumsfeld.

"You should not be the parrot on the secretary's shoulder," the book quoted Gen. Jones as telling Gen. Pace when he was about to become chairman. Gen. Jones subsequently told two visiting senators at NATO, "The Joint Chiefs have been systematically emasculated by Rumsfeld."

On a recent trip to Washington, Gen. Jones did not dispute the book's accuracy.

His words have stung members of Mr. Rumsfeld's inner circle, who suggest the hurt goes all the way up to the defense secretary himself.

"Military and civilian officials close to the secretary are taken aback by Gen. Jones' comments," said the former aide, who asked not to be named. "Rumsfeld certainly takes a very different view of how he has empowered the Joint Chiefs by involving them in every decision. James Jones is highly political — a real Washington operator. He of all generals to claim that the chiefs have become political is highly ironic if not laughable."

Gen. Jones formed a fast friendship with William S. Cohen, then a Republican senator from Maine. Mr. Cohen, as secretary of defense under President Clinton, tapped Gen. Jones as his military assistant and then as Marine commandant, who serves on the Joint Chiefs.

Said Larry Di Rita, a former Pentagon spokesman and close adviser to the secretary, "I can tell you Rumsfeld would bristle at any assertion that military advice has been marginalized because he created a new process that military advice is sought and provided on more decisions than ever before in the department's history."

What irks the aides the most is that Mr. Rumsfeld has gone out of his way to help Gen. Jones' career. When his term was ending as Marine commandant three years ago, Mr. Rumsfeld tapped him as the first Marine to become NATO commander in January 2003. The move did not help Mr. Rumsfeld's standing with the Army, which traditionally held the post.

When Gen. Jones asked to remain on post until after the upcoming NATO summit, Mr. Rumsfeld agreed, even though it pushed back the placement of other four-star generals.

Army Gen. John Craddock has been confirmed by the Senate and will replace Gen. Jones after the Nov. 28 to 29 NATO summit in Riga, Latvia.

"It constipated the system," the former official said. "Rumsfeld bent over backwards to accommodate this guy. The thinking was a lot of these changes would be made in September. Once you have a hiccup with an individual four-star, it just disrupts a lot of moves. It's not about a single guy."

Asked about these complaints, Col. Derik Crotts, Gen. Jones' spokesman, said in an e-mail to The Washington Times: "General Jones is on the record with regards to his thoughts concerning a need to review Goldwater-Nichols and to address some of the unintended consequences in the legislation. This is not a new position, and he has discussed his views on this subject on numerous occasions over the years."

Goldwater-Nichols is the landmark legislation that redefined relations among civilian leaders, the Joint Chiefs and combatant commanders around the world.

Rumsfeld spokesman Eric Ruff said "the secretary has not mentioned what Jones is alleged to have said. He hasn't read the book, and he doesn't intend to."

He added, "Any suggestion that is alleged in the book that military advice has been politicized is just flat wrong and outrageous."

Mr. Ruff said the secretary has revolutionized the civilian-military working relationship by bringing officers in early in the decision-making process. He heads regular meetings of what is called the senior leadership review group and holds three Washington sessions annually with combat commanders and the Joint Chiefs. "He actively seeks out and receives military advice," Mr. Ruff said.

Democrats have pilloried Mr. Rumsfeld over the Iraq war. The secretary offered to resign twice, but President Bush told him to stay on the job.

"He's at peace with himself," the former civilian official said. "Let history decide how this is going to be seen."

Mr. Rumsfeld will officially appear with his NATO commander at Riga. Should be a frosty affair.

From the front

A lieutenant colonel with the 82nd Airborne Division who recently returned from Iraq privately filled us in on the situation in Baghdad and elsewhere in Iraq.

The insurgency is being run by former Iraqi Republican Guards and Iraqi intelligence service personnel who have lots of money and who use a combination of Islamist extremism and thuggery to recruit insurgents.

Captured insurgents who were interrogated often appear to be "brainwashed by Salafists," as one strain of Islamist extremism is called, into conducting bombings or shooting attacks on U.S. and allied troops, the officer said.

"When I would ask them why they are fighting us, they say, 'Because you are here,' " said the officer, who favors getting U.S. troops out of Iraq sooner rather than later. "And I would say, 'Why don't you stop shooting at us, and we'll leave.' "

The insurgents also use blackmail to gain recruits, often paying Iraqis to help in supporting operations, such as driving cars used in attacks. Then, the insurgent recruiters photograph the Iraqi during the attack and threaten to release to the photo to the new Iraqi government or U.S. forces if he does not continue working with insurgents.

The officer said he worked closely with local sheiks in trying to promote stability, with mixed results. Some promised cooperation but failed to work with the new Iraqi government or U.S. forces.

Other leaders have turned against the insurgents and the small number of foreign terrorists.

In Iraq, U.S. Touts Provincial Reconstruction Teams As A Model (LAT)

By Doug Smith

The Los Angeles Times, October 13, 2006

TIKRIT, Iraq — U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad flew to the hometown of deposed Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein on Thursday to pitch a joint civilian and military project as the model for this battered country's reconstruction.

In a muted ceremony on a U.S. base in this northern city, Khalilzad inaugurated the reconstruction team for Salahuddin province, the last of seven teams the U.S. has established. In addition, Britain, Italy and South Korea are sponsoring a team each.

While characterizing the reconstruction groups as the "embodiment of the U.S. commitment … to ensuring Iraq's success," Khalilzad acknowledged their limited financial resources.

"Now this country belongs to the Iraqi people, and in the end its success or, God forbid, its failure will depend upon the Iraqi people and their leaders," he said.

The teams will focus primarily on developing leadership at the local and provincial levels to continue the rebuilding process with diminishing U.S. financial aid.

Iraq's devastated infrastructure swallowed up a $21.4-billion congressional appropriation for rebuilding with little visible effect. Millions of Iraqis still have electricity only a few hours a day, and sewage from failing systems backs up onto their streets.

The 10 provincial teams will have $315 million from U.S. funds in fiscal 2007, which has just begun, to continue construction projects.

Most of the money for putting the country back together will have to come from Baghdad, State Department officials have been saying in recent briefings and media events designed to introduce the provincial reconstruction teams.

The Iraqi money is to be largely taken from oil revenue, which has fallen far below levels originally envisioned for postwar Iraq as a result of infrastructure problems and insurgent attacks.

The teams represent a "transition from working with them to spend U.S. money to working with them to spend Iraqi money," Robert Tillery of the State Department said in a telephone interview Thursday.

This year, the Baghdad government budgeted $2 billion for redevelopment and will do so again in 2007, Tillery said.

But local and provincial governments have had difficulty spending the money because of their inexperience in controlling their own budgets, he said.

"What we are trying to do is help them with that," Tillery said.

Because security precautions limit the movements of Western media, the State Department has struggled to communicate just what the teams do.

Local government buildings are generally not safe to visit without armed escort. Government-sponsored media trips that tie up Army helicopters and personnel are infrequent and usually last only part of a day, leaving little time for reporting.

This drawback was evident during a recent media trip arranged by the U.S. military to the southern city of Hillah, where one of the first teams was established.

With armed guards outside, a panel of Iraqi provincial and district council members, most college graduates, lauded the knowledge they had acquired from training funded by the U.S. Agency for International Development.

They said they had learned how to prioritize their capital projects, prepare budgets and write proposals for funding.

They also said U.S. contractor RTI International had developed a database that streamlined city procedures. Reporters were whisked from the room before they could ask what was in the database.

Provincial reconstruction teams are modeled on a similar concept used in Afghanistan. Each team consists of about 65 specialists from the State Department, the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, USAID and the American military's civil affairs contingent.

The Iraqi Constitution does not allow local governments to raise revenue, thus forcing the provinces to compete for money from Baghdad. "We hear every time we go to the provinces that governments … want the authority to raise revenue," Tillery said at a recent news briefing. "And you can't blame them."

He said efforts were underway to insert a clause allowing local taxation into Iraq's national charter.

"In time that will happen," he said.

Ability Of New Iraqi Leaders Doubted (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

A co-chairman of the blue-ribbon panel reviewing U.S. policy in Iraq raised concern last night about the ability of the Iraqi government to address the country's problems, as more indications emerged that the group is considering recommendations that would break sharply with Bush administration policies.

A group of experts assisting the commission has prepared two option papers for the panel, according to sources with knowledge of the group's work. One paper calls for a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq; the other calls for more focus on security in Baghdad and for working toward political accommodation with insurgents, not democracy, the sources said. Details of the papers were first reported yesterday by the New York Sun.

One source said the documents represent the two main ideas before the commission. Another said they are among several working papers prepared for the panel and cautioned that commission members may well disagree during future deliberations.

Appearing last night on PBS's "NewsHour With Jim Lehrer," the panel's co-chairmen -- former congressman Lee H. Hamilton (Ind.), a Democrat, and former secretary of state James A. Baker III, a Republican -- emphasized that they will make no recommendations until after the Nov. 7 midterm elections. That is an effort, they said, to depoliticize their efforts.

"Nothing is ruled out. Nothing is ruled in," Baker said. Hamilton added: "Any report in the press which says that we have agreed upon any recommendation is flat-out wrong."

Still, Hamilton said he is concerned about the ability of the new Iraqi government, headed by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, to provide basic services and security.

"I still have real questions in my mind as to the capacity, the will of the Iraqi government to move," said Hamilton, who recently visited Baghdad with members of the panel. "There are some encouraging signs. Their rhetoric has been pretty good, but the follow-through with action has not measured up to our hopes."

Baker's presence at the head of the bipartisan panel created by Congress has attracted intense interest in foreign policy circles because of his closeness to the Bush family. Some view the panel's recommendations as a possible vehicle to revisit Iraq policy after the elections.

The administration is cooperating with the panel, and President Bush said this week that he looks forward to its recommendations. "I think it's good to have some of our elder statesmen . . . go over there and take a look," he said Wednesday.

Still, as the options papers suggest, the panel is looking well beyond Bush's current strategy, which involves 140,000 U.S. troops trying to maintain security until the new government's security forces can keep the peace.

According to the Sun, one paper says: "The United States should aim for stability particularly in Baghdad and political accommodation in Iraq rather than victory." The other option, titled "Redeploy and Contain," calls for the phased withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq, though when and where they would go is unclear.

A Soldier Hoped To Do Good, But Was Changed By War (NYT)

By Laurie Goodstein

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

FORT BRAGG, N.C., Oct. 12 — Sgt. Ricky Clousing went to war in Iraq because, he said, he believed he would simultaneously be serving his nation and serving God.

But after more than four months on the streets of Baghdad and Mosul interrogating Iraqis rounded up by American troops, Sergeant Clousing said, he began to believe that he was serving neither.

He said he saw American soldiers shoot and kill an unarmed Iraqi teenager, and rode in an Army Humvee that sideswiped Iraqi cars and shot an old man's sheep for fun — both incidents Sergeant Clousing reported to superiors. He said his work as an interrogator led him to conclude that the occupation was creating a cycle of anti-American resentment and violence. After months of soul-searching on his return to Fort Bragg, Sergeant Clousing, 24, failed to report for duty one day.

In a court-martial here on Thursday, an Army judge sentenced Sergeant Clousing to 11 months in confinement for going AWOL, absent without leave. He will serve three months because of a pretrial agreement in which he pleaded guilty.

"My experiences in Iraq forced me to re-evaluate my beliefs and my ethics," Sergeant Clousing said, sitting stiff-backed in the witness chair. "I ultimately felt I could not serve."

The case against Sergeant Clousing, a born-again Christian from Washington State, is a small one in a war that has produced sensational courts-martial. The same stark courtroom where Sergeant Clousing testified on Thursday was the site of the courts-martial of Pfc. Lynndie England, who mistreated and posed with naked Iraqi prisoners in Abu Ghraib, and Sgt. Hasan K. Akbar, who rolled grenades into tents of American troops.

Yet the military prosecutors made it clear on Thursday that the stakes were high. Although they did not challenge his motives, they said if one young soldier disillusioned by the reality of war could give up the uniform without punishment, what of others?

"A message must be sent," Capt. Jessica Alexander, the Army's trial lawyer, said in her closing argument. "There are thousands of soldiers who may disagree with this particular war, but who stay and fight."

Sergeant Clousing's allegations resulted in criminal and administrative investigations. The soldiers in the Humvee were disciplined, said Maj. Richard Wagen, the investigating officer, who testified at the trial. Major Wagen said that the Iraqi teenager who was shot was close enough to the soldiers to be considered a threat.

Sergeant Clousing's defense lawyer argued that the sergeant had experienced a "crisis of conscience," tried to resolve it through official military channels and should not be treated like a criminal.

"Some might say a person of such convictions should never have enlisted," said the lawyer, David W. Miner, who is based in Seattle, "but the Army needs soldiers with the strength of their convictions and personal courage to speak up when they see abuses."

The number of soldiers who go AWOL declined from 4,597 in 2001 to 2,479 in 2004, said Maj. Tom Earnhardt, a public affairs officer at Fort Bragg. "The vast majority of our soldiers are serving our country admirably," Major Earnhardt said.

Sergeant Clousing said in an interview that he had been a partyer and snowboarder until a sudden born-again experience in high school. He grew up in Sumner, Wash., south of Seattle. His father was an Army officer in Europe, and he lived with his mother, who was not religious.

"It sounds really cheesy," he said, "but all of a sudden I knew that God had a different plan for me."

He attended a Presbyterian church, studied the Bible and spent four consecutive summers on mission trips to Mexico. He joined Youth With a Mission, an evangelical group that sent him to Thailand, where he was on Sept. 11, 2001.

Out of patriotism, idealism and curiosity, he said, he joined the military. He signed up to be a "human intelligence collector," and trained in Arizona and at the Defense Language Institute in Monterey, Calif. He was assigned to the 82nd Airborne Division.

Arriving in Iraq in November 2004, he said he was stunned at the number of Iraqis he was assigned to interrogate who were either innocent or disgruntled citizens resentful about the American occupation. He said he told his commander: "Your soldiers and the way they're behaving are creating the insurgency you're trying to fight. It's a cycle. You don't see it, but I'm talking to the people you're bringing to me."

Sergeant Clousing said he looked into the eyes of the Iraqi teenager as he died and saw the unjustifiable loss of a life that unhinged him. He wrote in his journal, "I want to be a boy again, free of this."

Back in Fort Bragg after five months in Iraq, Sergeant Clousing took his misgivings to his superiors. They sent him to a chaplain, who showed him in the Bible where God sent his people to war, the sergeant said. Then they sent him to a psychologist who said he could get out of the military by claiming he was crazy or gay. Sergeant Clousing said he had not been looking for a way out and found the suggestion offensive.

He called a hotline for members of the military run by a coalition of antiwar groups. The man who took the call was Chuck Fager, who runs Quaker House, a longtime pacifist stronghold in Fayetteville.

"This call was unusual," Mr. Fager said in an interview. He said hotline receptionists took more than 7,000 calls from or about military members last year.

"I don't have these kinds of probing discussions about moral and religious issues very often," he said. "I said to him, you're not crazy or a heretic for having difficulty reconciling Jesus' teachings with what's going on in Iraq."

Sergeant Clousing said he could not file for conscientious objector status because he could not honestly say he was opposed to all war. After several months of soul-searching, he went AWOL.

He tried to talk with his church friends in Washington. Some understood him, but others said he had to support the government because of a biblical injunction to "render unto Caesar what is Caesar's."

"They felt that God established government and we're supposed to be submitting to authorities, and by me leaving it's rebelling again the authority that God established," Sergeant Clousing said. "Their politics has infiltrated their religion so much, they can't see past their politics."

DOJ_NMG_0080346

After 14 months, he turned himself in at Fort Lewis in Washington. He was returned to Fort Bragg, where he was assigned to a brigade made up of other soldiers who had gone AWOL. Five sat in the courtroom on Thursday, in uniform, waiting to hear clues about their future in the judge's sentence.

2 Friends' Deaths Hit Towns Hard (USAT)

By Oren Dorell

USA Today, October 13, 2006

CREVE COEUR, Ill. — Kristofer Walker and George Obourn Jr., both 20, were almost inseparable.

As high school students, their friendship revolved around marching band, playing video games together and eating at Monical's Pizza, up the street from East Peoria High School.

Together they acted on their dream of joining the Army as Cavalry Scouts, wanting to do their part after 9/11. Out of school they entered a "buddy" system that would keep them together for a year through basic training. In Iraq they served in the same squadron.

Their lives together ended on Oct. 2, when Walker was killed after his Humvee hit a roadside bomb in Taji, near Baghdad. Two days later, Obourn followed his friend, killed while clearing a building of insurgents in the same town.

This weekend, Creve Coeur will bury the two young soldiers: Walker on Friday and Obourn on Saturday. News of the buddies' double death and its timing hit this industrial community hard.

"It was bizarre, eerie," says East Peoria High School Principal Paul Whittington. "Somebody's got a plan bigger than me. … You wonder if one (of the men) would be totally miserable without the other."

The event was commemorated in ways big and small by residents of Creve Coeur and its larger neighbor East Peoria, where a frosty wind and views of the Caterpillar factory on the Illinois River make the Iraq war feel very far away.

"It's kind of a reality check," says Erick Hutchinson, 18, a senior at East Peoria. "You watch it on television, but it hits close to home when it hits someone who went to your high school."

Printed posters of the friends, taken from a family snapshot, stand at East Peoria High School. The school Booster Club posters show two young men standing shoulder to shoulder in dress uniforms.

The community paid tribute to the friends at last week's Friday night homecoming football game. Two marching band hats, each decorated with a large plume, were retired and given to members of each family. A former band member played taps.

Then the entire stadium, usually alive with roars and chants, was asked for quiet, Whittington says.

"The silence was deafening," he says.

In Creve Coeur, Mayor Wayne Baker ordered flags at the hilltop war memorial flown at half-staff and two wreaths placed nearby. The wreaths will remain until the names of Obourn and Walker, who both held the rank of specialist, can be added to a list of three other village sons who died in Iraq, Baker says.

The town sent a police escort to St. Louis to escort the caskets to East Peoria. The high school told its 1,200 students they could leave classes today to attend Walker's funeral procession.

At Minnie's Kitchen, a family restaurant on Creve Coeur's main boulevard, everyone drinking coffee Thursday afternoon knew Walker, Obourn or their families.

"It made me sad because we lost a nephew there, too," said Yvonne Hosbrough, who owns the restaurant with her husband.

Lisa Montgomery, the restaurant manager, said one of her waitresses has a son who is headed to Iraq today.

"She was visibly upset" when she heard about Walker and Obourn, Montgomery says. "She didn't break down because she was at work when she found out. She talks about it all the time."

Even people who didn't know the young men personally were affected by their story.

Their deaths brought the war a lot closer, says John Meek, who owns Midwestern Firearms in East Peoria. "It's harder to take when it's right here at home," Meek says.

Walker and Obourn met in elementary school but didn't become fast friends until they joined the marching band in their freshman year of high school. After that, they were "always together," Whittington says.

Robin Goff, a school dean who taught both boys in science class, said their personalities complemented each other. Walker was quiet in class and would blush when she complimented him on his marching band performance. Obourn was more outgoing. She recalled him standing up for a disabled classmate when others taunted him.

"He always wanted to be in the Army," says Walker's father, Kevin Walker, 48, a manager for a highway contractor.

Obourn first talked seriously about the Army in his junior year of high school, says his father, George Obourn Sr.

"He had a plan," Obourn says. "Join the Army, get the GI Bill. Get a degree in criminology and get into law enforcement. He felt he wanted to do his part for the country after 9/11. He knew what the risks were."

DOJ_NMG_0080347

In August 2004, the families met at the recruiting station for the young men's farewell before basic training. After basic, Walker and Obourn entered the 7th Squadron, 10th Cavalry, 1st Brigade Combat Team, 4th Infantry Division. They flew to Iraq in December 2005.

"I think he felt he was going to make a difference and change things" in Iraq, Kevin Walker says. "The patrols that they did were always combined patrols with the Iraqi army."

"I'd ask him, 'Are they getting any better?' He'd say, 'Oh, yeah, they're getting better,' " Walker says. "OK, then I guess you're doing some good."

Chad Walker says his brother talked about patrolling villages north of Baghdad where people would invite the troops in for tea, and of other villages that were not so nice. He didn't go into details.

Neither would Obourn. Back in March, two of Obourn's squad members were killed "right in front of him," his father says. "He didn't talk about it that much. He put on a face. Looking at photos while he was on leave, he'd kind of pause and say, 'Well, he's gone now,' and move on."

George Obourn Sr. said he is devastated by his son's death but also proud. "Every father wants your boy to grow up to be a hero, but not like this."

Running With Honor (WP)

By Emily Pegues

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

I ran the Army Ten-Miler last Sunday, a race I have run ever since my Navy pilot brother and my Army pilot sister-in-law introduced me to it four years ago. I'm a civilian but consider myself part of the military family, never more so than last year, when my sister-in-law was serving in Iraq and I ran the race in her honor. She returned from Iraq last winter, safe, so this year I looked forward to running the race without seeing it as fraught with any personal meaning other than the joy of being alive, healthy and ready to run on a beautiful October morning.

My casual attitude changed around mile seven, when I passed a runner wearing workout clothes and a prosthetic leg that identified him as an Army soldier and a veteran of Iraq. He looked to be in his late 20s, around my age, with just the kind of lean, handsome looks that catch a girl's eye. He was accompanied by a physical therapist pushing an empty wheelchair in case it might be needed. I jogged past them.

A little farther on was another young soldier with a prosthetic leg, also accompanied by a fellow serviceman. They had paused on the side of the course to readjust the prosthesis. Minutes later I came alongside yet another soldier, this one gamely running on two prosthetic legs, made of long silver metal strips and similar to those of the other men.

What must it feel like to run on no feet? My own feet ached in my worn-out shoes. How long did it take to relearn to walk, let alone run, on those silver metal bars that look nothing like one's foot? I discovered after the race that an 18-man military amputee team had been competing.

As I passed each of the men (feeling oddly ashamed of myself for breezing by someone so clearly my athletic superior), it was interesting to observe the reactions of the other runners around me. Runners are a supportive community, and they cheered and clapped for the soldiers as we went by. Some acted as if they didn't know quite how to acknowledge the men: Was it callous to ignore their heroic, labored efforts, or awkward to comment on their disability? Runners called out words of appreciation, and a few veered over to shake their hands. Each time, the soldiers took the tribute as it was intended and waved back.

The repetition of this scene was too much to bear. Overcome by emotion, I felt my breathing becoming ragged with suppressed crying, and I began to hyperventilate. I edged over to the side of the race course to walk and get my breath back.

Around mile nine I had to slow once more, again to stave off hyperventilation, after I came up behind a group of women wearing T-shirts with printed photos of their husbands, all killed in action in Iraq or Afghanistan. They were Gold Star Wives, and there were lots of them running last Sunday. Many had joined up to form running teams. I wondered at what point they had begun running together. The American Gold Star Mothers were running, too. One of them had a shirt showing a son born in 1985 who had died serving his country. Nineteen eighty-five!

I finished the race feeling let down and dissatisfied, and unable to explain why, since I had clocked in at my expected 10-mile time. It was only later that I understood why I found this race so devastating.

There is something inherently moving about athletics because of the courage required to be an athlete. For me, this is also true of the military. The daily commitment and struggle that an athlete endures, whether for the cause of a team or simply to surpass one's personal best, requires bravery and determination as exemplified in the best traits of the military ethos. A race sponsored by the Army takes on even greater meaning during a war of murky beginnings whose end is even more obscure.

I wish with all my heart that everyone in America, including President Bush and all the elected officials who called for war, could have seen the soldiers and Gold Star families I saw last Sunday. Perhaps then they would have felt what I did: awe for their courage, heartbreak for their loss, and gratitude for their willingness to sacrifice everything they have for our country and its citizens. And utter moral outrage that they have been called upon to do so.

When you run alongside someone who has lost a husband or a child or a limb to the war, you are confronted with their courage and it literally takes your breath away.

Counting The Iraqi Dead (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

"Not credible" was President Bush's quick verdict on the new study, published this week in the British medical journal the Lancet, calculating that more than 650,000 Iraqis have died as a result of the U.S. invasion and its ensuing chaos. It is understandable that the president would be quick to dismiss such an explosive claim, but the rest of us should take the time to look a bit more closely.

The number of estimated deaths claimed by the study is inconceivably huge and wildly out of scale with any previous figures we've heard. But it's difficult to avoid the conclusion that the human suffering in Iraq has been far beyond our imagining.

The peer-reviewed study's named authors include three researchers from the Bloomberg School of Public Health at Johns Hopkins University -- one of them is Gilbert Burnham, co-director of the school's Center for Refugee and Disaster Response -- and a professor from Baghdad's al-Mustansiriya University. Funding for the project was provided by MIT. These are not shabby credentials.

But academic degrees and prestigious affiliations alone do not establish truth. Bush said the problem is that the study's methodology has been discredited. But the team relied on a "cluster sample survey" technique that is frequently used for public health research, especially in the developing world.

No one should find the basic concept unfamiliar, since it underlies such mainstays of modern life as public opinion polls and market research. The survey team picked what was deemed a representative sample -- in this case, 1,849 households scattered throughout Iraq -- and used that sample to draw conclusions about the population as a whole. That's the same method pollsters employ to predict who will win an election.

Ideally, the selection of respondents should be as random as possible. The process of choosing the 50 widely scattered neighborhoods in which the Johns Hopkins team did its work was not quite ideal, but the Lancet peer reviewers who cleared the study for publication could find nothing that would significantly skew the results. Interviewers went house to house, recording detailed information about deaths before the 2003 invasion and deaths since.

The researchers tallied 82 pre-invasion and 547 post-invasion deaths in those households. The death rate per year nearly tripled after the invasion, they found, and a full 300 of the post-invasion deaths, or more than half, were the result of violence. (By contrast, only 2 percent of pre-invasion deaths were violent.) Of those killed by violent means, more than half died from gunshot wounds; the rest died mostly in bombings and airstrikes. Victims were primarily young and middle-aged men. In more than 90 percent of cases, family members were able to produce death certificates confirming what they told the interviewers.

Those may look like small numbers on which to base such large claims, but that's how survey research works. Pollsters in the United States, a much larger country, routinely predict nationwide trends on the basis of fewer interviews.

Does this prove, as the study asserts, that precisely 654,965 Iraqis have died "as a consequence of the war," and that exactly 601,027 of those deaths were due to violence? No, it doesn't. The Johns Hopkins team reports being 95 percent certain that the true figure lies between about 400,000 and about 900,000 -- a large range of uncertainty that some critics have seized upon as discrediting the whole project.

But the exact number is not the point. Rather, it's the scope and scale of the carnage.

Late last year President Bush gave an off-the-cuff estimate of 30,000 Iraqi civilian deaths -- this after the administration had steadfastly refused to acknowledge even trying to count the Iraqi dead. Now the administration is willing to allow that perhaps 50,000 civilians have died. It is unclear whether any science at all has gone into these estimates or whether they were essentially pulled out of a hat.

But quite a lot of science went into the Johns Hopkins study. Even if you assume that the number of Iraqi civilians killed since the war began is at the very low end of the study's range, that's still a quantum leap from earlier estimates. We now have reputable evidence -- not proof, I'll allow, but science-based evidence from respected scholars, published in one of the world's most prestigious medical journals -- that the humanitarian tragedy in Iraq is much, much worse than anyone had suspected.

If the study's findings are flawed, then its critics should demonstrate how and why. But no one should dismiss these shocking numbers without fully examining them. No one should want to.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Employees Leave BCGI, Sanmina Over Backdating (WSJ)

By Charles Forelle

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

Three top executives of Boston Communications Group Inc. and an employee of Sanmina-SCI Corp. joined the management exodus stemming from stock-options investigations, as their companies' internal reviews advanced.

BCGI said Chief Executive E.Y. Snowden and finance chief Karen Walker were stepping down from those roles. Alan Bouffard, the general counsel, is retiring early, the company said. Sanmina identified its departed employee only as a manager.

The departures bring to at least 28 the number of dismissals, suspensions and resignations of corporate officials amid probes of stock-option practices at their companies. More than 100 companies are facing scrutiny from federal regulators and prosecutors, who are focusing on the practice of improperly backdating options to make them more valuable to recipients.

Options are typically designed to give recipients a stake in improving the company's share price by allowing them to purchase shares in the future at their price on the day the option was granted. By backdating grants to earlier days when the stock price was particularly low, recipients can get extra profit.

BCGI's options routinely bore extraordinarily propitious dates. Three grants between 1998 and 2002 to Mr. Snowden purportedly fell on the day of the stock's lowest annual closing price. Two other grants during the same time period were dated at quarterly lows.

BCGI, a Bedford, Mass., provider of technology to telecommunications carriers, said it would need to restate financial statements to rectify its accounting for option grants, but it didn't provide details. A spokeswoman for BCGI says Mr. Snowden, who will become nonexecutive chairman, wasn't available for comment. Ms. Walker, who has left the company entirely, couldn't be reached. Mr. Bouffard declined to comment.

Sanmina, of San Jose, Calif., said an internal investigation discovered that "most stock-option grants" to executives and employees from 1997 to 2006 were wrongly dated or improperly accounted for. The electronics manufacturer said it would restate financial results.

In a statement, Sanmina's CEO, Jure Sola, apologized, expressing regret that the company's options program "was not properly administered."

Sanmina-SCI Manager Resigns Over Stock-option Granting (MERCN)

By Ryan Blitstein

The San Jose Mercury News, October 13, 2006

Improper stock options grants at Sanmina-SCI has led to the resignation of one manager at the San Jose electronics manufacturer, the company announced today.

The company did not identify the manager in a written statement, and did not return calls for comment. Most stock options grants to executives and employees between 1997 and 2006 were not correctly dated or accounted for, the company said in the statement.

Sanmina-SCI said it will restate its financial results for that time period and record non-cash compensation charges due to the revelations about options grants by a special committee of the board, aided by independent lawyers and forensic accountants.

The announcement comes a day after five executives at security software company McAfee and online media company CNET lost their jobs due to similar stock options practices. More than 120 U.S. companies, about one-fourth of them in Silicon Valley, either face investigations by the Securities and Exchange Commission or Justice Department or are conducting internal reviews about options backdating.

Backdating involves changing the dates on the paperwork on options to a day when stock prices were lower, giving recipients a better chance for quick paper profits.

Sanmina-SCI's investigation pointed the finger at one current and one former manager involved in the authorization, recording and reporting of stock option grants. The current member, whose name has not yet been disclosed, has resigned, the company said.

In June, the company said it had received inquiries from the SEC about stock options and had begun an internal investigation. The special committee examined over one million electronic documents, over 350,000 pages of hard-copy documents, and conducted more than 40 interviews with current and former employees, directors and advisors, Sanmina-SCI aid. It recommended changes to the company's stock administration practices, which were unanimously approved by the company board.

Sanmina Exec Resigns In Option Scandal (AP)

By Michael Liedtke, AP Business Writer

AP, October 13, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Sanmina-SCI Corp. has severed ties with an executive who helped manipulate the value of employee stock options in a nearly decade-long scheme now under investigation by a federal grand jury.

The developments announced Thursday by the San Jose-based electronic parts manufacturer are the latest fallout from a scandal dogging dozens of companies that mishandled their stock options.

The chicanery drew the attention of federal regulators and prosecutors earlier this year, prompting more than 100 companies to launch internal reviews to ensure they accounted for their options properly. A large chunk of those companies are in Silicon Valley, where stock options first became staples of employee compensation packages.

Most of the inquiries are focused on a technique known as "backdating," which occurs when insiders look back in time for a low point in their company's stock price so the exercise, or "strike," price of the options could be set at that ebb.

If they aren't properly disclosed, backdated options can inflate corporate profits and result in an underpayment of taxes.

As they wrap up their investigations, many companies like Sanmina-SCI are contritely acknowledging their misconduct and dumping the responsible executives.

Sanmina spokeswoman Paige Bombino declined to identify the executive who resigned because of the stock option shenanigans, saying only that it wasn't the company's chief executive officer or chief financial officer.

Another executive who had previously left Sanmina also helped engineer a scheme affecting stock options dating back to 1997, according to the company.

At least 27 other senior executives and directors have either resigned or been fired by companies entangled in a stock option imbroglio that's erasing previously reported profits and spurring government investigations.

On Thursday, Sanmina revealed that it had received a subpoena from a federal grand jury in San Francisco, where a task force assembled by the U.S. Justice Department is marshaling criminal investigations into the stock option scandal. The company didn't specify what kind of information is being sought by the grand jury.

The stock option trouble already has imperiled Sanmina's listing on the Nasdaq Stock Market because the company missed an August deadline to file its last quarterly report with the Securities and Exchange Commission. Sanmina, like several other companies entangled in the scandal, is still trying to quantify the financial impact of its improper stock option accounting.

Sanmina shares closed unchanged Thursday at $3.93 on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

Sanmina-SCI Will Restate After Finding Options Errors (Update6) (BLOOM)

By Ron Day

Bloomberg, October 13, 2006

Oct. 12 (Bloomberg) -- Sanmina-SCI Corp., the world's second-largest maker of electronics for other companies, will restate results to correct stock-option errors and said it had received a subpoena from a U.S. grand jury.

Sanmina-SCI will record non-cash charges for added option costs and is changing its rules to prevent abuses of grants, it said in a statement today. The company said it's cooperating with the subpoena for options-related documents which it received from the U.S. Attorney for Northern California.

The ousted manager joins more than 30 people who have lost their jobs because of misdated options grants, including the chief executive officers of McAfee Inc. and Cnet Networks Inc. who were replaced yesterday. Boston Communications Group Inc. replaced three top executives today after finding misdated options. Sanmina-SCI said it will set fixed dates for grants.

``You are starting to see the fallout from these independent committees," said Shawn Harrison, an analyst with Longbow Research in Independence, Ohio, who rates Sanmina-SCI ``neutral" and said he doesn't own the shares. ``After the issue arising these are the steps that need to be taken."

More than 60 companies have restated or plan to revise results because of options-related errors. More than 140 companies have disclosed internal or U.S. government investigations of their options-grant practices.

Name Withheld

A manager involved in authorizing the options has resigned as a result of the probe that uncovered the errors. Paige Bombino, a spokeswoman for San Jose, California-based Sanmina- SCI, declined to identify the person.

``We will disclose it to regulatory authorities as needed," Bombino said in an interview. A former manager's actions involving option authorizations also raised concerns, Sanmina-SCI said in the statement, without elaborating.

Sanmina-SCI hasn't determined which financial periods will be restated or the amount of the additional costs. The company's accounting is also being probed by the Securities and Exchange Commission, which was reported in June. The company didn't say when it received the subpoena from the Justice Department.

Shares of Sanmina-SCI closed unchanged at $3.93 at 4:05 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. They've declined 7.7 percent this year.

Boston Communications

Boston Communications, the biggest U.S. provider of prepaid wireless services, said Chief Executive Officer Edward Snowden will leave the post and become non-executive chairman. Chief Financial Officer Karen Walker resigned and General Counsel Alan Bouffard retired early, the company said in a statement today.

Former CEO Paul Tobin, the company's chairman until today, replaced Snowden on a temporary basis, and Thomas Doherty was named interim CFO. Doherty is an executive vice president with Argus Management Corp., a company specializing in interim management services, Boston Communications said.

Boston Communications, based in Bedford, Massachusetts, will restate earnings and hasn't determined how much the options errors will cost nor the specific periods that may require restating.

The company's shares fell 14 cents, or 7 percent, to $1.86 in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. They've gained 65 percent this year.

The Broker Who Fell To Earth (NYT)

By Landon Thomas Jr.

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

She doesn't remember.

Peter E. Bacanovic, his gall rising, could not believe it. But there it was in print. "I honestly don't remember exactly what I was prosecuted for," Martha Stewart is quoted as saying in the September issue of Harper's Bazaar.

"It's a very striking comment to make, I mean she is on probation," Mr. Bacanovic said of his former friend, client and fellow convict, as he sat down for lunch last month at Sette Mezzo, just around the corner from his Manhattan town house.

Five years ago, this Upper East Side restaurant, which caters to a select mix of society tastemakers, financial kingpins and television celebrities, was the epicenter of Mr. Bacanovic's world as a Merrill Lynch broker to the elite. On this day, however, a less effervescent Mr. Bacanovic shows up, one who seems more interested in venting about Ms. Stewart's memory than finding a friend's cheek to kiss.

His eyes are red and a resurgent bout of allergies gives him persistent sniffles. He also suffers from bronchitis bad enough that he frequently has to pause for breath when taking a flight of stairs.

"I am chronically sick and chronically unemployed and without any specific plan about how to proceed next." He pauses, taking special care to keep a promise he made to himself that he would no longer refer to Ms. Stewart by name. "I will reserve comment on my co-defendant but it's very glaring to me to take such a cavalier outlook."

Susan Magrino, a spokeswoman for Ms. Stewart, said Ms. Stewart declined to comment.

Ms. Stewart's new lease on life illustrates how her fate and that of Mr. Bacanovic have diverged since their release from prison. She is once again a television celebrity and retains her tight grip on the company that she founded. America loves a comeback story, and, if anything, her brush with the law may have given her a needed dose of vulnerability.

Life for Mr. Bacanovic, who is 44 and recently completed his probation, has been a slow trudge through the slough of a legal and regulatory despond. Fired from his job at Merrill Lynch and banned from the securities industry, he is now struggling to find a permanent job and restore his tattered health and psyche.

"I was indicted not because I was the biggest criminal on the block or the biggest insider trader in history," he said. "I was indicted simply to bring a case against my celebrity co-defendant. I was a device."

Mr. Bacanovic's feelings for his former client are complicated: there is resentment fueled by what he sees as the unfairness of his lot relative to hers, yet one that is tempered by warm memories of their shared love for chow chows and of Christmases spent together in the kitchen of Ms. Stewart's home in Westport, Conn. Still, it was more than a fancy for heavily furred dogs with blue-black tongues that bound the two of them together.

The children of fathers with East European origins, Mr. Bacanovic and Ms. Stewart, 65, combined fierce professional ambition with a keen appreciation for the rewards that high society can confer.

To some extent this bond may explain why Mr. Bacanovic remained loyal to Ms. Stewart through the ordeal, even though a guilty plea would surely have kept him out of prison. Loyalty to his friends has been a touchstone for Mr. Bacanovic; he says that he also did not want to become another Diana D. Brooks, the former chief executive of Sotheby's who turned against her former boss, A. Alfred Taubman, during the price-fixing scandal at the auction house.

"I'm not interested in lying to serve an overzealous 32-year-old prosecutor," Mr. Bacanovic said. "I stood by my friend and client and told the truth.

"I am also aware that if the reverse were possible, the same would not have been done for me. This was business and my co-defendant is first and foremost a businesswoman."

That Mr. Bacanovic should be frustrated with a legal system that landed him in prison and upended his life is no surprise. He notes that the trade at the center of his legal woes — Ms. Stewart's sale of shares of ImClone Systems — was one in which he made no money. Two other friends of Samuel D. Waksal, the former chief executive of ImClone, made more than $5 million selling the same ImClone stock. Insider-trading charges were dropped against them last year, and they paid a combined $2.7 million to settle with regulators.

His rage at the gossip pages is also understandable. Yet the degree to which he has turned against Ms. Stewart, whose connections propelled his career at Merrill, is surprising.

His grievances are many. They range from not being among those who received a Christmas card from her while she was in prison, to her legal strategy. He claims that she turned down offers from the government to settle charges, which would have resulted in no trial and perhaps no prison term. He also blames her for the $75,000 fine he recently paid to the Securities and Exchange Commission to settle insider trading charges.

In his view, Ms. Stewart could have reached her own settlement with the commission at any point between late 2004 and this spring, obviating the need for him to pay a fine. This April, as Ms. Stewart continued to delay, Mr. Bacanovic took matters into his hands and called Ms. Stewart's daughter, Alexis, a longtime friend of his who had introduced him to Ms. Stewart.

The family friendship no longer existed, but Mr. Bacanovic would ask one last favor — if Ms. Stewart was going to trial, would she help pay his legal fees, as Merrill Lynch had stopped doing so.

"I said, "This is harming me,' " Mr. Bacanovic, who had to borrow money to pay his fine, recalled saying. "And she said, 'No one here feels we owe you anything.' "

Ms. Stewart's daughter, through Ms. Magrino, declined to comment.

It was a response that cut Mr. Bacanovic to the bone. "I was shocked," he said. Ms. Stewart was holding him responsible for the nightmare they had lived together so painfully.

But he conceded it was a fair inference to make. If Mr. Bacanovic had not called Ms. Stewart in December 2001 to inform her that Mr. Waksal was selling shares of his company, ImClone, there would have been no investigation or trial.

More than anything, he says he blames Ms. Stewart for the loss of his identity. In the public's mind, he may be known forever as Martha Stewart's broker.

During his time in prison in Las Vegas, fellow inmates called him Broker and never bothered to learn his name. "I am so tired of hearing her name attached to mine that the less I hear of it, the better my day is," he said.

The years have taken a toll. His doctor has told him that his immune system has been decimated from years of stress. Sometimes, when he gets out of bed in the morning, he says he feels as if there is a mountain of bricks pressing down upon him.

On the surface, Mr. Bacanovic presents a calm, if unsmiling, face. Before sitting down to lunch, he shows off the Old World manners taught to him by his parents, both of whom emigrated here from Europe, and honed during his years spent in and around Manhattan's finest salons.

He bows slightly when meeting a woman and engages in polite, precise banter with the lunch crowd. His dress, like his manners, is impeccable. His shirts are crisp with starch and not an unruly hair pokes out from his well-coifed head.

But once he sits down, his eyes blink often as they scan the room around him. It is the look of someone who still feels hunted.

"I was personally attacked in the press," he said. "I was pursued in every possible way." His eyes are red and wet, and this time it is not the allergies. "A great many lives were harmed. This goes far beyond the legal system. What was there in these allegations to warrant this? Is the guy a murderer, a child molester?"

Certainly not. But at some point during the early months of 2002, Mr. Bacanovic's single-minded dedication to Ms. Stewart's interests caused him to cross a more oblique line even though, after six weeks of testimony during his trial, it is still not entirely clear who said what to whom.

"The only people who know for sure what happened didn't testify," said Henry M. Blodget, the former Merrill Lynch analyst who wrote about the trial for Slate. "The real lesson here is that perception is reality. I can't blame the jury."

But Mr. Bacanovic, who was convicted on two charges of not telling the truth to investigators, still seems troubled by the verdict. "This whole case was about lying," he said, referring to a government witness who was accused of perjury and a juror who lied about his past. (Ms. Stewart's and Mr. Bacanovic's request for a new trial on this basis was denied by an appeals court.)

Having reached a settlement with the S.E.C. over his insider trading charges, Mr. Bacanovic has allowed himself to look toward resuming some measure of a normal life. He refuses to give any details, but says he has been looking into careers in film, advertising and real estate. He now spends much of his time in Los Angeles, where he lives alone in a house that he rents. But the past still haunts him.

"I've spent a great deal of time thinking about my obituary in the last four years," he said. "I would really rather my tombstone not read 'broker, Martha' with dates. I'd rather it read 'Bacanovic, Peter.' "

H-P Names Hoak As Ethics Officer (WSJ)

Hewlett-Packard Co. named NCR Corp. former general counsel Jon Hoak as its vice president and chief ethics and compliance officer, one of several positions left vacant following the computer and printer giant's spying scandal.

Mr. Hoak, 57 years old, succeeds ousted ethics chief Kevin Hunsaker, who directed the boardroom leak probe and was fired last month before being charged with identity theft and three other felonies along with former Chairwoman Patricia Dunn and three outside investigators.

Mr. Hoak's duties will include working with an outside lawyer H-P hired to assess the company's investigative practices and develop future business-practice guidelines, the company said.

Mr. Hoak previously served as senior vice president and general counsel for NCR, a Dayton, Ohio, computer-services company best known for making automated teller machines, from 1993 to May 2006. Mr. Hoak, whose hiring was effective Wednesday, will report to Chief Executive Mark Hurd -- another NCR veteran who was lured away to H-P 19 months ago -- until a general counsel is hired, the company said.

"Obviously, Mark wanted to make a hire quickly," said H-P spokeswoman Emma Wischhusen.

The Public Side Of Private Investigations (WP)

By Brooke A. Masters

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

Deception, personal surveillance and sting operations are commonplace tools for private investigators hired by companies to handle low-level security problems.

These also happen to be among the aggressive methods Hewlett-Packard contractors used to try to uncover the source of boardroom leaks to the media.

The resulting scandal at HP has drawn new attention to intrusive techniques available to private investigators and has raised questions about when and how they are used. Many companies, big and small, allow -- at least tacitly -- their security contractors to push the legal envelope on uncontroversial matters, like combating employee theft or counterfeiting.

But news that a big-name corporation would permit the use of such tactics for a sensitive, potentially high-profile investigation has surprised many in the corporate security field. They say most large, public companies are far more cautious when it comes to high-stakes matters involving top executives and regulatory scrutiny. Increasingly sensitive to privacy considerations and public appearances, lawyers for large corporations routinely limit the techniques they allow and are far less willing to let investigators take the initiative on tactics.

"We've evolved from more of a free rein to a punch list of what we want. Particularly in cultures we're not familiar with, we will set up strict instructions," said Regis Becker, director of global security and compliance at PPG Industries, a Pittsburgh manufacturer with facilities and affiliates in 23 countries. "We make it clear we don't want any information we are not legally entitled to."

Some firms are so concerned about the potential public-relations impact of hiring an investigator that they choose not to do it at all. Take Riggs Bank. Back in 2004, the District firm faced the same issue that eventually led to criminal charges against HP's former board chairman and general counsel: persistent leaks from inside its boardroom. Struggling to survive a money-laundering investigation and perhaps sell itself to another firm, the bank's directors considered hiring an outside investigator to find the source of the information.

After much discussion, the board rejected the idea. "The logic was if it was lawful, it was probably not going to be successful and . . . it would be highly embarrassing to have it known that the company was investigating its own board," according to a participant in the discussion who spoke on condition of anonymity because board deliberations are supposed to be confidential.

Companies that conduct corporate investigations vary widely in size and orientation. At one end are the solo practitioners who track down stolen laptops and debunk workers' compensation claims. Many investigators are former law enforcement officers accustomed to having access to subpoenas and search warrants to get the information they want. Discretion is rarely a crucial part of their assignments.

At the other end are the highly profitable multinational corporations that do background checks on top executives, conduct discreet witness interviews and provide assistance to lawyers doing corporate fraud investigations. These firms, by contract, promise to place just as high a priority on how the investigation reflects on the client as they do on getting results.

PI Magazine, the leading industry publication, estimates that there are 60,000 licensed investigation firms in the United States, but that understates the market because six states do not require investigators to be licensed and many states allow a single licensee to employ dozens if not hundreds of people, said Jimmie Mesis, the magazine's editor in chief .

With 3,900 employees and 2005 revenue of $946 million, the largest firm by far is Kroll Inc., which bills itself as a "risk consultant." A unit of financial conglomerate Marsh & McLennan Cos., Kroll tackles everything from crisis management to substance-abuse testing and business investigations.

Other large firms tend to have dozens of employees, or at most, a few hundred. The best known among them work almost exclusively for law firms and general counsels of large companies and pride themselves on their willingness to say no.

"You should hire the guy who tells you no a lot," said James Mintz, founder of the Mintz Group. "You have to do things that are not only legal but acceptable in the eyes of a judge or a jury."

Mintz said his firm had been asked in the past if it could obtain bank and phone records using pretexting -- the method of lying that has led to criminal charges for HP's former board chairman, general counsel and several of the investigators they hired. "We've told clients you would be insane to do that."

His firm largely shies away from deception and from digging into irrelevant details of personal lives. While they will pose as buyers in a counterfeiting case, the investigators generally do not misrepresent themselves when interviewing potential witnesses or doing background checks, he said.

Some techniques have the potential to backfire if they become public, so different investigators draw the line in different places. Take garbage-stealing. It's legal as long as the trash is removed from the street rather than private property.

But Oracle Corp. was deeply embarrassed in 2000 when investigators it hired from Investigative Group International were caught going through the trash of think tanks and nonprofit groups that had been supportive of Oracle rival Microsoft Corp. The IGI team rented offices in the same building as the Association for Competitive Technology in the District and paid janitors $1,200 to hand over the trash.

As a result, some of the biggest firms say they won't engage in trash-stealing, and many prominent lawyers say they won't allow investigators to do it when their client is a big public company or a prominent individual.

"With a big corporation, the cosmetics are as important as the substance," said attorney Robert G. Morvillo, who represented Martha Stewart at her criminal trial. "If you get caught, it looks like you are doing something wrong. . . . You've got to exercise veto power every now and then."

But some investigators and lawyers do not take as hard a line. They avoid introducing stolen trash as evidence in court because they would have to explain where it came from. But they're sometimes willing to engage in a little Dumpster diving behind the scenes.

Larry Lopez, the owner of a small Cambridge, Mass., agency called Strategic Research, recalled a case in which he was working for a business that suspected one of its former employees had violated a non-compete agreement. The standard ruse in such cases would be to pose as a potential investor and approach the person directly, but because the matter was already in litigation, legal ethics canons prohibited direct contact with an opponent.

So Lopez arranged to have the former employee's trash removed and identical bags substituted in its place. His firm went through the garbage looking for names and addresses from the former employee's correspondence. The lawyers would then subpoena the correspondents directly, yielding evidence that could be introduced in court without embarrassment. "For six months, we took trash on these people and they never found out. There was nothing illegal or unethical, but the jury would have turned up its nose," if it knew the whole story, Lopez said.

Surveillance is similarly legal -- as long as it's done on public property and avoids the appearance of harassment or stalking -- but image-conscious firms often limit the practice, said Robert Seiden, chief executive of Fortress Global Investigations Corp., which has about 100 employees. "When we do surveillance for corporations, we're very cognizant [to avoid] allegations that the surveillance was over the line or intrusive," he said. "We have a code of ethics. If we see someone is with their children, we pull away."

By contrast, some investigators trying to disprove disability or workers' compensation claims openly shadow their targets. Insurance investigators say that claimants who know they are being watched sometimes agree to lesser settlements.

Faced with a need for phone records, image-conscious firms generally shy away from pretexting and try the direct approach.

"They say, 'We have a fiduciary duty to look into this. We want your phone records; give them to us or resign.' " Lopez said.

Conrad Black, Facing U.S. Trial, Embraces Canada He Once Vilified (WSJ)

By Elena Cherney

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

TORONTO -- When former newspaper baron Conrad Black renounced his Canadian citizenship five years ago, he derided the country of his birth as an underachieving, socialist land better suited to "someone just arrived from Haiti or Romania."

The chairman and chief executive of the trans-Atlantic newspaper publisher Hollinger International, Mr. Black also was a citizen of the United Kingdom, and he had just been named to the British House of Lords. The only catch: To become Lord Black of Crossharbour, the jet-setting Mr. Black had to give up his Canadian citizenship, because the Canadian government wouldn't agree to the peerage.

Now, Mr. Black appears to be having second thoughts as he prepares to stand trial next year in U.S. federal court in Chicago on fraud and racketeering charges. Charged along with three other former executives in connection with $84 million in company payments, Mr. Black has applied to have his Canadian citizenship restored. And he has embarked on a campaign to restore his tarnished image among Canadians, talking about Canada's international role -- and denouncing the case against him.

"He is re-establishing himself in the place where he's going to live," says Mr. Black's lawyer, Edward Greenspan. "This is where he was born, this is where he was raised, this is where he started his newspaper empire."

Since his indictment in the U.S. last year, Mr. Black has been living at his Toronto estate. He has been a regular on the Toronto social circuit. He declined through Mr. Greenspan to be interviewed.

Becoming a Canadian citizen wouldn't help Mr. Black avoid or delay the trial set for March, because he already has surrendered his right to fight extradition from Canada. But there is a potential benefit if Mr. Black is found guilty: Canada has nicer prisons. Canadians in the U.S. prison system can apply to transfer back to Canada. Mr. Black's former business partner, David Radler, who now is cooperating with prosecutors, indicated in his plea bargain he plans to apply to serve his sentence in Canada.

Mr. Greenspan dismisses the suggestion Mr. Black is seeking to regain citizenship so he can serve a sentence in Canada. "The only plan that we have is to be acquitted," he says.

In the meantime, Mr. Black is living under a cloud. "I want to get rid of any taint," he told an Ontario public-television interviewer last month in his first formal interview since his indictment.

Yesterday, Mr. Black got a warm welcome as the guest speaker at a luncheon of Toronto's Empire Club, which bills itself as North America's oldest speaking forum. After the traditional toast to "Her Majesty the Queen" and the lunch served by red-vested waitstaff, club president John Niles introduced Mr. Black as Lord Black of Crossharbour, to loud applause. "What is Canada after all without Lord Black, but diminished," said the Rev. Niles, who listed Mr. Black's accomplishments but made only a veiled reference to the charges against him, calling them "the difficulties."

Public attitudes toward Mr. Black appear to be softening. Some former associates he alienated say they now sympathize with him. "The Americans are being vicious with him," says Douglas Bassett, one of four independent directors who resigned from the board of parent company Hollinger Inc. three years ago, after the board at Hollinger International reported it had uncovered unauthorized payments to Mr. Black and other executives. (Hollinger International recently changed its name to Sun-Times Media Group Inc., after its flagship newspaper in Chicago.)

Mr. Bassett hasn't spoken to Mr. Black since resigning from the board. But he says his old friend "is innocent until proven guilty." The bail bond of more than $20 million that prosecutors demanded is overkill, Mr. Bassett adds.

Winning Metaphors At Office Retreats, Tales Of Adversity Fire Up The Staff (WSJ)

By George Anders

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

CORONADO, Calif. -- At their annual retreat last month, 300 finance managers for Cisco Systems Inc. began the week with strategy meetings, followed by team sand-castle building and water-balloon launching. Then came the visit from a blind man.

He was Erik Weihenmayer, a slim, athletic 38-year-old. In an after-lunch speech, he recounted his bitterness as a teenager over losing his sight. He explained how he channeled his anger into rock climbing and dreamed of climbing Mount Everest. "People said I'd kill myself or my team members if I tried," he said. "But they didn't know anything about me."

Employees of the computer-networking company watched in awe as giant video screens showed Mr. Weihenmayer in 2001, picking his way past deep crevasses until he reached the top of Everest. "You don't just deal with adversity," he said. "You use it to propel you forward." Attendees gave him a standing ovation.

Mr. Weihenmayer makes nearly $1 million each year from such appearances, making him one of the top earners in an unusual business -- inspirational speakers whose accounts of personal struggle and triumph are sweeping through the corporate conference circuit. Companies such as Goldman Sachs & Co. and Wal-Mart Stores Inc. are booking speakers who have survived farm accidents, muggings or other tragedies, often paying $15,000 or more per engagement.

Years of scandals and strategic zigzagging have soured business audiences on pep talks from well-paid executives with fancy titles. But the skepticism softens when a speaker with a seeing-eye dog or a wheelchair speaks about unshakeable persistence, even if the orators aren't business experts. Bosses hope these speakers can cut through a fog of cynicism and complacency, getting people fired up about their jobs.

At Exxon Mobil Corp., procurement chief Jean Baderschneider says she used to book celebrities or management gurus as speakers. No more. They were too glib to connect with her teams, and in some cases she can't even remember their names. Now she invites gritty survivors to tell their stories at major staff events. "You need to build passion," Ms. Baderschneider says. "These speakers get people's juices flowing. They make us realize that our challenges are nothing compared with what they have done."

Corporations, universities and other organizations spend hundreds of millions a year on speakers. Top business and political leaders still command the highest fees, with former president Bill Clinton averaging $175,000 per speech. But Mr. Weihenmayer and a few similar orators with brave stories -- and a knack for tying their achievements to business themes -- compile enough well-paying dates to earn well into six figures themselves.

Hundreds of others try to make a living as inspirational speakers, with mixed results. Some do passably, collecting $5,000 or more a speech. Others discover to their dismay that the world isn't eager to hear their woes. Data compiled by the 4,000-member National Speakers Association indicate that the typical member earns $2,000 to $5,000 per talk. Many go for weeks without bookings.

When Trisha Meili was assaulted and left for dead in New York City in 1989, few people knew her name. Media accounts identified her only as the Central Park jogger. Then in 2003 she published her memoirs and began looking for audiences interested in how she recovered from tragedy.

One of the first people to book her was Roger Saillant, the chief executive officer of Plug Power Inc. His alternative-energy company was a highflier in 2000, with a stock that briefly traded as high as $150 a share. Three years later, the company's shares had plunged to single-digit levels. Losses were mounting and cash was scarce.

Plug Power spent $5,000 to bring Ms. Meili for a two-day visit to its headquarters in Latham, N.Y. There, she shared stories about learning to walk again after spending months in a coma. She urged people to "live totally in the present," instead of obsessing about a wonderful past that might be gone for good.

Mr. Saillant says she struck a chord. "We wanted to know how her experience could be a metaphor for what was happening at Plug Power," he says. "She had been in a near-death state but was able to pull herself out of it, thanks to the support of others and her own will not to give in. We constantly needed to raise money to keep going. There were similarities."

Since then, Ms. Meili has tripled her speaking fee, to $15,000, and expects to earn about $100,000 this year. She recently addressed managers at DuPont Co., which has been buffeted by restructuring plans the past few years. Ms. Meili remembers one of the chemical company's lawyers coming up to her and saying: "I've got this huge stack of papers on my desk. I've been too nervous about our future to get any work done on it. After hearing you, I'm ready to go back and dive into things right now."

Like many inspirational speakers, Ms. Meili says she tries to take her audience on an emotional journey. Rapt silence accompanies her opening stories. Partway through she often hears suppressed sobs. And at the end, there's an outburst of applause and even hugs from attendees. If all three parts come together, she says, "I know I've really connected with people."

One of the hardest-working inspirational speakers is Chad Hymas, a Utah real-estate investor and part-time elk rancher. Mr. Hymas nearly died in 2001, when a massive hay bale tumbled off a forklift truck on his ranch and crushed three vertebrae in his neck. The accident left his legs paralyzed and his arms barely mobile. He was despondent. Within a year, though, he was addressing church groups about his family's efforts to help him recover.

One attendee liked his talk so much that he arranged for Mr. Hymas to address a contractors' convention in Las Vegas. That speech went well. Soon Mr. Hymas was getting bookings from the likes of Wells Fargo Corp. Last year, Mr. Hymas delivered 160 speeches, ranging from small-scale local events to big corporate audiences that paid as much as $10,000 apiece, for total income of more than $500,000. This year, Mr. Hymas is on track to deliver 190 speeches, his best year ever.

Mr. Hymas says his core material hasn't changed since his first speech. He routinely recounts the early days after his accident, when he was hospitalized and struggling to raise his arms parallel to the floor. His 4-year-old son, Christian, came into the room and said: "Look, Daddy, you're flying!" Mr. Hymas now closes many of his speeches with the line: "Who needs legs when you have wings?"

A decade ago, orators such as Mr. Hymas might have been confined to low-paying church, school and hospital engagements. Big companies didn't want to traffic in pathos. Then Oprah Winfrey, the Lifetime Channel and Hollywood kept making heroes out of people who had been hammered by life's bad breaks and bounced back.

As these stories found mass audiences, scandals such as Enron Corp. left the public far more cynical about big business and reluctant to take advice from captains of industry. An annual Gallup Poll shows that business executives currently win favorable ratings from just 16% of the public, the lowest level since the savings-and-loan scandals of the 1980s.

Speakers' bureaus took note and started booking a new breed of lecturers. Leading Authorities Inc. of Washington, D.C., now lists 234 "inspirational and motivational speakers" on its Web site, its largest category. Many are traditional experts on leadership or politics who want to be cross-listed in a popular category, says Mark French, Leading Authorities' president. His inspirational roster also includes a survivor of 30 cancer surgeries and man who recovered after he was hit by a New York City bus.

"Companies want someone fresh who has beaten the odds," says Marc Reede, president of Nationwide Speakers Bureau, a lecture agency in Beverly Hills, Calif. Lots of speakers may enjoy only a year or two on the circuit before their appeal wanes. "But that's not a problem for us," he says. "We'll find the next ones."

At times, it takes only a hint of a business analogy to succeed with corporate audiences. Adventurer John Amatt survived a climb 20 years ago in which an avalanche killed three of his teammates. He made it to the top only by radically changing his route and tactics. Businesses love that story, he says, and they apply it in ways he never expected. In the medical-equipment industry, for example, Kinetic Concepts Inc., hired Mr. Amatt earlier this year to address its 1,500-person sales force, which was dispirited by Medicare cuts.

"We couldn't conceive of another way to do things," says Cyndi Erb, a KCI executive. "He told us how sometimes you have to rethink your path. We thought he would have to customize his talk for us, but actually we found out that wasn't necessary. Our salespeople took what he said and applied it to their everyday life."

The market for sports speakers also is being realigned. Speakers' bureaus aren't just competing to offer in-person appearances by superstars. Some are doing brisk business as well in promoting disabled athletes or the brave benchwarmer with a plucky story of how he or she made it to the big time. Sports speakers who have gained visibility in the past few years include one-armed basketball player Ron Gustafson; baseball pitcher Jim Morris, who didn't make the majors until age 35; and wrestler Kyle Maynard, who was born with stunted arms.

A favorite this year is Vince Papale, who won a walk-on spot with the Philadelphia Eagles in the 1970s, at age 30, despite never having played college football. He caught just one pass during his three-year pro career but made some thrilling tackles on the kick-return unit. Mr. Papale had been doing small-scale talks in the Philadelphia area since his playing days. In 2005, speakers' bureaus started positioning him as a much bigger draw.

It helped that a movie about Mr. Papale's life, "Invincible" was due out this year. But the speakers' bureaus figured his can-do attitude would rub off on sales forces. They guessed right. American International Group Inc. tried him with a group of annuity salesmen and liked the results so much that it booked him for five more talks, at $10,000 apiece.

"We had a tough year in 2005," recalls Michael Loftus, an annuity sales chief for AIG. "We really liked his lust for achievement. His message was that any dream can come true with hard work."

"Invincible" was a surprise hit this summer, so Mr. Papale has boosted his speaking fee to $20,000 to $30,000. Speaking agents are encouraging him to make the most of the opportunity. "He is looking at a two-year window," says Andy Roth, head of Roth Talent Associates, Encino, Calif. "It makes sense for him to maximize his speaking efforts during that time."

Mr. Weihenmayer, the blind mountain climber, is trying to make public speaking into a lifelong career. He taught fifth grade earlier in his life and enjoyed it, but he found the pay dispiriting. Now he delivers 50 addresses a year, collecting up to $40,000 for his international corporate bookings. "It amazes me to earn more with one speech than I did in a year of teaching," he says.

Mr. Weihenmayer says he has benefited from lots of coaching from his father, Ed, now retired, who had a long career at Pfizer Inc. and Salomon Brothers Inc. The older man has nudged his son to get business audiences laughing at the beginning -- and then, as the speech hits its stride, to bring in corporate values such as teamwork and planning.

During his Cisco talk, Mr. Weihenmayer told a story about climbing Mount McKinley in 1995 and trying to wave to his father, who was flying overhead in a helicopter. "I asked one of my teammates: 'Do you think Dad will know I made it?'" Mr. Weihenmayer recalled. "The answer came back: 'Sure he will. You're the one person waving your ski pole in totally the wrong direction.' "

The address soon turned serious. He talked about visiting Tibet recently and helping blind teens climb to Everest base camp. "People there think blind children are possessed with evil spirits," he said. "They lock them in homes or sell them into slavery. I wanted to show them something better."

At the end of his talk, he tied his life back to the business challenges facing Cisco. "With all the chaos of the past five years, it's as if we've all been climbing blind," he said. But that's no reason to be timid. "Be pioneers. Climb high."

After the speech, Cisco managers rushed up to shake his hand and to share stories about a son's eye injury or a friend's mountain-climbing adventure. A few asked him to sign a copy of his autobiography, which he slowly did.

Most of the time, Mr. Weihenmayer says, business audiences embrace him and wish him well. But he still remembers a bumpier session with an insurance company a few years ago. After the talk, at the hotel bar, he says, one salesman snapped at him: "So I guess the reason they brought you here was to make me feel bad."

Mr. Weihenmayer gulped. Then he told his heckler. "Maybe. But that's not a bad place to start. If it lights a fire in you, and gets you doing something different with your life, that's OK."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Report Says Nonprofits Sold Influence To Abramoff (WP)

By James V. Grimaldi And Susan Schmidt

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

Five conservative nonprofit organizations, including one run by prominent Republican Grover Norquist, "appear to have perpetrated a fraud" on taxpayers by selling their clout to lobbyist Jack Abramoff, Senate investigators said in a report issued yesterday.

The report includes previously unreleased e-mails between the now-disgraced lobbyist and officers of the nonprofit groups, showing that Abramoff funneled money from his clients to the groups. In exchange, the groups, among other things, produced ostensibly independent newspaper op-ed columns or news releases that favored the clients' positions.

Officers of the groups "were generally available to carry out Mr. Abramoff's requests for help with his clients in exchange for cash payments," said the report, issued by the Senate Finance Committee. The report was written by the Democratic staff after a yearlong investigation and authorized by the Republican chairman, Sen. Charles E. Grassley (R-Iowa).

Abramoff has pleaded guilty to fraud and conspiracy and could go to prison as early as next month. Prosecution and defense lawyers jointly filed papers yesterday asking a judge to recommend that he be sent to a federal facility in Cumberland, Md., to make it easier for him to cooperate with the ongoing probe. The investigation has resulted in one conviction and seven guilty pleas -- including one from a lawmaker, Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio), who is to appear today before a federal judge in the District.

The Senate report released yesterday states that the nonprofit groups probably violated their tax-exempt status "by laundering payments and then disbursing funds at Mr. Abramoff's direction; taking payments in exchange for writing newspaper columns or press releases that put Mr. Abramoff's clients in a favorable light; introducing Mr. Abramoff's clients to government officials in exchange for payment; and agreeing to act as a front organization for congressional trips paid for by Mr. Abramoff's clients."

The report bolstered earlier revelations that Abramoff laundered money through the nonprofits to pay for congressional trips and paid Norquist to arrange meetings for Abramoff's clients with government officials including White House senior adviser Karl Rove.

The groups named in the report are Norquist's Americans for Tax Reform; the Council of Republicans for Environmental Advocacy, which was co-founded by Norquist and Gale Norton before she became secretary of the interior; Citizens Against Government Waste; the National Center for Public Policy Research, a spinoff of the Heritage Foundation; and Toward Tradition, a Seattle-based religious group founded by Rabbi Daniel Lapin.

E-mails released by the committee show that Abramoff, often with the knowledge of the groups' leaders, exploited the tax-exempt status and leveraged the stature of the organizations to build support among conservatives for legislation or government action sought by clients including Microsoft Corp., mutual fund company DH2 Inc., Primedia Inc.'s Channel One Network, and Brown-Forman, maker of Jack Daniel's whiskey.

A spokesman for Norquist, John Kartch, called the report "political nonsense" pushed by Democrats close to the midterm elections.

Norquist's attorney, Cleta Mitchell, had told the Senate panel that, as long as Americans for Tax Reform spends funds in keeping with its general purpose, "there is no 'abuse' of ATR's tax status." Officials with the Council of Republicans for Environmental Advocacy denied wrongdoing. Citizens Against Government Waste said the group did not abuse its tax status and always adhered to long-held positions.

Amy Ridenour of the National Center acknowledged in an interview with investigators that donations can have some sway with think tanks but denied that they were made in exchange for positions.

Sen. Max Baucus (Mont.), the Finance Committee's ranking Democrat, called on the IRS and the FBI to investigate. "These groups' dealings with Jack Abramoff certainly violated the spirit, and perhaps the letter, of the laws that give charitable and social welfare organizations a break for the good work they're supposed to do," Baucus said in a statement.

A spokeswoman for Grassley said the chairman did not co-write the report because he had hoped it would include a broader range of groups that he believes also breached their tax status. A Baucus aide said the Democratic staff did not object to a broader review.

The Abramoff scandal has bruised the image of Norquist, a friend of Abramoff's since their days in the College Republicans. Often consulted by Rove, Norquist for decades has convened a key Wednesday morning strategy session for conservative leaders, lobbyists and Republican lawmakers.

Abramoff traded on Norquist's cachet, at one point referring to him in an e-mail as a "hard-won asset" of his lobbying empire. In exchange for Norquist's opposition to taxes on Brown-Forman products, Norquist recommended that a $50,000 donation be made to Americans for Tax Reform, according to an Abramoff e-mail.

"What is most important, however, is that this matter is kept discreet," Abramoff wrote to a colleague at the Preston, Gates & Ellis law firm. "We do not want the opponents to think that we are trying to buy the taxpayer movement."

The e-mails show that Abramoff and Norquist explicitly discussed client donations to Norquist's group in exchange for Norquist's support. The group's advocacy "appears indistinguishable from lobbying undertaken by for-profit, taxable firms," the report said.

Among those who agreed to donate money for an opinion piece was DH2, which in 2004 pushed for tax breaks for its customers.

E-mails show that DH2 understood that Norquist's help came with a price tag. The tab was sent to DH2's managing director, Robert S. Rubin.

"I told Rubin he needs to round up some $$$ for ATR," wrote lobbyist Michael E. Williams to his boss, Abramoff.

"Get the money from Rubin in hand," Abramoff replied, "and then we'll call Grover."

How much, Williams asked.

"50K," Abramoff wrote.

Abramoff e-mailed Norquist on Feb. 10, 2004: "I have sent over a $50K contribution from DH2 (the mutual fund client). Any sense as to where we are on the op-ed placement?"

Replied Norquist: "The Wash Times told me they were running the piece. . . . I will nudge again."

The Washington Times has published about 50 Norquist op-eds since 1993 but apparently none on mutual funds. Norquist did write a letter in April 2004 to a congressman praising him for sponsoring "legislation that would finally allow mutual fund shareholders to defer their capital gains tax" and pledging that his group "is committed to helping you pass this legislation."

Norquist wrote an op-ed piece, published in the Washington Times, as part of an extensive Abramoff campaign for Channel One, which broadcasts educational programming and advertising into public school classrooms. An Abramoff e-mail to Norquist offered him $1,500 for an op-ed, and another e-mail exchange suggested up to $3,000 to buy an "economic analysis."

The Council for Republican Environmental Advocacy, founded by Norquist and Norton, who resigned as interior secretary earlier this year, also appeared to have been used "as an extension of Mr. Abramoff's lobbying organization," the report said.

Abramoff directed his client Indian tribes to donate a total of about $500,000 to the group, telling them that the donation was a way to cultivate Norton at the Interior Department, which oversees the tribes and their casinos. E-mails show that Abramoff told the tribes that they would be CREA's "trustees" and that Norton would "host" a series of CREA dinners. Interior Department documents obtained by The Washington Post suggest that Norton was an invited guest at a CREA dinner, not a host.

Senate Questions Nonprofits' Tax Status (AP-Y)

By John Heilprin, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 13, 2006

Five nonprofit groups, including one of President Bush's biggest supporters, may have broken tax laws and put their tax-exempt status at risk by helping convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff, a Senate Finance Committee report concludes.

The 600-page report issued Thursday was prepared by the committee's Democratic staff. Majority Republicans, however, had agreed to its release and joined with Democrats in issuing subpoenas for documents and e-mails cited in the report.

Among the groups named as possibly taking money from Abramoff clients and funneling it into his lobbying efforts on their behalf were Americans for Tax Reform, Citizens Against Government Waste and the Council of Republicans for Environmental Advocacy.

Tax-exempt groups are barred by law from being paid to lobby or do public relations.

Americans for Tax Reform is headed by Grover Norquist, a key ally of Bush and a longtime associate of Karl Rove, the president's chief political adviser.

The report said Norquist's group accepted $1.5 million from the Mississippi Band of Choctaw Indians, one of Abramoff's clients. More than two-thirds of that money was then passed to Christian Coalition founder Ralph Reed as part of Abramoff's lobbying efforts to block a rival tribe's proposed casino in Alabama.

Nell Rogers, a planner for the Choctaws, told the Senate Indian Affairs Committee that the arrangement was never intended as a contribution to support ATR's general anti-tax work. She quoted Abramoff as saying Norquist's had instead agreed to be a conduit for getting money to Reed, provided that ATR got a fee.

Sen. Max Baucus of Montana, the Senate Finance Committee's senior Democrat, said his staff turned up evidence showing the groups "may have improved a lobbyist's power and profits" by unlawfully exploiting their tax-exempt status, possibly even lobbying the White House.

Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to tax evasion and wire fraud. While awaiting sentencing, he is cooperating in a federal bribery investigation that has resulted in convictions against a congressman and the administration's top procurement officer.

Norquist's group and a second organization cited in the report denied any wrongdoing. They also questioned the timing of the report's release so close to Nov. 7 elections in which Republicans are trying to return their control of Congress.

"This is political nonsense put out by the Democrats in an inappropriate attempt to influence the election," said John Kartch, communications director for Americans for Tax Reform.

David Williams, a vice president of Citizens Against Government Waste, said it was "kind of suspicious that three weeks before an election, this comes out." The group named Baucus its monthly "porker" in October 2004 for adding drought relief to a domestic security bill.

"There is no 'there' there," Williams said of the report. "We are very careful about the issues that we pursue."

The report said Citizens Against Government Waste said some donations to it ended up being used to help Abramoff clients with public relations.

"Nonprofits should not function as de facto lobbying firms. Lobbying for a fee, public relations, and disguising sources of money are not charitable or social welfare activities," Baucus said.

He said it is up to the Justice Department and Internal Revenue Service, part of the grand jury probes into Abramoff's dealings, to decide whether the groups broke any tax laws.

Republican Sen. Charles Grassley of Iowa, the committee chairman, could have blocked the report's release. Grassley said Thursday he would consider the report but said it should have looked at more nonprofit groups.

"The problems are widespread and won't be resolved just with Mr. Abramoff going to jail," Grassley said.

The report also questioned the tax-exempt status of other groups, based on their association with Abramoff. It found that:

_The Council of Republicans for Environmental Advocacy, co-founded by Italia Federici, Norquist and former interior secretary Gale Norton, received at least $250,000 from Abramoff clients to lobby the Interior Department.

_The National Center for Public Policy Research used money from Abramoff's clients to sponsor golf trips in 2000 and 2003 to Scotland for members of Congress.

_Toward Tradition, a religion-centered group once chaired by Abramoff, took money for help with generating news articles for Abramoff and his clients.

Abramoff Laundered Money Through Tax-Exempt Groups, Report Says (BLOOM)

By Jonathan D. Salant

Bloomberg, October 13, 2006

Oct. 12 (Bloomberg) -- Republican lobbyist Jack Abramoff used non-profit organizations to launder money, write articles to help his clients, and hide the fact that his clients paid for trips by lawmakers and aides, said a report today by Democratic members of the Senate Finance Committee.

The report said the organizations -- including Americans for Tax Reform, run by conservative activist Grover Norquist, a supporter of President George W. Bush and congressional Republicans -- ``engaged in what amounted to profit-seeking and private benefit inconsistent with their tax-exempt status."

Senate Democrats asked the Justice Department, Treasury Department and Internal Revenue Service to review the findings.

``These groups' dealings with Jack Abramoff certainly violated the spirit, and perhaps the letter, of the laws that give charitable and social welfare organizations a break for the good work they're supposed to do," said Senator Max Baucus of Montana, the top Democrat on the committee.

A spokeswoman for Senate Finance Chairman Charles Grassley, an Iowa Republican, said he would consider the report's recommendations. Spokeswoman Jill Gerber said the senator wanted a more comprehensive report that would look at non-profit organizations on all sides of the political spectrum.

``His focus is on reforming the system to stop systemic abuse of the tax code," Gerber said. ``The problems are widespread and won't be resolved just with Mr. Abramoff going to jail."

Karl Rove

The report said Americans for Tax Reform took money from Abramoff's clients and agreed to introduce them to top Bush aide Karl Rove and other officials. Norquist is an ally of Rove.

``This is political nonsense put out by the Democrats in an inappropriate attempt to influence the election," said John Kartch, a spokesman for Americans for Tax Reform.

The report said the group served as a pass-through to hide the source of money given by Abramoff's clients. The group would accept money from his clients, then write a check from its own account to a third party while keeping a cut of the funds, the report said.

For example, the report said, Republican consultant Ralph Reed received money from the tax reform group to fund an anti-gambling campaign. The effort was being bankrolled by the Mississippi Band of Choctaw Indians, which ran a successful casino and wanted stop another tribe from opening a competing facility, the report said. A Reed spokesman didn't immediately return a call seeking comment.

The other groups named in the report were Citizens Against Government Waste, Council of Republicans for Environmental Advocacy, National Center for Public Policy Research and Toward Tradition.

`Manipulated' by Abramoff

The Republican environmental group was founded by Gale Norton, later chosen by Bush to be interior secretary. The group's president, Italia Federici, told the Senate Indian Affairs Committee in November 2005 that she was ``manipulated" by Abramoff. E-mails released by the Indian Affairs panel showed that Abramoff asked Federici to intervene with Norton's deputy, J. Steven Griles, on behalf of the lobbyist's tribal clients.

Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to corrupt public officials and defrauding American Indian tribes that were his clients. He was a major fundraiser for the Republican Party, bringing in at least $100,000 for Bush's 2004 re-election.

He was sentenced in March to five years and 10 months in prison in a separate fraud case in Florida and has been ordered to surrender to authorities on Nov. 15. Prosecution and defense lawyers jointly filed papers today asking a judge in Miami to recommend that he be sent to a federal prison in Cumberland, Maryland. Abramoff is continuing to cooperate with government officials, and the prison is within driving distance of Washington, the papers said.

Abramoff Figure Rep. Ney To Plead Guilty (AP-Y)

By Pete Yost

AP-Yahoo, October 13, 2006

Pressed by Republican House colleagues to resign, Rep. Bob Ney (news, bio, voting record) is the first congressman to fall in the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling case, a controversy that has reached the Bush White House and Capitol Hill.

In his sixth term, Ney is to enter a guilty plea Friday to a pair of felonies that could send him to prison for up to 10 years.

Ney signed papers a month ago admitting to charges of conspiracy and making false statements, acknowledging that he had deprived the public of his honest services.

The Ohio congressman says he took tens of thousands of dollars worth of trips, sports tickets, campaign contributions, meals and casino chips in exchange for legislation and public statements supporting Abramoff's clients and a foreign businessman.

With the Justice Department recommending 27 months behind bars for Ney, the congressman may announce his decision to step down when he appears before U.S. District Judge Ellen S. Huvelle, an appointee of President Clinton.

Longtime Washington lawyer Stephen Ryan said "the most likely event" is that Ney will quit in front of the judge because that would represent acceptance of responsibility for his crimes, a critical issue with regard to the length of his prison term.

Ney checked into an alcohol rehabilitation program in September. If Ney applies for and is accepted into the U.S. Bureau of Prisons Residential Drug Abuse Program, he might be able to reduce his time behind bars by up to a year, according to an agency manual.

Some federal judges have complained the program has been used by undeserving white-collar criminals to significantly cut prison time.

House Republicans are giving Ney a strong push toward the door.

"If Bob Ney fails to resign, I will strongly support a resolution to expel him from the House of Representatives," said Ohio Rep. Deborah Pryce (news, bio, voting record), the fourth-ranking member of the House GOP leadership.

Despite his admission of criminal activity, Ney, 52, is entitled to collect a congressional pension.

In April, the House passed legislation that would have taken away congressional pensions of any lawmaker convicted of the conspiracy charge contained in the court papers Ney signed. But the Senate-passed bill did not contain the pension provision, and the two chambers never reached a compromise.

During his time in Congress, Ney built up goodwill back home for his responsiveness and visibility in a sprawling, conservative region of mines, farms and Rust Belt towns in eastern Ohio.

The recently filed court papers note that Abramoff, other lobbyists on his team and their clients had no connection to Ney's congressional district, other than the lawmaker himself. "None of whom were Ohio-based," the court documents note.

Ney's court appearance comes one week after a top aide to White House political adviser Karl Rove resigned amid questions over her links to Abramoff. Susan Ralston left after a House committee reported that she apparently accepted tickets to sporting events from Abramoff without reimbursing him.

The House committee report, which summarized an investigation of links between Abramoff and the White House, cited 485 contacts between the lobbyist and his associates with the Bush White House. The tally was based on records House investigators obtained from 13 of 24 Abramoff clients.

In June, former White House official David Safavian, who had been the Bush administration's top procurement official, was convicted of covering up his dealings with Abramoff. He is scheduled for sentencing on Oct. 27.

Prison Sought For Former Bush Official (AP-Y)

By Lara Jakes Jordan

AP-Yahoo, October 13, 2006

The government is pushing for three years in prison for a former Bush administration official found guilty of covering up his relationship with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

The prison time could be years less than what David Safavian, former chief of staff of the General Services Administration, was initially expected to face for lying and hiding details of his connections with Abramoff from investigators and lawmakers.

Federal prosecutors calculated that Safavian's sentence should be between 30 and 37 months, based on federal guidelines, and asked that he be sentenced "at the high end of that range." Safavian could have faced up to five years on each of the four criminal counts in his June conviction. His sentencing is set for Oct. 27.

In documents filed in federal court Wednesday, Justice Department prosecutors Nathaniel B. Edmonds and Peter R. Zeidenberg urged the court to reject Safavian's request for probation, home detention and community service instead of prison.

"Such a sentence is wholly unwarranted and would constitute a miscarriage of justice," the prosecutors wrote.

"There is simply no basis for this court to accept defendant's invitation to disregard the sentencing guidelines and impose such a breathtakingly lenient sentence," the prosecutors concluded.

Safavian's attorney, Barbara Van Gelder, did not immediately return a call seeking comment Thursday.

His federal trial marked the first guilty verdict by a jury in the Abramoff probe. E-mails between the two men showed how Abramoff showered Safavian with trips and other perks while badgering him for information about two pieces of GSA-controlled property the lobbyist wanted — including the historic Old Post Office in downtown Washington.

Labor's Enthusiasm For Republicans Fades (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

LABOR CURBS outreach to Republicans as Democratic prospects brighten.

Teamsters and FireFighters, among others, had vowed to ramp up Republican support to increase their clout while Bush's party held power. But enthusiasm has faded, a Teamsters official explains, because "Republicans went too far. We need a leadership change."

Some local unions continue offering volunteer support and endorsements to labor-friendly Republicans. New York Republican Rep. Sue Kelly gets help from construction unions, operating engineers and transport workers. Her singer-songwriter opponent John Hall "won't have monolithic union support," says Kelly spokesman Jay Townsend.

AFL-CIO President Sweeney today headlines labor rally for Democratic Senate candidate Ford in Tennessee.

WARNER'S departure from 2008 field alters Democratic contest.

"It's an open race," says ex-Virginia governor Mark Warner, disputing assessments that New York Sen. Clinton is prohibitive front-runner. Decision could lift the profiles of governors Vilsack of Iowa and Richardson of New Mexico, fellow Southerner Edwards of North Carolina, and centrist alternative Sen. Bayh of Indiana.

"No one ever won the White House without being lucky," an aide to one contender says. But some operatives cite Lamont's Senate primary win in Connecticut as evidence that restive Democrats want an unabashed liberal.

"The Democratic Party primary electorate ... is considerably to the left" of Warner, says strategist Carter Eskew.

BENCH STRENGTH? As nuclear tensions rise, some U.S. diplomats say State Department has grown thin on Korean expertise after Bush-era departure of veterans linked to Clinton's engagement policy. TRADING PLACES? Amid bleak national mood and local anxiety over textile job losses, Democrats see rising opportunity for challenger Larry Kissell to knock off Republican Rep. White House hopeful Edwards prepares to stump for Kissell, after Bush administration textile official appears with Hayes and briefs industry executives on efforts to stop "illegal goods."

PENTAGON OFFICIALS don't expect Iraq policy shift despite rising unease.

Prominent Republicans, including former Secretary of State Baker and Sens. John Warner and Snowe, have pointed to the need for near-term changes. But military commanders, who Bush insists determine his approach, want to give current security strategy more time to tamp down Baghdad violence.

The strategy so far has been met with record levels of sectarian and insurgent attacks. The top commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, predicts violence will subside, but "it's not going to be something that we're going to get done quickly."

If Baghdad isn't more secure by December, senior military officials say, another approach might be justified.

House Panel Grills Foley's Former Aide (AP-Y)

By Larry Margasak

AP-Yahoo, October 13, 2006

Former Rep. Mark Foley's one-time aide didn't waver Thursday from his past statements during nearly five hours of closed testimony before the House ethics committee, the witness' lawyer said. Kirk Fordham has publicly said he raised alarms with the House speaker's top aide nearly three years ago.

Fordham, who was Foley's chief of staff, would not comment after emerging from a session with the ethics committee. His lawyer, Timothy Heaphy, would not provide details.

Heaphy said Fordham was "consistent in his accounts" and "forthcoming."

Fordham's extensive knowledge of Foley's actions include the Florida Republican's attempt to enter the page dorm while drunk several years ago — one of the events that triggered several alarms raised by Fordham with House officials, according to one source familiar with Fordham's actions and knowledge.

House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., has said he learned of inappropriate approaches by Foley in late September and his aides found out in the fall of 2005. Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, has denied that Fordham contacted him at least three years ago, contradicting Fordham and creating one of the major conflicts the committee must resolve.

Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said after Fordham's testimony: "The ethics committee is investigating this matter and we are confident in its ability to determine the real facts. The speaker has said that any person who is found guilty of improper conduct involving sexual contact or communication with a page should immediately resign, be fired, or be subjected to a vote of expulsion."

Fordham has made several public statements on his actions and has been questioned by the FBI. Heaphy said Fordham has been asked not to comment on the substance of the inquiry because of the ongoing investigation.

Foley resigned from Congress on Sept. 29 after being confronted with sexually explicit instant messages.

Polls indicate the page scandal is hurting Republican chances of retaining the majority in the House. President Bush appeared with the embattled speaker in Chicago on Thursday, saying the country would be "better off" with Hastert in power.

"I am proud to be standing with the current speaker of the House, who is going to be the future speaker of the House," Bush said as he opened a speech to raise money for two Illinois congressional candidates.

Fordham isn't the only witness who will testify about earlier, unsuccessful attempts to stop Foley, although the timelines differ.

Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill., scheduled to appear Friday, has said he confronted Foley last fall, after he was told by Hastert's office of an overly friendly — but not sexually explicit — e-mail to a page from Louisiana.

Shimkus is chairman of the House Page Board, a group of three lawmakers and two House officers who set policy for the program that brings teenagers to Congress to attend school and perform errands in the chamber during sessions.

Shimkus has said that he and then-House clerk Jeff Trandahl confronted Foley in his office last fall after hearing from Hastert's aides about the e-mail. Shimkus said he told Foley to cease all contact with the Louisiana teenager.

The lawmaker did not tell the two other House members of the page board about the meeting — Dale Kildee, D-Mich., and Shelley Moore Capito, R-W.Va.

Shimkus said he was following the wishes of the boy's parents.

"I think Congressman Shimkus acted in an expedited manner to find out what happened" while respecting the wishes of the family, Hastert said in support of Shimkus' decision to keep the two other lawmakers out of the loop.

Another Republican House member, Rep. Jim Kolbe of Arizona, has pushed the timeline on GOP knowledge of Foley's conduct back to 2001.

Kolbe said a former page contacted his office to report receiving e-mails from Foley that made him uncomfortable. "I was not shown the content of the messages and was not told they were sexually explicit. It was my recommendation that this complaint be passed along to Rep. Foley's office and the clerk who supervised the page program. This was done promptly," he said.

Republicans received a new indication Thursday that the Foley scandal is hurting their chances of retaining control of the House.

Rep. Jo Ann Emerson, R-Mo., said in Cape Girardeau that GOP leaders made a mistake in failing to take quick action to address Foley's conduct. She said the controversy and the public's frustration with the war in Iraq could make it difficult for the GOP to retain control.

"Today, I'd say we aren't going to hold it," she said in remarks quoted by the Southeast Missourian newspaper in Cape Girardeau.

Before Fordham appeared, Capito was questioned by the House investigators.

"I'm a member of the page board who was not informed of the e-mail messages that were sent. I want the investigation to go forth quickly and reach a conclusion," she said after finishing her testimony.

Capito's Democratic opponent had earlier accused her of failing to protect the high schoolers in the page program.

Foley's Former Top Aide Testifies (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

A key player in the unfolding scandal involving teenage pages and a Florida lawmaker testified for more than four hours before a House ethics committee panel yesterday, repeating his assertions that Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's top aide had early warnings about the congressman's questionable behavior toward youths, according to the witness's attorney.

Kirk Fordham, who was a chief of staff to then-Rep. Mark Foley (R), was consistent with his previous statements when he gave sworn testimony to a panel investigating the House's handling of Foley's actions, lawyer Timothy J. Heaphy told reporters after the two men emerged from an afternoon of questioning.

Fordham has said that he turned to Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, in 2003 in hopes of persuading Foley to stop showing so much interest in teenage pages, who work for a semester or two on Capitol Hill. Fordham has said Palmer later assured him that he had met privately with Foley and had informed Hastert (R-Ill.) of the situation.

Palmer has been publicly mum on the Foley affair except for a seven-word statement issued days ago: "What Kirk Fordham said did not happen."

Hastert says he knew nothing of concerns about Foley's behavior toward House pages until Sept. 29. That was the day Foley, 52, abruptly resigned his House seat as ABC News was reporting that he had sent sexually graphic electronic messages to former pages.

Fordham's testimony places crucial questions about the Foley affair in front of the highest level of the House Republican leadership: Did Hastert's top aides have reason to think Foley was behaving improperly? Did they relay the concerns to the speaker? And if they did not, why not?

Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean issued a statement after Fordham's testimony, saying: "The ethics committee is investigating this matter and we are confident in its ability to determine the real facts. The Speaker has said that any person who is found guilty of improper conduct involving sexual contact or communication with a page should immediately resign, be fired, or be subjected to a vote of expulsion."

Heaphy was with Fordham for nearly five hours as Fordham spoke with three ethics committee members and their staffers in a Capitol basement meeting room. Heaphy told reporters that his client "has been forthcoming with them. He has been consistent in his accounts of these events when he talked to the FBI and today."

The ethics committee has no jurisdiction over Foley, who is no longer a House member, but the FBI is investigating whether he committed a crime.

Fordham worked for other GOP lawmakers after leaving Foley's staff; he resigned last week as chief of staff to Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.) after it was learned that he had tried to negotiate with ABC News on behalf of Foley regarding the lewd instant messages.

While Fordham's assertions deal with Foley's alleged face-to-face behavior toward pages, another thread of the scandal involves two other key Hastert aides -- counsel Ted Van Der Meid and deputy chief of staff Mike Stokke. They have said they were alerted last year about e-mails Foley had sent to a former page from Louisiana. The e-mails, which asked the boy what he wanted for his birthday and requested he send a photo of himself, alarmed the youth and his parents. ABC News's eventual reporting of the e-mails led to leaks of the far more explicit instant messages to former pages.

A chronology issued by Hastert's office on Sept. 30 said that soon after Stokke and Van Der Meid became aware of the e-mails, two members of the House Page Board spoke with Foley, who told them that his actions were innocent. Stokke and Van Der Meid said they did not alert Hastert or Palmer, and the speaker has said they acted properly.

Yesterday morning, the ethics panel spent more than an hour with Rep. Shelley Moore Capito (R-W.Va.). She is among the members of the House Page Board who were not alerted about the e-mails sent to the Louisiana youth. "I'm a member of the Page Board who was not informed of the e-mail messages that were sent," Capito told reporters as she left the session.

She and another Page Board member -- Rep. Dale E. Kildee (D-Mich.) -- have said that they should have been informed and consulted. Democrats say an inquiry into early concerns about Foley might have uncovered his objectionable communications, which had been whispered about in some circles of former pages.

Instead, two officials quietly met with Foley late last year. They were then-House Clerk Jeff Trandahl and Rep. John M. Shimkus (R-Ill.), chairman of the Page Board. Shimkus is to testify before the ethics panel today, his office said.

Officials expected to testify next week or later, House sources said, include Trandahl and House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio). Boehner and Reynolds have said they told Hastert about the e-mails to the Louisiana youth. The speaker says he does not recall such conversations.

Aides including Palmer, Stokke and Van Der Meid are virtually certain to be summoned, House insiders say, but it is unclear when.

The ethics committee members attending yesterday's sessions were the chairman, Rep. Doc Hastings (R-Wash.); the ranking Democrat, Rep. Howard L. Berman (Calif.); and Rep. Judy Biggert (R-Ill.). The fourth subcommittee member handling the Foley matter is Rep. Stephanie Tubbs Jones (D-Ohio).

Ex-Foley Aide Testifies For Ethics Panel (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — Members of the House ethics committee spent more than four hours Thursday taking sworn testimony from a former congressional aide who says he sounded the alarm about Rep. Mark Foley's advances to teenage pages at least two years ago.

Kirk Fordham, a top aide to Foley for 10 years, said nothing as he emerged from an afternoon of interrogation by the two top-ranking members of the ethics panel: Chairman Doc Hastings, R-Wash., and Rep. Howard Berman, D-Calif.

"Mr. Fordham has been completely forthcoming," said his attorney, Tim Heaphy. "He was under oath. That's all I can say."

Fordham is considered a key figure in the ethics committee investigation, which focuses on whether House leaders should have responded sooner to warnings about Foley's unusual interest in male House pages.

Foley, a six-term Florida Republican, resigned from Congress Sept. 29 after ABC News confronted him with sexually explicit Internet messages he allegedly sent to teenage pages. Foley is now in an alcohol rehabilitation center. His lawyer, David Roth, has said Foley did not have sex with minors.

In Chicago, President Bush made his first appearance with House Speaker Dennis Hastert since the controversy. Hastert introduced Bush at a fundraiser for Republican candidates as "our friend … our leader." Bush said of Hastert. "I am proud to be standing with the current speaker of the House, who is going to be the future speaker of the House."

Fordham has said he told Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, about aspects of Foley's behavior sometime before 2004. Palmer has denied that.

Two other House Republicans, Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio and Rep. Thomas Reynolds of New York, have said they warned Hastert about Foley's attention to pages last spring. Hastert has said he doesn't remember the conversations. Rep. Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz., has said he told the House clerk's office in 2000 or 2001 about e-mails that a page told Kolbe's office made him feel uncomfortable.

Fordham and the congressmen have said they did not know about sexually explicit messages that came to light recently. They were reporting contacts they considered overly friendly, Fordham has said.

Also Thursday, ethics committee members interviewed Rep. Shelley Moore Capito, R-W.Va., a member of the House Page Board. Capito has said she knew nothing about concerns over Foley's relationship with pages until he resigned.

Rep. John Shimkus, R-Ill., the head of the page board, will meet with the ethics committee today. Shimkus has said he confronted Foley last fall after Rep. Rodney Alexander, R-La., reported that parents of a former page he sponsored were concerned about messages Foley was sending their son. Shimkus has said he believed Foley when Foley told him that he would change his behavior.

Shimkus took then-House clerk Jeff Trandahl to meet Foley but did not tell the other members of the page board, Capito and Rep. Dale Kildee, D-Mich. Shimkus has said he was honoring the wishes of the page's parents, who wanted the matter kept private.

At a news conference on Capitol Hill on Thursday, members of the Survivors Network of those Abused by Priests said House leaders are mishandling abuse complaints. Barbara Blaine, a Chicago lawyer who founded the group, said members of Congress should report suspected misconduct to police. "Law enforcement officials are best equipped to determine what's innocuous," she said.

Ex-aide Testifies He Warned About Foley 3 Years Ago (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, October 13, 2006

Former Rep. Mark Foley's former aide didn't waver yesterday before the House ethics committee from his contention that he told the House speaker's chief of staff about Mr. Foley's approaches to male pages at least three years ago, the witness's attorney said.

Kirk Fordham would not comment after emerging from nearly five hours of closed-door testimony, but his attorney, Timothy Heaphy, said Mr. Fordham was "consistent in his accounts." Mr. Fordham has spoken out publicly on his timeline and was questioned by the FBI.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert has said that he personally learned of the inappropriate approaches by Mr. Foley in late September and that his aides found out in fall 2005. The speaker's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, has denied that Mr. Fordham contacted him at least three years ago, contradicting Mr. Fordham and creating one of the major conflicts the committee will have to resolve.

Mr. Heaphy told reporters that his client was "forthcoming" in his testimony. "He has been consistent in his accounts of these events when he talked to the FBI and today met with the ethics committee. He has been truthful and cooperative and will continue to be throughout this and other investigations."

DOJ_NMG_0080367

Mr. Heaphy said Mr. Fordham has been asked not to comment on the substance of the inquiry because of the ongoing investigation.

Mr. Foley resigned from Congress Sept. 29, after being confronted about his sexually explicit instant messages.

Mr. Fordham isn't the only witness who will testify about earlier, unsuccessful attempts to stop Mr. Foley, although the timelines differ.

Rep. John Shimkus, Illinois Republican, who is scheduled to appear today, has said he confronted Mr. Foley in the fall, after he was told by Mr. Hastert's office of an overly friendly -- but not sexually explicit -- e-mail to a page from Louisiana. Mr. Shimkus is chairman of the House Page Board, a group of three lawmakers and two House officers who set policy for the program that brings teenagers to Congress to attend school and perform errands in the chamber during sessions.

Mr. Shimkus has said that he and Jeff Trandahl, who was House clerk at the time, confronted Mr. Foley in his office in the fall after hearing from Mr. Hastert's aides about the e-mail. Mr. Shimkus said he told Mr. Foley to cease all contact with the Louisiana teenager.

Mr. Shimkus did not tell the two other House members of the Page Board about the meeting -- Democrat Dale E. Kildee of Michigan and fellow Republican Shelley Moore Capito of West Virginia. Mr. Shimkus said he was following the wishes of the boy's parents.

"I think Congressman Shimkus acted in an expedited manner to find out what happened, again with what the framework of what the family concern was," Mr. Hastert said in support of the decision to keep the other two lawmakers out of the loop.

Ex-Aide To Foley Testifies Of Warning Speaker's Office (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 12 — A longtime aide to former Representative Mark Foley testified before the House ethics committee for nearly five hours on Thursday, repeating under oath his account of having explicitly warned Speaker J. Dennis Hastert's office at least three years ago that Mr. Foley should be told to keep his distance from Congressional pages.

The aide, Kirk Fordham, was the first sworn witness to appear before the bipartisan ethics panel, which is investigating whether any Republican leaders knew about Mr. Foley's conduct, which was ultimately exposed in a series of sexually explicit exchanges with former pages, and whether anything was done about it.

"Kirk has been forthcoming with them," said Timothy J. Heaphy, a lawyer representing Mr. Fordham, speaking to reporters as he walked from the committee room. "He's been consistent throughout."

Mr. Heaphy, with his client at his side, declined to answer questions about the long afternoon of questioning by three members of the committee and a team of investigators, which he would describe only as "thorough." As Mr. Fordham left the closed-door session, the sun had started to fall over the Capitol, and before getting into a taxi, he said: "I feel a lot of relief right now. It went well."

A person close to the inquiry who is sympathetic to Mr. Fordham said that Mr. Fordham decided to break his loyalties to Mr. Foley, a Florida Republican whose political career he had protected and scripted for a decade, in hope of getting his boss to change his behavior. The person agreed to speak about the matter, which is under investigation by federal prosecutors and by the House, only on the condition of anonymity.

Mr. Fordham has said he discreetly told Scott Palmer, Mr. Hastert's chief of staff, about a pattern of Mr. Foley's behavior.

The person sympathetic to Mr. Fordham said that one incident had pushed Mr. Fordham into action after years in which he heard minor complaints about Mr. Foley's conduct. The person said that Jeff Trandahl, then the House clerk, had told Mr. Fordham that Mr. Foley, who seemed drunk, had gone to the pages' dormitory near the Capitol after hours.

Mr. Palmer denies receiving a warning about Mr. Foley. Mr. Trandahl has declined to comment, saying he will save his remarks for investigators.

Mr. Fordham's testimony rests at the center of what investigators are trying to determine. The notion that he is, essentially, testifying against the word of Mr. Hastert and his closest aides underscores how the page scandal has upended the midterm election campaign and created unlikely political casualties.

Mr. Fordham, a respected Republican operative, resigned last week as chief of staff to Representative Thomas M. Reynolds, Republican of New York.

The fallout from Mr. Foley's case has increased complications for Republican candidates across the country, beginning with Mr. Reynolds, the chairman of the party's Congressional campaign committee, whose advisers now believe may be on the cusp of losing his re-election fight.

DOJ_NMG_0080368

The House ethics panel, formally known as the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, convened Thursday in the basement of the Capitol. Throughout the day, the current class of House pages, dressed in blue coats and gray slacks and skirts, passed through a dim corridor by the closed wooden doors of the committee room, HT-2.

A locker room for House pages is one door away.

For the committee, the investigation into how Mr. Foley's case was handled is the first high-profile inquiry in nearly two years. Quarreling by Republicans and Democrats over the rules and the membership of the committee had essentially left the panel dormant.

Representative Doc Hastings, a Washington Republican who was appointed last year by Mr. Hastert to lead the committee, and Representative Howard L. Berman, of California, the ranking Democrat, have vowed to follow the investigation "wherever the evidence leads." Representative Judy Biggert, an Illinois Republican, was also present for the questioning.

The committee is scheduled to reconvene Friday, when Representative John Shimkus, an Illinois Republican who oversees the Congressional page program, is set to testify. Mr. Shimkus is the first of several Republican lawmakers who are expected to go before the committee, including the majority leader, Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, and, ultimately, Mr. Hastert.

The speaker's office declined to issue a new comment on Thursday for Mr. Fordham's appearance. A spokesman, Ron Bonjean, said, "The ethics committee is investigating the matter, and we are confident in its ability to determine the real facts." Before Mr. Fordham arrived, Representative Shelley Moore Capito, Republican of West Virginia and a member of the page board, testified before the committee.

Ms. Capito declined to comment specifically on her testimony, but told reporters: "I'm a member of the page board who was not informed of the e-mail messages that were sent. I want the investigation to go forth quickly and reach a conclusion."

Ex-aide Testifies To Ethics Panel About Foley (CNN)

CNN.com, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Ex-congressional aide Kirk Fordham emerged from a House ethics committee hearing Thursday after more than four hours of sworn testimony in the scandal surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley's inappropriate contacts with teenage pages.

Fordham, once Foley's chief of staff, went before the ethics committee's investigative panel early Thursday afternoon and remained there until well after 5 p.m. Neither he nor his lawyer, Tim Heaphy, would discuss details of his testimony, but Heaphy said Fordham "has been forthcoming."

"He has been consistent in his accounts of these events when he's been with the FBI [and] when he's today met with the ethics committee," Heaphy said. "He's been truthful and cooperative and will continue to be throughout this and other investigations."

A source familiar with Fordham's account said the ex-aide would testify that he warned House Speaker Dennis Hastert's office years ago about complaints regarding Foley's behavior around the teenage messengers who work on Capitol Hill -- including a report that the disgraced congressman showed up drunk at the congressional page dormitory.(Watch Bush stand by Hastert -- 1:10)

House Republican Conference Chairwoman Deborah Pryce, R-Ohio, asked House Clerk Karen Haas to investigate the dormitory allegation last week. Capitol police are looking through files for any record of the incident, a spokeswoman said.Fordham's account disputed

But CNN was told by two sources familiar with Fordham's account and a third, independent source that Fordham maintains he arranged a meeting between Foley and Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, about that report and accounts of other behavior Fordham found troubling.

Palmer has denied Fordham's account, insisting in a statement last week that "What Kirk Fordham said did not happen." He has made no further public comment, but Hastert's office issued a brief statement after Fordham's testimony.

Fordham's version of the story contradicts statements by other members of the House leadership. Hastert's office said it first learned about non-explicit but "overly friendly" e-mails between Foley and a Louisiana teen who had served as a page earlier that year, and did not know about the sexually explicit instant messages that triggered Foley's resignation until September 29, when the congressman abruptly resigned.

In a statement following Fordham's testimony, Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said the speaker's office was confident that the ethics committee would "determine the real facts."

"The speaker has said that any person who is found guilty of improper conduct involving sexual contact or communication with a page should immediately resign, be fired, or be subjected to a vote of expulsion," Bonjean said.

DOJ_NMG_0080369

Fordham resigned last week as chief of staff to Rep. Tom Reynolds, R-New York, after ABC News reported that he offered the network an exclusive on Foley's resignation if it agreed not to air transcripts of the most explicit messages. He said earlier Thursday that he was "pretty comfortable" with the testimony he was to deliver.

"I slept very well last night. I had a good night's sleep," he said. "I talked to my family, and I am going to tell the truth."

The committee also heard from Rep. Shelley Moore Capito, who sits on the House Page Board. When the scandal broke, Capito, R-West Virginia, said she was never consulted about the concerns raised about Foley in 2005.

"I want to see this investigation go forth quickly and reach a conclusion," she told reporters after about an hour and a half in the committee room Thursday morning.Investigations under way

The House ethics committee and the Justice Department are investigating Foley's contacts with the boys and how the House GOP leadership handled the matter. Fordham sat down with FBI agents last week, and Jordan Edmund -- a former page who has reported receiving sexually explicit instant messages from Foley -- talked to federal agents Tuesday.

Edmund's lawyer, Stephen Jones, said the contact between Foley and his now 21-year-old client was minimal, and there was no sexual contact between the two.

A source familiar with the FBI probe, including statements from pages, suggests that investigators won't find any evidence that Foley had sex with underage pages. But the source said investigators will find that Foley consistently gave pages his private e-mail address as they would leave the program.

One page has said that Foley "cast a wide net" after pages left the program and continued communicating with pages he considered willing to develop a personal relationship.

Meanwhile, more lawmakers are planning to go before the ethics committee. House Majority Leader John Boehner "was invited to meet with them and looks forward to providing any information that might be helpful to their inquiry," Boehner spokesman Kevin Madden said. He did not disclose when Boehner would testify.

Page Board Chairman John Shimkus, R-Ilinois., is scheduled to testify Friday, his spokesman said. And Rep. Rodney Alexander, who brought Foley's e-mails to the Louisiana teen to House leaders' attention, is scheduled to testify next Wednesday, his chief of staff said.

Geddings Verdict: Guilty Of Fraud (CO)

By David Ingram And Mark Johnson

The Charlotte Observer, October 13, 2006

Raleigh - A federal jury on Thursday found former N.C. lottery commissioner Kevin Geddings guilty on five counts of mail fraud after a three-week trial.

Geddings faces up to 100 years in prison. He has not yet been sentenced. He was found not guilty of one count of wire fraud.

Prosecutors accused Geddings of participating in a conspiracy with two lobbyists for lottery vendor Scientific Games in an effort to help the company win a contract from the new N.C. lottery.

Geddings, 42, a former Charlotte businessman, showed little emotion when the verdict was read. His wife Christine sat behind him with her mouth open.

Geddings Found Guilty Of Fraud (AP)

AP, October 13, 2006

Sentencing is set for February

Kevin Geddings, a former N.C. Lottery commissioner charged with failing to disclose his work for a leading supplier of scratch-off tickets and lottery systems, was convicted yesterday of federal mail-fraud charges.

The guilty verdicts capped a three-week trial, during which Geddings told jurors that he didn't believe that he needed to report his past dealings with Scientific Games Corp. to the N.C. Board of Ethics.

"What the whole case was about was the fact that public officials serve the public," said Assistant U.S. Attorney Dennis Duffy. "People are sick of public officials serving their own interest and the interests of their friends especially."

After more than six hours of deliberations, jurors found Geddings, 42, guilty of five counts of honest services mail fraud and not guilty on a single count of wire fraud. A judge earlier dismissed three other counts of fraud included in the original indictment.

Geddings faces thousands of dollars in fines and up to 20 years in prison on each count, although prosecutors have said that it's unlikely that his sentence will be that long. A sentencing hearing was scheduled for Feb. 5, and Geddings will remain free until then.

Geddings and his attorney did not immediately return phone calls.

DOJ_NMG_0080370

Prosecutors said that Geddings defrauded the state of honest services by failing to disclose more than $250,000 in payments his public-relations company got from Scientific Games between 2000 and 2005. Among their key pieces of evidence was $24,500 in payments from Scientific Games to Geddings for work performed in the months leading up to the lottery's passage in August 2005.

Geddings resigned Nov. 1, hours before Scientific Games told state regulators about the payment, which Geddings did not include on a disclosure form filed with the state ethics board.

U.S. Attorney George Holding said that the government will continue its investigation into other possible wrongdoing surrounding the creation of the lottery, although he declined to discuss details.

"Today's verdict sends a very, very clear message that public servants in North Carolina may not lie to the people, they may not hide the truth from the people, and they may not profit on the backs of the people," Holding said.

During the trial, prosecutors said that Geddings worked with Alan Middleton, a longtime friend and Scientific Games executive, and Meredith Norris, Black's unpaid political director who was working for the company as a lobbyist, to advance Scientific Games' cause in North Carolina.

Scientific Games failed to win any business with the lottery.

Norris has pleaded no contest to charges that she broke state lobbying laws, and similar charges against Middleton are pending. Neither has been charged with a federal crime.

White House, NSA Staff Said To Be Buyers From Online Diploma Mill (AP)

AP, October 13, 2006

SPOKANE, Wash. - A White House staff member and National Security Agency employees were among 6,000 people who bought bogus online college degrees from a diploma mill, a federal judge has been told.

Others who paid thousands of dollars for phony diplomas in the operation, which used names such as St. Regis University, James Monroe University and Robertstown University, include a senior State Department employee in Kuwait and a Department of Justice employee in Spokane, defense lawyer Peter S. Schweda said Wednesday.

None of the federal officials was identified during the status conference for five defendants in U.S. District Court, nor would lawyers for either side provide any of their names outside the courtroom, The Spokesman-Review reported Thursday.

"We're not going to disclose who bought these degrees until after the trial is under way," U.S. Attorney James A. McDevitt told the newspaper.

Material provided to the defense by the Justice Department shows at least 135 government employees, also including some from the Department of Health and Human Services, bought college or university degrees to use in seeking promotions or pay raises, Schweda said.

The defense team also is seeking access to an Office of Personnel Management report which reportedly provides more detail on federal employees who are believed to have purchased the bogus degrees to enhance their portfolios.

The White House employee who reportedly bought a degree is the subject of a separate investigation, Schweda said.

The latest twist in the criminal case came Wednesday, a day after Kenneth Wade Pearson, 31, webmaster for the operation, pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit wire and mail fraud and receipt of child pornography.

Pearson said he would provide evidence and testify against Dixie E. and Stephen K. Randock Sr. of Colbert, described by government investigators as the ringleaders, making him the third of eight defendants to reach plea agreements in the case.

Pearson, who likely faces three to five years in prison, remained free on a $10,000 bond he posted after being indicted in January. Judge Lonnie R. Suko postponed his sentencing until December 2007, two months after the Randocks and three others are scheduled to go on trial.

The Randocks also remain free on bail.

More than 10,000 sexually explicit images of children were found in four computers used by the Spokane-based operation, government lawyers said, but only Pearson was named in pornography charges.

The defendants are charged with conspiring to commit wire and mail fraud and laundering almost $2 million in diploma mill receipts in 2002-05.

As webmaster, Pearson set up and maintained as many as 125 Web sites for sales of fraudulent college and high school degrees worldwide, investigators wrote in court filings.

Investigators also have asserted that more than $43,000 in bribes were paid to three Liberian diplomats who also have not been identified, including one handoff that was videotaped by Secret Service agents at a hotel in Washington, D.C. Government lawyers have said diplomatic immunity precludes charges against the diplomats.

The Liberian "Board of Education" offered accreditation for the online diploma mills in exchange for the bribes, according to court filings.

About 40 percent of the estimated 6,000 phony college degrees that were sold with that accreditation went to foreign residents seeking entry into the United States, investigators wrote in court filings.

A task force of state and federal agents served search warrants in August 2005 investigators found many of the phony degrees were sold in Saudi Arabia, raising national security concerns.

Ex-Member Of MS-13 Wore A Wire For Agents (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

A former member of the violent street gang MS-13 revealed in federal court yesterday that he risked his life for nearly two years by working undercover for federal agents and police investigating the group.

Noe "Shorty" Cruz, 25, testified in U.S. District Court in Greenbelt that he wore a wire two or three times to gang meetings. During one of those meetings, gang members played a videotape showing two Prince George's County police officers and a federal agent and spoke of killing an officer, Cruz testified.

Cruz also said that he tipped off investigators about which gang members' homes should be raided, that MS-13 members robbed prostitution houses and that gang leaders sent money to MS-13 leaders in El Salvador.

He testified that he turned against the gang because MS-13 members murdered another member who was his friend. To maintain his cover and avoid being beaten, he said, he took part in a fight against rival gang members at a Hispanic festival in the District.

The testimony provided a detailed look at what prosecutors say are the gang's violent ways. Cruz, who began testifying Wednesday and could complete his testimony today, is one of the government's star witnesses in its efforts to prove MS-13 is an internationally-connected criminal enterprise, rather than a neighborhood street gang.

Cruz was accompanied to and from the witness stand by federal marshals.

During the past year, federal prosecutors indicted 22 alleged members of MS-13, also known as Mara Salvatrucha, on federal racketeering charges. The indictment accuses the gang of six homicides and four attempted murders between April 2003 and June 2005. Eight attacks were in Prince George's and two in Montgomery.

Cruz is testifying against the first two defendants to go on trial: Oscar Ramos "Casper" Velasquez, 21, of Baltimore and Edgar Alberto "Pony" Ayala, 29, of Suitland. Both defendants are charged with racketeering; neither is accused of homicide.

Cruz identified Ayala as a leader of an MS-13 clique.

Some of Cruz's most compelling testimony concerned a meeting on April 17, 2004, when Cruz viewed the videotape of the three law enforcement officers.

Federal prosecutors played parts of the audiotape from the meeting, which was conducted in Spanish. Jurors and defense attorneys were provided with transcripts translated into English.

Under direct examination by Assistant U.S. Attorney Sandra Wilkinson, Cruz explained what happened at the meeting, which was attended by more than a half-dozen MS-13 members, he said. The meeting took place in the apartment of Israel Ramos "Taylor" Cruz, whom Cruz (no relation) identified as an MS-13 leader.

At the meeting, one gang member lamented "that crazy vato loco is busting everybody," according to the transcript. Vato loco is Spanish slang for crazy guy. Cruz said this was a reference to county police Detective Felipe Ordoño, a gang investigator who was Cruz's handler. At the time, Ordoño was arresting many gang members, Cruz said.

There was talk of another officer, and one gang member said, "There's a lot of status for one of those cops, you know," according to the transcript. Cruz explained that whoever killed an officer would gain much respect within MS-13.

Someone turned on a TV, and a video was played. It showed Ordoño, Roberto Acevedo, who at the time was a county police officer, and Todd Okray, an agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, in the Langley Park area, Cruz said. Okray is the lead agent in the racketeering investigation.

No attempts on the lives of the three law enforcement officers have been reported.

Cruz testified that he joined MS-13 at 14 in his native El Salvador. He was initiated into the gang by being "jumped in," or beaten, by fellow gang members. He came to Maryland the same year and joined a local MS-13 clique, the Sailors, which entailed another initiation beating, Cruz said.

Cruz said that he became disenchanted with the gang after the Nov. 22, 2003, murder of friend and fellow gang member Randy "Fenix" Calderon in Montgomery County. Cruz said he learned at a gang meeting that Juan Carlos "Stokey" Moriera, also an MS-13 member, shot Calderon. Moriera is charged in the indictment.

At the meeting, gang leaders explained that Calderon was killed because he had fatally stabbed a rival gang member inside the Silver Spring apartment of an MS-13 leader, Cruz said. Gang members were not upset about the murder but were upset that Calderon did it inside the apartment of a gang leader, Cruz testified.

In December 2003, Cruz was charged with assaulting his girlfriend, a charge that was later dropped, Cruz said. After Cruz was released from jail, Ordoño visited him, and he began talking about gang activities because of the Calderon killing, Cruz said.

In August 2005, when federal agents and police arrested nearly two dozen MS-13 members under an indictment, Cruz said he was picked up, too, to maintain his cover. He testified that the government has relocated him.

FBI Probing Staff Member, Specter Says (PPG)

By Jerome L. Sherman, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Arlen Specter has acknowledged that the FBI is investigating whether one of his staffers directed millions of dollars in federal money toward companies that were clients of her husband's lobbying firm.

The Pennsylvania Republican this week released a copy of an FBI letter, sent to him this summer, that asks for help with a probe into "allegations of possible criminal misconduct" by Vicki Siegel Herson, who currently works as the senator's special projects coordinator.

In February, USA Today reported that Mr. Specter's office was instrumental in getting almost $50 million in projects for several clients of a Washington-based lobbying firm, American Defense International, between 2002 and 2005. The firm's president, Michael Herson, is the husband of Ms. Siegel Herson. Up until last year, she handled Mr. Specter's work for the Senate Appropriations Committee.

In an interview transcript issued by his press secretary yesterday, Mr. Specter said that his office's internal investigation found "no impropriety." Still, he has referred the issue to the Senate Ethics Committee. He also has changed rules for his staff, requiring top aides to identify conflicts of interest involving appropriation requests.

The FBI letter asked Mr. Specter to show authorities a report detailing the internal investigation. He shared the information in September, when FBI officials visited his office. Since then, Mr. Specter said, the bureau hasn't contacted him.

A spokesman for the FBI's Washington field office yesterday declined to say if the investigation is still under way.

Funding for American Defense International's clients was placed in defense legislation through a controversial process known as "earmarking," which allows lawmakers to set aside money in spending bills for pet projects that often benefit their states or districts.

Mr. Specter has said his office gets hundreds of requests for earmarked funds each year and that it would be impossible for him to review each project.

He has defended some projects in Pennsylvania, describing them as important for national security, including nearly $21 million in earmarked funds for Drexel University's bio-terrorism and defense networking technology work in recent years.

Senate ethics rules do no stop spouses from lobbying, but both lawmakers and staffers are required to avoid the appearance of a conflict of interest.

Murders, Robberies Jump In Cities (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — Less than a month after the FBI reported that violent crime rates rose across the nation in 2005, there is fresh evidence that homicides and robberies are continuing to increase in dozens of cities.

A review of 55 cities' crime data from the first six months of this year indicates the overall number of homicides rose by 4.2% compared with the same period in 2005, according to the Police Executive Research Forum, a police advocacy group. In a report Thursday, the group also said robberies rose nearly 10% and that aggravated assaults were up slightly.

The report is the latest turn in a debate over whether the U.S. government has neglected local law enforcement needs by directing tens of millions of dollars to anti-terrorism initiatives. The police executives' group has been among those pressing for more police funding to counter rising numbers of violent incidents involving gangs and drugs. Among other things, the group has cited the FBI's report last month that detailed a 1.8% increase in the nation's murder rate in 2005, after a two-decade low in 2004.

Chuck Wexler of the police group said Thursday's report is an “early warning” that many cities could be at “the front end of a tipping point of violent crime.”

While emphasizing the need to prevent terrorism, the Justice Department has acknowledged that crime is continuing to rise in some cities this year. However, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty and other officials say it is too soon to tell whether the increases are a significant departure from the historically low crime rates of the past decade.

Of the 55 cities surveyed by the police group, 19 had double-digit percentage increases in homicides. More than 40 cities reported jumps in robberies. Among them:

·Orlando had 30 homicides in the first six months of the year, up from seven during the same period in 2005. Orlando police Sgt. Barbara Jones says about 60% of this year's slayings have been linked to drugs.

·In Memphis, homicides rose 43.6%, robberies were up 35% and aggravated assaults rose 7.4% in the first six months of 2006, compared with the same period last year. Tom Kirby of the Memphis and Shelby County Crime Commission cites gangs that have had turf battles and preyed on immigrant communities.

U.S. Rep. Frank Wolf, R-Va., chairman of the House Appropriations panel that oversees the Justice Department, called Thursday's report "staggering." He urged Robert Portman, head of the Office of Management and Budget, to meet with police officials "to better understand their needs."

Homicides have declined in some cities in 2006, the report said. Among them: Dallas, Chicago, Kansas City, Milwaukee, Norfolk and Washington, D.C.

Gun Goes Off In City Elementary School (BSUN)

By Sara Neufeld And Annie Linskey

The Baltimore Sun, October 13, 2006

A day after a stabbing in a Northwest Baltimore middle school, an 8-year-old boy in a nearby third-grade classroom discharged a loaded revolver Thursday, prompting some community leaders to call for the installation of metal detectors in city schools.

The city's school police chief said he would support such a preventive measure, even in elementary schools but said the move might be impractical.

Though no one was hurt in Thursday's incident at Grove Park Elementary, the events of the two days left parents frightened and distraught, and raised questions about whether the city school system is doing enough to keep children safe.

"It is disheartening," said School Police Chief Antonio Williams. "There is no good reason for an 8-year-old to have a gun."

While Baltimore schools do not have metal detectors, other big-city school systems sometimes use them in middle and high schools, said Kenneth Trump, president of a Cleveland-based school safety consulting firm. But he knew of no elementary schools using the devices, and he said they aren't foolproof.

"It's certainly a temptation for a knee-jerk reaction, but there are still many, many ways people can get weapons in," he said.

Thursday, an 8-year-old boy took a .22 caliber revolver to Grove Park and put it inside his desk, police said. Another boy, also 8, came over to see the gun about 10 a.m. and accidentally pulled the trigger. About 20 children were in the room at the time.

The gun and the bullet, which did not penetrate the desk, were recovered, Williams said. Both boys were taken into custody, but the boy who discharged the gun was released to a parent Thursday afternoon. The boy who took the gun was charged with one count of possessing a handgun and was being processed at the city's Department of Juvenile Services.

The boys' names were not released because they are juveniles.

Officials said they were investigating where the boy got the gun, but the principal sent home a letter imploring parents to check their children's backpacks and pockets before they come to school. The letter said the school will begin conducting periodic checks of backpacks and lockers. Administrators held an assembly to tell children not to take weapons to school.

Questions remained Thursday night about whether the substitute teacher who was supposed to be supervising the third-grade class was in the room when the gun went off. School system spokeswoman Edie House said the teacher was there and recovered the gun, but the father of a child in the room said she was not.

"The teacher was not in the classroom," said Les Moore, whose son was sitting next to the boy with the gun and saw him put it in his desk. "She came in after the shot. She must have been right outside the classroom."

Moore was angry that he learned about what happened from reporters when he came to pick up his son at the end of the school day and that police had interviewed his son without his knowledge.

"I feel like we should have been notified immediately," he said. "Especially the [parents of the] children who were in the classroom." He said he would want to be at his son's side after such a traumatic event.

Williams said state law allows police to interview children at a school without parental permission in an emergency, as long as they are not being questioned as criminal suspects.

Other parents were upset that school did not dismiss early.

"Why isn't school out?" asked Suyen Hinds, who was picking up her children. "Absolutely unbelievable. Every morning you send your children out and you pray."

A handful of parents who learned of the incident before school dismissed at 2:30 p.m. rushed over to get their children.

DOJ_NMG_0080374

House said the boy who took the gun would likely be placed on long-term suspension. She said taking a gun to school is normally cause for expulsion, but the decision is up to schools Chief Executive Officer Charlene Cooper Boston.

Older students who are expelled are often placed in alternative schools, but the city doesn't have an alternative school for such young children. House said home-schooling could be an option.

News of the shooting came as a shock at Grove Park, a red brick school in a neighborhood off West Northern Parkway, in the 5500 block of Kennison Ave. The school, which enrolls about 340 pupils in pre-kindergarten through fifth grade, has seen its test scores rise steadily in recent years. This spring, 85 percent of fourth-graders passed the state reading test, compared with 65 percent citywide. <

Parents spoke highly of the education Grove Park provides, and officials say it has had no previous incidents of significant violence.

"We're very confident it is an isolated event," Williams said.

On Wednesday, a 13-year-old girl at Pimlico Middle School -- a mile and a half from Grove Park -- was arrested and charged with stabbing a 14-year-old classmate in the arm with a 10-inch kitchen knife.

In the wake of the two incidents, some parents and community leaders called for the school system to consider installing metal detectors.

"Weapons are easily accessed by these kids, and it's becoming more and more dangerous," said Larry Gaines, a longtime parent advocate. "The kids are quicker to stab and shoot. Metal detectors are something that need to be seriously considered."

Gaines said the city also needs more positive recreational opportunities for children.

Williams said he has long supported metal detectors in schools. "Could every school use one? If you look at is as a preventive measure, then yeah," he said. But he added that it might not be realistic to install metal detectors everywhere, calling the matter "up for discussion."

Some safety measures in Baltimore's middle and high schools do not extend to elementary schools. Most school police officers are assigned to middle and high schools. The school police force searches students for weapons several times a year but rarely at elementary schools.

Last month, officers found a gun during a spot check for weapons outside Frederick Douglass High School, Williams said.

School police found three guns during the 2005-2006 academic year, one at a middle school and two at high schools. Two were found in 2004-2005, both in high schools. None of them was fired.

Trump, the consultant, said the most effective way to limit weapons in schools is for teachers and other school staff to develop close relationships with children.

"The No. 1 way we find out about weapons in schools is when students tell an adult they trust," he said, adding that weapons routinely find their way into prisons, which have metal detectors.

While it is rare nationally for children to bring guns to elementary schools, Trump said he hears of a few cases every year, generally when adult relatives have left the weapons in accessible places.

In January, a 7-year-old girl was shot in the arm at her Germantown day care by an 8-year-old boy who brought his father's handgun from home. The boy's father was criminally charged.

"People ask if we should put metal detectors in schools," Trump said. "I often say we should put them on the sides of the home before the kids leave for school because that's where the guns tend to come from."

Boy, 12, Charged Over Made-Up Story Of Gun Threat (WP)

By Lori Aratani

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

Police filed charges yesterday against a 12-year-old Montgomery County boy whose false claim that a man with a gun had threatened violence against schools prompted officials to tighten security at 13 campuses Wednesday.

The boy will be charged as a juvenile with disturbing school operations, Montgomery police said. Because of his age, the seventh-grader was not named in charging documents.

The boy's story, which he told to a bus driver early Wednesday, prompted officials to take the unusual step of declaring security alerts and locking the doors at schools in northwestern Montgomery. It alarmed a community that has vivid memories of the 2002 sniper attacks and has been made uneasy recently by school shootings in Pennsylvania, Colorado and Wisconsin.

The boy later admitted that he made up the story, authorities said.

The incident has caused county school officials to rethink procedures for notifying parents about security alerts. Some parents criticized the school system for doing little to inform them about Wednesday's incident.

Some parents said they received automated phone calls about the day-long Code Blue alert, during which officials locked doors and kept student inside. But others said the only information they received was from the media.

Dawn Nichol, 38, whose daughter Gailann is a first-grader at Germantown Elementary, said she spent the day worrying about her daughter. "I was freaking out," she said. "I was very tempted to come pick her up."

Tom Brennan, a Germantown parent, said that although he gets a daily e-mail with morning announcements from one son's school, it wasn't until about 6:45 p.m. that he received information about the Code Blue. The call, from the principal at Roberto W. Clemente Middle School, explained that there had been an alert, that the situation had been resolved and that the children were safe.

"For the communication situation to be as awful as it was is wrong," he said.

School system spokesman Brian Edwards said there was room for improvement.

School officials routinely send letters home after a Code Blue, he said, but it is left to individual schools to determine whether to do more to reach parents.

Parents are informed by phone in the event of a Code Red alert, which is more serious and during which students are kept in their classrooms or other secured areas and are not allowed to go near doors or windows.

Officials will consider whether a similar procedure or some other method of communicating with parents should be adopted for Code Blue alerts, Edwards said.

Amish Schoolhouse Is Razed (NYT)

By Sean D. Hamill

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

The one-room schoolhouse where 10 girls were shot last week, built by hand three decades ago by the Amish it served, was demolished by heavy machinery yesterday in the hope of easing the community's pain.

The Amish community had debated whether to tear down the West Nickel Mines Amish School, in Lancaster County, Pa., ever since the horror unfolded there on Oct. 2, when five of the girls were fatally wounded by Charles C. Roberts IV and the five others received serious wounds that have kept them hospitalized.

In addition to concern for the victims' families, those considering the school's fate "realized it could be very traumatic for the children, that it might just be too hard for the children who were in there to go back," said Herman Bontrager, a businessman who is a friend of some Amish church leaders in the area.

The experience of last weekend, when tourists and well-wishers clogged roads trying to get a glimpse of the schoolhouse, made the decision all the easier. "This past Sunday it was just bumper-to-bumper out there," said David Nissley, a Mennonite pastor. "They'd like to reduce the tourism it creates."

So in the darkness early yesterday morning, out of the glare of media attention, the school was torn down. Mr. Nissley volunteered his landscaping company to reseed the site with various grasses and clover to return it to pastureland.

The Amish school district board now has to decide when and where it will build a new school. For the time being, the district's 16 remaining students are attending classes in a nearby garage.

Offers of volunteer labor to help build a school have poured into the community, but Mr. Bontrager said he doubted that the Amish, known for their insularity and self-reliance, would accept.

"I think it would be pretty important for them to do it themselves," he said.

Ex-guard Is Guilty In Detainee's Death (BSUN)

By Brent Jones

The Baltimore Sun, October 13, 2006

A former correctional officer was convicted Thursday of second-degree murder in a stomping death at the city jail, a crime so brutal that eight guards were fired for lying, and a case so chaotic that two guards were cleared of criminal wrongdoing after defense attorneys alleged a cover-up hatched by their colleagues.

Dameon C. Woods' murder conviction -- a rarity for a public safety officer -- stands as a testament to the brutality of the melee that led to Raymond K. Smoot's May 2005 death and to the problems engulfing the state-run Central Booking and Intake Center.

Woods, 34, was convicted of murder with a depraved heart, or extreme disregard for human life, and two counts of assault, and could face up to 30 years in prison. Circuit Court Judge John M. Glynn set sentencing for Dec. 12.

Glynn revoked Woods' bail, and Woods was taken away with his feet and hands shackled.

James L. Hatcher, a co-defendant in the three-week trial, was found innocent on all charges. Glynn threw out charges against the third officer, Nathan D. Colbert, before the case went to the jury. Both officers have been fired.

Woods and Hatcher cried as the verdicts were read, and Glynn, in an unusual move, held the jurors as the courtroom cleared. Jurors, who deliberated for five days, did not return phone calls seeking comment.

Standing near the steps of the Clarence M. Mitchell Courthouse, Hatcher thanked God for his exoneration and then expressed sorrow for the victim. "My heart goes out to the Smoot family," Hatcher said. "It's just a tragedy."

Despite convicting only one person in an attack that a forensics expert testified had to have been done by multiple people, prosecutors said they were pleased with the verdict.

Assistant State's Attorney Mark Cohen said prosecutors do not plan to seek charges against other correctional officers, some of whom were found during the trial to have had possible blood and human tissue of Smoot on their boots. "We understand the jury's verdict, and we can accept it," Cohen said. "We feel we've done as much as we can do with this homicide. We got the main person involved, and that was Mr. Woods."

State's Attorney Patricia C. Jessamy stood next to Cohen outside the courtroom, where she congratulated her workers and said she will continue to fight for abused detainees.

"This highlights the challenge we all face," she said. "This man, an inmate at Central Booking, did not deserve this. We want to make sure the prisoners are safe."

Correctional officers convicted in the death of a detainee are rare.

Stephen Z. Meehan, principal counsel with the Prisoner Rights Information System of Maryland for 10 years, said he cannot remember a single time when a state correctional officer was convicted in an inmate's death.

"It's hard enough to prove a civil case," he said. "The moons have to line up."

But he called Smoot's death "the most horrendous case of physical abuse" in a prison and said the jury must have seen that "something went really bad in there. This was total brutality."

Meehan said the only case comparable to Smoot's -- "but not nearly as brutal" -- was the April 2004 death of a Western Maryland prisoner.

Months later, an Allegany County grand jury decided not to indict any correctional officers in what the medical examiner ruled was the homicide of prisoner Ifeanyi A. Iko. Guards had sprayed him with an irritant and then covered him with a face mask, asphyxiating him.

Woods' attorney, Margaret Mead, said she will file a motion for a new trial, calling the verdict the worst miscarriage of justice she has seen in her 16 years of practice.

Mead argued that her client was set up by a clique of correctional officers who socialized regularly and were involved in the attack on Smoot, who was 51. The officers, some of whom were fired the day after the attack, testified to having an unauthorized meeting later, where Mead says the plan to finger her client was hatched.

There was no blood or DNA evidence linking Woods or any of the defendants to the attack.

"He is just devastated," Mead said. "His entire family is devastated."

Mead said the jury's decision will have negative effects on an officer's ability to subdue an inmate. She said officers might hesitate to respond to assistance calls.

"Every correctional officer is going to think, 'Oh, my God, if stuff gets out of hand, I'm going to get blamed for it.' If this verdict stands, how can any correctional officers feel safe in an institution?" Mead asked.

Prosecutors faced a number of hurdles in this case, including uncooperative former officers who served as witnesses. The prosecution called several officers who failed to identify anyone responsible for Smoot's death in the aftermath of the killing, then backtracked days later and told varying stories on the witness stand.

In 10 days of testimony, 27 witnesses took the stand, and seven placed Woods inside the cell, stomping Smoot. Four of those seven claimed Hatcher was part of the attack. None of the witnesses testified to seeing Colbert stomp or punch Smoot.

James Smoot, the brother of the victim, said he was glad one person was convicted but felt many more were involved in the attack. Smoot's family has filed a civil lawsuit against the state-run facility, where people arrested by police are processed before receiving bail hearings.

Smoot had been arrested and charged with failing to appear in court on a theft charge. The night he was killed, Smoot had an argument with three correctional officers. Prosecutors allege Smoot struck one of the officers in the face, knocking off his glasses and prompting a call for assistance.

As many as 30 officers flooded the outside area near Smoot's cell. Eight officers were fired the next day for lying to the warden and commissioner of the court.

"I know it's more than one. They gave us the one out of the eight," James Smoot said. "That's the best they can do? I'm still upset. The [correctional officers] that lied, they're just as guilty as he is."

One of Raymond Smoot's daughters and other family members attended the hearing.

Hatcher, walking to his lawyer's office after the verdict, heard taunts from Smoot supporters, with one person yelling, "You got away this time."

DOJ_NMG_0080377

"I was shocked to hear the reaction of some of those folks," Hatcher's lawyer, Andrew I. Alperstein, said. "I know it was painful for them, but Mr. Hatcher did not do it."

Smoot's death came at a time when Central Booking was under fire for its overcrowding and mishandling of cases.

As many as 84 detainees a day were being held more than 24 hours without seeing a judge or a court commissioner.

The public defender's office had brought a suit against the facility but dropped the case earlier this year. In Smoot's pod during the time of his killing, about 40 detainees were sleeping outside of cells. "It was a look into a world we normally do not get to see," Alperstein said.

Will Rezko Show In Court? (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen And Matt O'Connor

Chicago Tribune, October 13, 2006

Indicted businessman and political fundraiser Antoin "Tony" Rezko has a date in court Friday, and officials say he could be considered a fugitive if he doesn't show up.

Rezko is slated to appear for the first of two scheduled arraignments in his fraud cases at 10 a.m. on the 25th floor of the Dirksen U.S. Courthouse. If he isn't present and his lawyer has no reasonable explanation for his absence, authorities said they would begin an active hunt for Rezko, who is believed to have been in the Middle East for several weeks.

Nobody answered the door at Rezko's Wilmette home Thursday night, although a car was in the driveway and a light was on in the house.

Rezko is set to appear first before U.S. District Judge James B. Zagel to answer to fraud charges stemming from the allegedly bogus sale of Rezko's pizza restaurants.

At 1:30 p.m., he is to appear before U.S. District Judge Amy St. Eve to be arraigned on charges of fraud involving allegations he used his relationships with high-ranking Illinois officials to try to extort millions of dollars from firms seeking to do business with the state.

Rezko, a member of Gov. Rod Blagojevich's inner circle and one of his chief fundraisers, is accused of trying to force illegal payments from investment firms that were seeking business with the Teachers' Retirement System. Rezko allegedly used the position of his co-defendant, Stuart Levine, to pressure the firms.

Levine, once a member of two state boards, is a cooperating witness for the government.

Rezko's whereabouts have been a concern for federal investigators for weeks as the cases against him progressed. He was indicted under seal Oct. 5, and federal prosecutors moved to unseal the documents Wednesday as a federal warrant for his arrest was issued.

"The government moved to seal the indictment based on information that Rezko was then outside the United States, but had plans to return soon to the United States from abroad," the government's motions to unseal the indictment in both cases reads. "That information has not proved accurate, and the government has no current information as to whether or when Rezko intends to return to the United States."

Authorities said it is possible Rezko's attorney, Joseph J. Duffy, will appear Friday and ask both judges for more time to produce his client.

Duffy could not be reached for comment Thursday. But he had previously issued a statement saying his client is innocent and that he is traveling outside the country.

"For decades, Mr. Rezko has frequently traveled abroad for business purposes," the statement read.

The federal warrant for Rezko's arrest was issued by St. Eve, and FBI officials said information on him has been entered into law-enforcement databases. If he comes in contact with customs agents overseas or police inside the U.S., he could be detained at any time, authorities said.

If Rezko is considered to be fleeing prosecution, the FBI will handle the warrant itself in cooperation with law enforcement around the globe, FBI spokesman Tom Simon said Thursday.

The FBI typically handles its own warrants in such cases, Simon said, and has the international reach and resources to attempt to track someone overseas.

"It makes sense for us to keep these warrants and use what we have learned during an investigation to help locate the person," he said.

Authorities in recent days have been fielding rumors and hints about Rezko's whereabouts. Speculation includes that he already is back in Chicago, and also that he might be holed up in Jordan, Syria or Qatar, they said.

U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald has said Rezko's location won't matter until his scheduled court appearances. Fitzgerald said his office expects Rezko to answer the court's call as a U.S. citizen.

"I think it's fair to say he's been traveling abroad at times," Fitzgerald told reporters Wednesday. "He was not under indictment when he was traveling abroad, and we'll wait to see what happens. We fully expect to see him in court.

"If he appears on his own volition, great," Fitzgerald said. "If he doesn't, we'll do what we always do when people become fugitives."

New legal troubles emerged for Rezko Thursday in Cook County Circuit Court.

Rezko was sued for more than $10 million by a Chicago man who says he helped Rezko secure a $1 million loan from Broadway Bank, whose vice president is Democratic state treasurer candidate Alexi Giannoulias.

Semir D. Sirazi, a Chicago businessman and former executive of U.S. Robotics, filed suit alleging Rezko defaulted on the loan he needed to help operate his restaurant empire.

Sirazi put up a $1 million certificate of deposit as collateral for the Rezko loan. Rezko pledged that if he defaulted, he and his business partner would give Sirazi a piece of the company, Rezko Concessions. They also agreed to pay Sirazi fees of $1 million per year plus interest until the loan was satisfied, the suit alleges.

Sirazi seeks the company stock and more than $10 million in accrued fees, interest and attorneys' fees.

Blagojevich Not Only Politician To Benefit From Rezko (AP)

By John O'connor

AP, October 13, 2006

SPRINGFIELD, Ill. - While Gov. Rod Blagojevich is the biggest beneficiary of Antoin "Tony" Rezko's largesse, he is not the only politician to have taken contributions from the political insider who is under federal indictment.

Rezko is linked to $47,500 in donations to Lt. Gov. Patrick Quinn, $33,000 in contributions to Attorney General Lisa Madigan, and $20,000 to Comptroller Dan Hynes, all Democrats, according to state records.

In all, Rezko, his companies and businesses that share the same address have contributed more than $423,000 to state political campaigns, including a few Republicans, in the past decade.

Rezko also has aided federal campaigns, giving more than $62,000 since 1997, according to the Federal Election Commission. Democratic U.S. Sen. Barack Obama received $11,500, on top of $8,500 from Rezko when he was a state senator.

Rezko, 51, was charged Wednesday with taking part in an elaborate scheme to get millions of dollars from companies wanting to do business with the state Teachers' Retirement System.

Blagojevich, who has not been accused of any wrongdoing, announced Wednesday that he would donate Rezko's political contributions to charity.

Up for re-election Nov. 7, Blagojevich estimated Rezko's generosity at $60,000 to $70,000. But a review of state election records shows that Rezko and companies he's involved with have contributed $91,450 to the Chicago Democrat.

Other politicians faced calls Thursday for them to return money related to the federal indictment. The indictment mentions, but does not identify, several people that prosecutors believe had a role in the kickback scheme.

Republican treasurer candidate Christine Radogno said Democratic opponent Alexi Giannoulias should return $14,000 received from Michael Winter. She cited a newspaper report identifying him as one of the unnamed figures.

Republican congressional candidate Peter Roskam, citing the same report, called on Democrat Tammy Duckworth to return $1,000 from Myron Cherry.

Prominent Trio Running Legal Defense Fund For Fumo Aides (SCCD)

By Maryclaire Dale

The State College Centre Daily, October 13, 2006

PHILADELPHIA - Three prominent Philadelphians are running a legal defense fund for Senate aides indicted in an extortion probe centering on state Sen. Vincent Fumo.

A federal judge on Thursday questioned the arrangement and whether the defendants - who worked in Fumo's offices for years - could look out for their own best interests.

"We are assuming that the senator is heavily involved in that trust fund" since the donors' names remain secret, U.S. District Judge William H. Yohn Jr. told defendant Leonard Luchko.

"It could be in your interest to pursue a plea agreement that may be adverse to the people paying your legal fees through this trust fund," Yohn warned him.

Luchko, a 50-year-old computer technician, insisted that he was satisfied with the arrangement.

"I trust Mr. Schwartzman explicitly, and I'm my own man," Luchko testified at the pretrial hearing.

DOJ_NMG_0080379

Luchko is being defended by prominent criminal defense lawyer James Schwartzman, who said in court papers that he had cut his usual $425-an-hour fee to $200 an hour during the pre-indictment period when taxpayers, under Senate rules, picked up the tab.

Schwartzman said he has not yet taken any money from the legal-defense fund and did not know the names of any donors.

But he disclosed that the trustees are J. Whyatt Mondesire, the local chapter president of the NAACP; lawyer Rhonda Resnick Cohen, who is married to Comcast executive and former mayoral aide David Cohen; and former U.S. Attorney Robert Curran, now a lawyer in Delaware County.

"Why do two lowly computer technicians have a legal defense fund created by three prominent Philadelphians?" Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Zauzmer asked. "I think it raises all sorts of legal pitfalls."

Brian McMonagle, who represents co-defendant Mark C. Eister, said Thursday that he would seek to be paid as a court-appointed lawyer, since his client is currently unemployed.

Although legal defense funds have been used by former President Bill Clinton and others, the Luchko case may present novel questions about their use by underlings who are not the chief target of an investigation.

Yohn asked for legal briefs on the issue before moving forward with the case, which is tentatively set for trial in January.

The grand jury is expected to finish its work before then. The FBI has been investigating whether Fumo extorted millions in corporate donations for a South Philadelphia nonprofit staffed by some of his former employees.

Luchko, of Collingdale, and Eister, 36, of Camp Hill, are charged with obstructing the investigation by deleting years worth of e-mail about Fumo's ties to the Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods.

Defense lawyers say their clients have offered to cooperate but want immunity. Prosecutors say they won't offer immunity unless they know what the men have to say.

None of the legal fund trustees immediately returned messages left after business Thursday.

Fund Defends Technician In Fumo Probe (PHI)

By John Shiffman And Craig R. Mccoy

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 13, 2006

Three prominent Philadelphians are leading a legal defense fund for a once-obscure computer technician caught up in the FBI's investigation of State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo.

The defense fund has three trustees: J. Whyatt Mondesire, head of the local NAACP; former U.S. Attorney Robert E.J. Curran; and lawyer Rhonda Cohen, wife of Comcast executive and politically connected Democrat David L. Cohen, a close friend of Fumo's.

Mondesire said in an interview that Fumo allies had asked him to serve and that Fumo personally thanked him later.

The trustees' names were disclosed yesterday during a federal court hearing for the technician, Leonard P. Luchko, who is charged with deleting e-mails to thwart the FBI's investigation of Fumo.

Prosecutors said they found it odd that a onetime midlevel state employee - whom authorities acknowledge they have pressured to testify against Fumo - suddenly has such powerful friends.

"That has to raise the question of why this is happening and who aims to benefit," Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Zauzmer said.

Luchko's lawyer, James Schwartzman, said there was no conflict of interest, nor was there anything unusual in the arrangement.

"It's done all the time in Washington and other places," Schwartzman said.

Luchko took the stand yesterday, as U.S. District Judge William Yohn Jr. queried him generally about the defense fund.

Luchko said he trusted Schwartzman completely, and added: "I am my own man."

In May, Luchko and computer technician Mark Eister, who also worked for Fumo, were charged with obstruction of justice for allegedly deleting e-mails to thwart the FBI's probe.

Eister's lawyer will not be paid by the legal defense fund. Because he is unemployed, Eister is eligible to have his legal fees paid by the government, and his lawyer, Brian McMonagle, said that was his preference.

Even before the two were indicted, prosecutors had pushed Luchko and Eister to cooperate with investigators. They've refused.

Yesterday, as the lawyers addressed the question of whether the two might ultimately change their minds, Luchko sat in the front row of the gallery, vigorously shaking his head, signaling an emphatic "No."

Among the those who have benefited from legal defense funds are former President Bill Clinton, former U.S. Sen. Robert Torricelli, former U.S. House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, and Lewis "Scooter" Libby, former chief of staff to Vice President Cheney.

Such funds are not unprecedented in Pennsylvania. One was established to assist former State Sen. Joseph Loeper before his conviction on corruption charges.

In Pennsylvania, such funds go unregulated. In Washington, rules of the U.S. House and Senate require making contributors' names public.

Barry Kauffman, executive director of Common Cause of Pennsylvania, urged the Luchko legal defense fund to disclose who was giving it money.

"There certainly should be full disclosures, if not limits," Kauffman said. "I think it's certainly in the public interest to do this."

Ralph Teti, the Philadelphia lawyer who is counsel to the fund, said it was better to keep the donors secret. That way, he said, neither Luchko nor his lawyer would know who was giving.

Teti, an election-law expert who has helped Fumo in various legal disputes over the years, said the fund could help other Senate staffers if they needed legal assistance. The Luchko defense fund will not accept money from political-action committees, he added.

Since 2003, the FBI and IRS have been investigating whether Fumo used a South Philadelphia charity, Citizens Alliance for Better Neighborhoods, for personal or political advantage.

According to court filings, the probe is focused on multimillion-dollar donations to the nonprofit by Peco Energy Co., the charity's real estate deals, and Citizens Alliance's alleged payments for political polls.

Prosecutors have said they intended to decide by Christmas whether Fumo or others would be charged.

Fumo has said that he did nothing wrong and that the case was politically inspired. A spokeswoman yesterday said the senator was not available for comment.

A third computer technician, Donald Wilson, was granted immunity and he told the grand jury that he and Luchko "systematically destroyed" e-mails when they learned of the FBI probe, officials said. Wilson also provided the FBI with passwords that helped agents read Fumo's encrypted e-mail, officials said.

Only one of the Luchko defense fund's three trustees could be reached last night.

Mondesire, who also publishes the Philadelphia Sun, said people close to the senator had approached him about helping lead the fund. He declined to name those who contacted him.

"The request came from people who were associated with Mr. Fumo," Mondesire said. "He's been very supportive of the NAACP for many, many years."

Mondesire said the fund would make sure the aide got a strong defense in court, "which is every American's right."

When a reporter asked who had given to the fund, Mondesire told him he would answer no more questions and hung up.

In early 2004, Fumo pledged $100,000 to the local NAACP to help it host a national convention here that summer. At the time, Mondesire said it was the largest donation he had received since becoming president of the organization in 1997.

Philly Bigwigs Set Fund (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 13, 2006

Three prominent Philadelphians were recruited to serve as trustees for a legal defense fund set up to pay the legal expenses of two computer technicians charged with trying to obstruct a federal investigation of State Sen. Vince Fumo.

The revelation came during a court hearing yesterday to investigate whether or not Fumo - or people close to him - are involved in raising money for the two technicians' defense, creating a conflict of interest.

Those identified as the fund's trustees were J. Whyatt Mondesire, Rhonda Cohen and Robert E. J. Curran.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Bob Zauzmer told U.S. Senior District Judge William H. Yohn, Jr. the revelations of the trustees' names was full of potential pitfalls.

"Two computer employees have a legal defense fund set up on their behalf by these prominent individuals and that has to raise the question immediately as to why it is this is happening and who aims to benefit from this," Zauzmer said.

Mondesire is the head of the local NAACP. Cohen is a lawyer and wife of David L. Cohen, former top aide to then-Mayor Rendell and now a top executive at Comcast. Curran is a former U.S. attorney.

The counsel for the fund is prominent labor lawyer Ralph J. Teti.

One issue that was not resolved in yesterday's court proceeding was how the fund got started, who's raising money for it and who's contributing to it.

"Some of the people associated with Senator Fumo's office asked me to do it and I said yes," Mondesire said, adding that Fumo had been a good supporter of the NAACP. He refused to answer any other questions about the fund.

Efforts to reach Cohen, Curran and Teti were unsuccessful.

Federal prosecutors were not even aware of the legal defense fund's existence until James C. Schwartzman, a lawyer for indicted computer aide Leonard Luchko, acknowledged its existence in a court filing last month.

Yohn was also intrigued about the fund. For example, he asked who was raising money for the fund and who the contributors were.

Schwartzman and Brian McMonagle, the lawyer for Mark Eister, the other computer technician charged in the case, said they did not know details about the fund.

Both said they had not submitted any bills or received any payments from the fund.

McMonagle subsequently told Yohn he wanted nothing to do with the fund.

He asked Yohn to make him a court-appointed lawyer paid by the government. Yohn said he would grant the request.

Schwartzman said he was not inclined to follow McMonagle's lead because he saw nothing "inappropriate" about the fund.

Luchko and Eister pleaded not guilty to the charges and both waived their rights yesterday to attack any verdict based on conflicts involving their lawyers.

Zauzmer said a problem for the courts is they have to weigh not just actual conflicts but the potential for conflicts.

Yohn ordered prosecutors and Schwartzman to file legal briefs within the next two weeks on court decisions regarding legal defense funds bankrolled by third parties that posed actual or potential conflicts of interest with those for whom the funds were set up.

Detroit Officer Is Accused Of Accepting Cash (DEN)

Detroit News, October 13, 2006

FBI, Internal Affairs probe charges that he took $12K from victim's family; he is suspended.

DETROIT -- A police officer assigned to the Detroit Homicide Section was suspended Wednesday as the FBI and Internal Affairs officers investigate an allegation of improper conduct by the officer with the family of a murder victim.

Department spokesman James Tate on Thursday would only confirm that Lance Newman, a 12-year veteran, was suspended with pay. The FBI declined to discuss details of the investigation.

Police sources said the allegation against Newman is that he took $12,000 from the Ann Arbor family of Joe Wagner, a 21-year-old who was stabbed to death at a church festival in southwest Detroit last June.

Newman was in charge of the investigation that resulted in the arrest of two gang members who were convicted of first-degree murder in August.

First-Degree Murder For Actress's Killer (NYT)

By Anemona Hartocollis

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

The leader of a band of youthful muggers was convicted yesterday of murdering an actress and playwright after she challenged him during a robbery on the Lower East Side last year.

Rudy Fleming, now 21, was convicted of fatally shooting Nicole duFresne, 28, after she resisted the robbery by defiantly shouting, "What are you going to do, shoot us?"

As the jury in State Supreme Court in Manhattan declared Mr. Fleming guilty on all nine counts against him, including first-degree murder, robbery and criminal possession of a weapon, Ms. duFresne's mother gasped, and her father covered his face with a handkerchief and cried.

They declined to speak to reporters afterward, but asked the prosecutor, Robert Hettleman, to distribute a written statement in which they defended their daughter's actions on the night she died.

They noted that she stood up to Mr. Fleming only after he pistol-whipped her fiancé and yanked away her best friend's purse.

"She confronted the man with the gun, pleading for the confrontation to end," the statement, signed by Ms. duFresne's mother, father and brother, said.

"The response to her request was a bullet to her heart. If a man had acted in the same manner, he may have been proclaimed a hero. Nicole died that night defending those she loved. She is our hero."

The family conceded that they wished she had acted differently, because she might still be alive. "But," they said, "she was true to who she was — a brave woman in every aspect of life, sometimes afraid but always brave."

By finding Mr. Fleming guilty of first-degree murder, the jury categorically rejected the defense contention that his .357 Magnum discharged accidentally, perhaps as he slipped in mounds of plowed snow when Ms. duFresne confronted him. His lawyer, Anthony Ricco, provided no corroboration, either through testimony or physical evidence, for this theory. Mr. Fleming faces a minimum of 20 years to life in prison and a maximum of life without parole.

The jurors declined to comment after the verdict, heeding the advice of the trial judge, Justice Daniel P. Fitzgerald, who cautioned them against speaking to reporters, implying that talking about their deliberations could lead to an overturning of the verdict.

The jury never saw Mr. Fleming, who chose not to attend his own trial. His lawyers said provisions had been made for him to monitor the proceedings in another room. In pretrial hearings, Mr. Fleming tried in vain to convince the judge that he was hallucinating about giant marshmallows and was mentally incompetent.

The physical evidence against him was substantial. The police recovered the murder weapon, a wood-handled .357 Magnum with one bullet missing and five still in the chambers, hidden under a bed in the apartment where he had been staying. They also found the scarf and sweatpants he was wearing that night, which witnesses had described.

Videotapes taken by store security cameras showed him and six friends and accomplices walking in the vicinity of Rivington and Clinton Streets, where Ms. duFresne was shot, around the time of the murder.

Friends have described Ms. duFresne, who was from Wayzata, Minn., as a gutsy, ambitious woman who had shown strength and defiance in the face of adversity in the past. She turned her rape in a parking lot while she was at Emerson College in Boston into the inspiration for a play, "Burning Cage," and a psychological thriller, "Matter." She produced her play in Seattle before moving in 2002 to New York, where she was volunteering at LAByrinth Theater Company while bartending to pay her bills.

Ms. duFresne, her fiancé, Jeffrey Sparks, and two friends, Mary Jane Gibson and Scott Nath, were on the way home from a night of drinking and playing pinball at Max Fish, a nightclub on Ludlow Street, about 3 a.m. on Jan. 27, 2005, when they were confronted by a group of young people, with Mr. Fleming in the lead, according to testimony at the trial.

Mr. Fleming muttered a slurred demand for money, struck Mr. Sparks in the eye with a gun, leaving him momentarily dazed, then yanked away Ms. Gibson's purse, throwing it to two accomplices, according to the testimony.

Enraged by the attacks, according to the testimony, Ms. duFresne turned on Mr. Fleming, shouting, "What are you going to do, shoot us?" and he reacted by shooting her once in the chest from a distance of less than an arm's length.

Mr. Fleming had been convicted of possessing a semiautomatic handgun in 2002, and spent two years in prison, though the judge did not allow the jury to hear about that. He was on parole at the time of the murder.

Liveliest D.C. Neighborhoods Also Jumping With Robberies (WP)

By Allison Klein And Dan Keating

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

Some of Washington's most vibrant neighborhoods, destinations for suburbanites, barhoppers and urban professionals, share a lesser-known distinction: They have the highest concentrations of holdups in the city.

Criminals are striking in areas that boast of dynamic nightlife, newly minted condominiums and restaurant grand openings.

The Washington Post analyzed years of police statistics, focusing sharply on crimes this year, and found the biggest share of robberies happening at night and on sidewalks in neighborhoods north of downtown, including Adams Morgan, Mount Pleasant, Columbia Heights and the U Street corridor.

Across the city, an average of 11 robberies take place each day, the analysis shows. But on Friday and Saturday nights, the city can register as many as five an hour.

Guns are involved in at least one-third of the cases. About the same percentage end with victims being beaten or slammed to the ground -- even knocked unconscious, in some cases. The other robberies can be just as chilling, involving such weapons as knives as well as sudden grabs of purses, backpacks and money.

The statistical analysis encompassed thousands of cases, including about 2,900 this year alone. The Post also examined hundreds of robbery reports and interviewed victims, police, residents and community activists.

Police said that at least 14 homicides this year stemmed from robberies, including the slaying of a British activist in Georgetown. The number of robberies jumped last year and was rising again this summer when D.C. police stepped up patrols and began putting surveillance cameras in neighborhoods. It has tapered off since the city spent about $10 million on overtime for extra police coverage. But overtime funds are running dry, raising concerns that more trouble is ahead.

Robberies have spiked in recent years in the Washington region and many other parts of the country, as the number of juvenile offenders and the availability of guns grows, police officials said. Robberies also are becoming the crime of choice for some former drug dealers, who have switched to stickups after police crackdowns on narcotics trafficking, the officials said.

Police in Alexandria and Fairfax and Montgomery counties also are dealing with more robbery cases. In Prince George's County, the total rose sharply last year but has dipped this year.

There are more robberies per capita in the District than in New York, Los Angeles and other large cities. And robbers are traveling farther from home to strike, according to police officials. During the first six months of the year, about 40 percent of juveniles arrested in robberies and other crimes in neighborhoods just north of downtown did not live there, police said.

The city's robbery core is in the 3rd Police District, which includes the neighborhoods of Columbia Heights, Adams Morgan, Mount Pleasant, Dupont Circle and Logan Circle. It is the city's smallest, densest police district and accounts for almost 30 percent of robberies.

"It's always been a major problem," said D.C. Council member Jim Graham (D-Ward 1), whose constituents complain daily about the crimes. "But it wasn't anywhere near as serious as it is today."

Yasmin Wei, 19, can attest to that. One night recently, a man knocked her to the ground as she was returning to her Columbia Heights apartment after an art class. He slammed his foot sharply into her ribs and yanked fiercely at her bag, dragging her along the sidewalk. Finally, he jerked the bag free and ran off. Wei had a deep gash on her elbow and a bruise the size of a grapefruit on her hip.

"It was right under a streetlight," said Wei, who works as a waitress in Adams Morgan. "And it was only 9:30."

Wei said the attack was so terrifying that she no longer feels comfortable in the neighborhood and has moved in with her parents. "I don't even want to bike there after 8 p.m.," she said.

Robbers choose streets where people are likely to have cash, bank cards and cellphones. They prey on those who appear isolated, and the less lighting, the better. Dozens of police reports describe how robbers sneak up, grab a purse or bag, and flee -- the snatch-and-run. Other victims tell of robbers approaching them at gunpoint with such lines as "Give it up" and "You know what time it is."

A 19-year-old food vendor, held up while walking home from RFK Stadium, remembers exactly what the gunman told him: "I don't want no drama." The robber ran off with the man's wallet, containing two $20 bills.Resistance Is Risky

Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey said he worries about the potential for lethal violence. "It can quickly escalate to a shooting or homicide if the victim resists or if the robber is jumpy," he said.

The chief declared a crime emergency in July, and since then, the number of robberies has tapered off and is running about the same as last year. Preliminary statistics show that there were 2,898 robberies in the city as of Sept. 30.

The situation is worse than it was two years ago but much better than in the 1980s and early 1990s, when the city was averaging almost 20 robberies a day. That's little comfort to residents. As Ramsey put it, "Robbery is a good indicator of violence on our neighborhood streets," and it "provokes a great deal of fear."

Said council member Adrian M. Fenty (D-Ward 4), who likely will succeed Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D) next year: "Nothing is of greater concern to residents, and nothing makes them think twice about living in their neighborhoods more than if they don't feel safe walking around."

Police warn that trying to resist a robber is risky -- as one victim recently learned. He was stopped in the 1400 block of Morris Road SE by a robber who jabbed a gun into his side. The gun went off after the victim slapped the robber's hand. The victim, 20, was shot in the thigh.

Drugs and robberies are intertwined. Last week, Ramise Cannon was sentenced to a six-year prison term after pleading guilty to committing robberies at an ATM in Southwest Washington and on a busy street in Southeast, crimes that netted him a total of $110. Cannon, 18, told the judge that he needed help for a drug problem -- a common refrain heard at sentencing time. "I'm sorry to the victims. I know what I did was wrong," Cannon said. "I hope they have space in their hearts to forgive me."

Investigators find that robbers will go out on the streets, sometimes in groups of two or three, and rob several people in one night or on consecutive nights in the same area. The more they do, the bolder they get. They spend victims' cash quickly, run up their charge cards and use their cellphones.

More than one-third of robbery suspects arrested this year were juveniles, a pattern that Ramsey finds especially troubling. At this point last year, police had arrested 129 juveniles in robberies; this year, they've arrested 197 -- a 53 percent jump. Ramsey said the younger offenders are more apt to travel in packs and tend to get jumpy if victims resist.

Two of the five people who recently pleaded guilty to robbing tourists on the Mall were juveniles. Police said the group was bored until one suggested mugging victims there, a place long viewed as safe by residents and visitors.

The crimes on the Mall, which happened in May and July, generated a swift police response that led to the arrests. In other areas of the city, particularly the hard-hit 3rd District, D.C. police have made more than 50 arrests in robbery cases since July.

Solving robberies is not easy. Police have closed about 17 percent of their cases this year, near the national average for cities of the District's size.

DOJ_NMG_0080384

Robberies happen so fast that many victims cannot identify their assailants. "Try to focus on what he looks like," Ramsey said. "Don't focus on the clothing."

That was the mistake made by a 73-year-old woman July 4 in Southeast Washington. That afternoon, she was sitting on the porch of a house in the 700 block of 51st Street near Benning Road, reading a book, when a youth walked up, his underwear peeking out from oversize pants.

"You got the time?" he asked her. She said she didn't.

The youth grabbed her purse and ran. She'd have a hard time recognizing his face, she said, adding that she "could identify the guy's lower half better than the upper half because of his drawers showing."A Variety of Victims

Based on volume, the top location for the city's robbers is near 14th Street and Columbia Road NW, in the heart of Columbia Heights. The place jumps with activity, and luxury condos and new stores are on the way. The buzz makes it seem like a safe, lively place. But robbers pop up in the area regularly -- there is an average of five holdups a week. It comes in spurts. A few days might go by without anyone getting mugged; then two, three or four people will be held up in a single night.

Cmdr. Larry McCoy, who heads the 3rd Police District, said the victims span the economic and professional spectrum: "I've seen them all -- waitresses, lawyers, construction workers, people who work on the Hill."

Doug Bryant, 35, a technical recruiter, and his wife moved to Columbia Heights almost three years ago because it was vibrant and diverse. But after being around so much crime -- and getting attacked on the street by a young man last year -- they plan to move. "I don't like walking around here at night," he said. "And I don't mean midnight. I'm talking after 8."

In June, a construction worker walking home in Columbia Heights with $75 worth of groceries was held up by a group of juveniles. It was the third time he'd been robbed in that area.

The number of robberies there might be even higher than police statistics indicate. Adams Morgan, Mount Pleasant and Columbia Heights have a heavy number of Hispanic immigrants, and some are hesitant to report crimes.

Mariela Demetrik, 21, whose mother has a restaurant in Columbia Heights, said she has seen several robberies around Mount Pleasant and Columbia Heights.

"You'll see older Hispanic men being robbed by younger boys," said Demetrik, an art student who was born in Bolivia and raised in Washington. "You see other people get robbed, also, mostly at nighttime or early in the morning."Looking Farther Out

Some pockets east of the Anacostia River -- Fairlawn, Barry Farm, Congress Heights, Benning Terrace -- also have high robbery numbers. But they have been falling, and homicides remain the biggest problem. Neighborhoods east of the river account for 52 percent of the city's killings and 24 percent of robberies.

The 1st Police District, which includes Capitol Hill and RFK Stadium, has the second-highest percentage of muggings in the city. Its commander, Diane Groomes, said criminals are turning to robbery as open-air drug markets are shut down by police or by development.

This year, officers in her district dealt with a string of about 20 robberies called "unking" -- slang for knocking victims unconscious. Police arrested 12 juveniles.

Philip Valenziano, 21, was knocked out at 3:10 a.m. July 2, when he was leaving a Capitol Hill bar to grab a cab. He remembers three big men approaching him. Before he could get a good look at them, one of them punched him in the face.

The robbers took his wallet, which contained $27. The assault left Valenziano with a cut on his face and a broken nose. A student at Catholic University, he missed weeks of summer classes because he needed to go home to New Jersey for reconstructive surgery.

"I don't recall them giving me an opportunity to give up my stuff," Valenziano said. "I'm not dumb enough to fight back against three big dudes."

U.S. Indicts 2 Local Ex-money Managers (PHI)

By Benjamin Y. Lowe

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 13, 2006

Two former money managers were indicted yesterday on federal charges of mail and securities fraud, stemming from the collapse of their $5.2 million hedge fund.

William J. Lennon and Anthony P. Postiglione Jr. are accused of misleading investors about the fund's performance and knowingly mailing them false information about investment returns.

Christopher Furlong, an attorney for Lennon, would not comment. Postiglione, who a U.S. Attorney's Office spokesman said had yet to retain an attorney, could not be reached for comment.

According to the indictment, Lennon, 39, of Media, and Postiglione, 36, of Malvern, used the fund's assets for expenses in excess of what their management fee allowed. Though they said in statements mailed to investors that the fund had increased in value, it actually lost $2 million over roughly three years before it was shut down in July 2004.

"The fund lost money from its inception, and rather than going to investors and telling them that... they lied to them," said Joan E. Burnes, an assistant U.S. attorney in Philadelphia.

The pair face 18 counts of mail fraud and one count of securities fraud. Lennon and Postiglione's former firm, Fountainhead Asset Management L.L.C., operated out of Wayne and Center City.

Postiglione also was charged with obstructing justice.

They settled civil Securities and Exchange Commission charges in September 2005, more than a year after the SEC froze and appointed a receiver to the hedge fund, Fountainhead L.P., in July 2004.

Among the fund's 17 investors were Postiglione's father and in-laws.

An arraignment date has not been set.

2 Stockbrokers Charged With $2 Million Swindle (PHI)

By Gloria Campisi

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 13, 2006

Two local stockbrokers have been indicted on charges of swindling investors of nearly $2 million by claiming a hedge fund they founded was making money when it actually was failing.

The indictment said Anthony P. Postiglione Jr., 36, of Malvern, and William J. Lennon, 39, of Media, also milked the fund for personal use despite its losses.

The hedge fund, the Fountainhead Fund LP, operated from October, 2001 until July 30, 2004, originally out of an office in Philadelphia and Lennon's Media home and later from an office in Wayne.

The investors included prior clients of each of the stockbrokers, according to the indictment.

Seventeen in all lost $1.98 million, the indictment charged.

Some had invested more funds on the basis of falsified quarterly reports.

The two men not only played fast and loose with the quarterly reports and fund newsletters, but falsely claimed the investments being made were "protected by insurance," according to the indictment.

Postiglione also is accused of trying to mislead FBI agents investigating the fund.

Both are charged with mail and securities fraud.

According to the indictment, Postiglione and Lennon co-founded the Fountainhead Fund and created Fountainhead Asset Management (FAM) to run its business.

Postiglione and Lennon named themselves FAM's managing partners and were in fact the only employees of the management company, which had sole responsibility for investing fund money, the indictment said.

FAM was to receive an annual management fee equal to 1 percent of Fountainhead Fund assets and 20 percent of the fund's profits.

But the Fountainhead Fund "returned losses every quarter, except one," the indictment said.

Despite that, Postiglione and Lennon, as managing partners in FAM, "took weekly cash withdrawals from fund assets and paid personal expenses from fund assets, in amounts which greatly exceded one percent of the fund's assets," the indictment charged.

If convicted, Postiglione faces a maximum sentence of 385 years in prison and $4,760,000 fine, the U.S. attorney's office said.

Lennon faces up to 365 years in jail and a $4,510,000 fine.

Pa. Hedge-fund Duo Indicted (PHILBIZ)

Philadelphia Business Journal, October 13, 2006

The U.S. Attorney's Office in Philadelphia Thursday filed an indictment against two local stockbrokers and accused them of mail and securities fraud for allegedly misrepresenting the risks of a hedge fund they started and bilking investors out of almost $2 million.

Anthony P. Postiglione Jr., 36, of Malvern, Pa., and William J. Lennon, 39, of Media, Pa., were charged with 18 counts of mail fraud and one count of securities fraud. Postiglione is also charged with one count of obstruction of justice.

Federal prosecutors said Postiglione and Lennon were financial consultants who co-founded a hedge fund called the Fountainhead Fund LP in October 2001. Beginning in September 2001, they raised about $5.19 million from 17 investors. The indictment charges that the defendants misrepresented the risks of the Wayne, Pa.-based fund to early investors. After suffering a loss in the first full quarter of the fund's existence, prosecutors said, the stockbrokers created false and misleading quarterly account statements and newsletters and sent them to investors, stating that the fund was making money when, in fact, it was losing money. Prosecutors said this caused investors to contribute more money.

"The clients did not know what they were getting into," U.S. Attorney Pat Meehan said.

From November 2001 to July 30, 2004, when Postiglione and Lennon stopped operating the fund, Fountainhead investors never received an accurate quarterly statement and wound up losing a total of $1.98 million, prosecutors said.

The indictment also charges that, in August 2004, Postiglione knowingly falsified a document with the intent to obstruct an F.B.I. investigation.

Lennon's attorney, Christopher Furlong of Avondale, Pa., did not immediately return a call. Prosecutors said it has yet to be determined who is representing Postiglione, who could not be reached for comment.

Project Safe Childhood Cracks Down On Sex Offenders (CHICOER)

By PAULA M. FELIPE, Public Safety Reporter

Chico (CA) Enterprise-Record, October 13, 2006

Two Oroville sex registrants were arrested and two Gridley sex registrants were cited Wednesday night for failing to comply with their sex registration requirements.

The arrests were part of Project Safe Childhood (PSC), a U.S. Department of Justice initiative designed to crack down on violent sex predators and reduce Internet crimes against children, such as child pornography trafficking, according to Sgt. Steve Pelton of the Butte County Sheriff's Office.

On Wednesday night, investigators from the Butte County Sheriff's Office, Safe Street Task Force, Special Agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation, California Department of Justice, Butte County District Attorney's Office, and officers from the police departments of Chico, Gridley, and Yuba City, joined agents and deputies from the Department of Corrections, county probation department, and Plumas County Sheriff's Office in setting out to locate 60 convicted, registered sex offenders.

At about 4 p.m. a briefing took place with the 30 law enforcement officers, who spent the next eight hours investigating whether local sex registrants were in compliance with Megan's law, that provides specific registration requirements for convicted sex offenders.

Of the 60 targeted sex registrants, 11 were found out of compliance. Felony charges have been requested against seven of those found to be non-complaint and who are still at large, according to Pelton. "The two arrested in Oroville and two others cited in Gridley had misdemeanor violations," Pelton added.

Several sex registrants' computers were also examined in an effort to locate violations dealing with chid pornography, the BCSO press release said.

"We chose to focus on these 60 sex registrants because there was something about their case that looked out of place or didn't seem quite right, so we decided to investigate," Pelton said.

Project Safe Childhood has the U.S. Attorney's Office teaming up with state and local agencies in going after sex predators.

"We are in the midst of an epidemic of sexual abuse and exploitation of our children," said Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in a U.S. Department of Justice press release. "Project Safe Childhood will help law enforcement and community leaders prevent, investigate, and prosecute sexual predators and pornographers who target our children and grandchildren."

Convicted sex offenders must sign a registration form (pursuant to Penal Code sections 290 and 290.01) and write their initials next to a list of nineteen stated requirements. Above their signature line, it reads: "I understand failure to comply with the registration requirements, and providing false information on the form or failing to provide accurate information is punishable as a criminal offense." Those who were arrested and cited Wednesday by law enforcement agents were sex registrants, who violated one or more of the registration requirements, Pelton said.

The following is a small sample of some of the requirements that are listed on the form signed by sex registrants.

· My responsibility to register as a sex offender is a lifetime requirement.

· I must register or re-register (if I have previously registered) within five working days of release from incarceration, placement, or commitment on any offense, with the law enforcement agency having jurisdiction over my place(s) of residence or where I am physically present as a transient.

· I must annually update my registration information within five working days of my birthday at the law enforcement agency having jurisdiction . . . Annual updates begin with my first birthday following registration or change of address.

· Upon coming into or when changing my residence address within a city and/or county in which I am residing, I must register or re-register in person within five working days as a sex offender with the law enforcement agency having jurisdiction over the residence.

· If I move outside of California, I am required to register in the new state within ten working days.

· I understand I am required to submit DNA samples, as well as fingerprints and full palm prints.

According to the U.S. Department of Justice, in fiscal year 2005, federal prosecutors charged 1,447 child exploitation cases involving child pornography, coercion and enticement offenses against 1,503 defendants. Also, this year, the DOJ will award more than $14 million to the Internet Crimes Against Children (ICAC) program, a national network of 46 task forces funded by the Department's Office of Justice Programs.

Megan's Law is named after seven-year-old Megan Kanka, a New Jersey girl who was raped and killed by a known child molester who had moved across the street from the family without their knowledge, according to the Megan's Law website. "In the wake of the tragedy, the Kankas sought to have local communities warned about sex offenders in the area. All states now have a form of Megan's Law. The law is not intended to punish the offender and specifically prohibits using the information to harass or commit any crime against an offender," the website said. In China, Children Of Inmates Face Hard Time Themselves (WP)

By Maureen Fan, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

DALIAN, China -- The children answer to nicknames such as "Seagull," "Brightness," "Summer" and "Ocean," but they come with scars that social workers initially mistake for dirt. When they first arrive at the two-story house here, they hoard toothpaste, or they hide new socks and steamed buns in their bed quilts, as if they were precious gems.

They are the children of prisoners, and in this country, they belong to no one.

The law is unclear on who should provide for the children of China's more than 1.5 million prisoners. No government department is willing to supervise them. Historically, relatives have taken them in, but in practice, many unwanted children are shuffled from family to family. Sometimes, even the families do not want them.

A small number of children, like the 12 at the home here in Dalian, receive care at "Children's Villages," organizations usually run by civic-minded individuals. But there are no more than nine or 10 such organizations nationwide, serving perhaps 1,000 children, experts say. Prisoners have an estimated 600,000 children under the age of 18, according to Justice Ministry statistics; experts argue that the actual figure is higher.

The reasons for the neglect can be traced to China's bureaucratic system, but also to the scorn with which some Chinese have traditionally regarded criminals and, by extension, their children. In rural areas especially, the stigma against criminals and their families is felt almost as strongly as it was during the Cultural Revolution, the brutal 10-year campaign of terror that pitted youth against parent, wiped out any notion of trust and taught millions of people to shun "bad elements."

"People used to turn pale when talking about criminals in those times," said Zhang Shuqin, 58, director of the Beijing Sun Village Research Institute for Helping Special Children. "Some would argue, 'We can't even help good people's kids, why bother to help criminals or their kids?' "

At Dalian Children's Village, located behind a cornfield just west of this seaside city in northeast China, many of the children arrived after being taunted or beaten in their home villages or towns, and most came from impoverished backgrounds. Their parents, now serving time for robbery, fraud or murder, often earned less than a dollar a day before being incarcerated.

"Most of our kids live below the poverty line. They have relatives, but they're very poor. The more rural the area, the worse it is," said Pan Du, the executive director of the Dalian home. "If you live in a village, everybody knows your business. And kids can be so cruel to each other."

To protect their privacy, the children are given nicknames. "Shitou," 9, was the first child to come to live at the home three years ago. His name means "Stone," because he is considered the founding stone of the home. His previous nickname was "Idiot," given to him by relatives who beat him.

Shitou's mother abandoned the family, and his father is serving six years in prison for robbery. The boy and a sick grandmother bounced from relative to relative each month.

Yang Mei, 29, the home's full-time social worker, recalled seeing Shitou shortly after he arrived.

"I remember that his jacket was not thick enough for northeast China, and his pants were so short and tight they were hard to take off," she said. Yang also recalled Shitou flinching every time she tried to swat at the flies that loop through the home. It was only later that she learned he had once been beaten by relatives with a fly swatter.

It is a sad story, but every child at the home has a sad story, Yang said. To bring some brightness to their lives, perhaps, almost every child is given the name "Hai," which means ocean.

Hai Bin, 13, has a patch of skin on the back of his head where another child cut his head open with a rock.

Hai Chun, 13, used to collect garbage with her father to eke out a living.

DOJ_NMG_0080388

Hai Xia, 6, the youngest at the home, is the daughter of a mafia boss killed in an accident and a drug-dealing mother imprisoned for life when Hai Xia was 2.

Pan, the executive director, said that Hai Xia had nearly been adopted before she came to the home. But the Chinese couple that was interested in the girl had demanded that she never again see her mother. They thought the mother would be a bad influence.

"Chinese people have some traditional ideas, in that if your father commits crimes, your son will be a criminal, too, or the son will always follow the father's path," Yang said. "I think the discrimination is always there. Chinese people don't want to be associated with bad elements."

Both Yang and Pan earned enough in previous jobs to allow them to work for free at the home in Dalian, for the time being. The home's expenses run about $1,000 a month, with a full-time cook and a part-time accountant. Yang and Pan have just enough to cover that amount.

But there are times when they need more. When two children needed $1,250 worth of hospital surgery recently, Pan had to call local donors for help. She and her husband have sunk more than $8,000 of their own money into the home, after the founder, a family friend, became ill.

The home would have better access to international funding if it were registered with the government as a nongovernmental organization, or NGO, but the government makes the process extremely difficult -- to the point that local civil affairs officials have failed to even explain to Pan whom she must see to register.

The problem is a loophole in the law that fails to address prisoners' children. But adding to the problem is the government's year-old investigation of NGOs, especially U.S.-funded organizations suspected of having ulterior motives. Registration of new groups has come to a virtual standstill.

Nick Young, editor of China Development Brief, a Beijing-based publication that tracks China's NGOs, said state security officials have been questioning and intimidating NGO workers since news reports suggested that recent uprisings in Central Asia were heavily influenced by foreign-funded organizations.

"I think the government is concerned about foreign influence in a rather Cold War sense," Young told reporters at a recent briefing. "I think any rational observer would see that there's no real analogy between China and Kyrgyzstan and Central Asia. It's a no-brainer."

Meanwhile, Pan and Yang focus on teaching the children to withstand society's insults and to appreciate their parents, despite the parents' mistakes. They also try to prepare the children for the day their parents will be released.

It is a tough transition, as some parents struggle to find new homes and jobs. In Dalian, the children have been treated well by neighbors and local schools, but they may not face such a warm reception when they return to their families.

An Aug. 1 letter from the father of the home's newest resident, Hai Chen, 10, reached Pan last month.

"I've been in prison for three years and every moment I think of my crime I'm filled with regret. I know my crime has brought pain and harm to my family, to society and to the country," wrote the man, who is in prison for stealing a car. "I have learned that my son was not abandoned by society, but was adopted by the Children's Village. I can't do anything to thank you except to rebuild my life. Please educate my son strictly so he will never be like his father."

FDA Review Sought Of Data On Implants (WP)

By David Brown

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

A consumer activist organization yesterday asked the Food and Drug Administration to investigate what it considers a possibly criminal attempt to suppress information about the risks of the new generation of silicone breast implants.

In a letter to the FDA's administrator, Public Citizen said it learned of test results -- some new, some reinterpreted -- from a scientist at implant maker Mentor Corp. who says he could not persuade his bosses to forward the data to the regulatory agency.

The scientist had worked for 15 years for Mentor, which is based in Santa Barbara, Calif. He was let go earlier this year in a company reorganization, although he thinks his protests to superiors were part of the reason.

The FDA is in the late stage of reviewing applications by two companies to sell once more silicone breast implants for general use. Last year, the agency gave preliminary approval for the devices on condition that Mentor and a competitor, Inamed (now part of another company, Allergan), complete required tests.

Currently, most breast implants used in the United States are filled with saline solution -- salt water. Silicone implants can be used only under limited conditions, generally in FDA-approved studies at specified hospitals.

Many implants are used by women who have had a mastectomy for breast cancer, but most of the 250,000 sold each year are for breast enhancement. That number is expected to rise if the more popular silicone implants are allowed back on the market.

"This new information is compelling enough to warrant a reassessment of the FDA's position," Sidney M. Wolfe, the physician who heads Public Citizen, said in a letter to Andrew C. von Eschenbach, the FDA's acting commissioner. Wolfe added that unless the agency recommends a criminal investigation of Mentor, "it will encourage [Mentor] and other device manufacturers to selectively send the agency only those studies that put their products in the most favorable light."

The former Mentor scientist said he is not certain his findings mean that silicone implants are less safe than believed. But he said he thinks the information is relevant to the discussion and further studies need to be done.

"The data exists. It can't be refuted," he said yesterday. "I didn't want to get Mentor in trouble. I didn't want to point a finger at the FDA. The intention was to get the damn data reviewed and put in the total picture."

The scientist requested anonymity because he is looking for a job and does not want to be identified as a whistle-blower.

Two of the four issues he raised to his employers, and later to the FDA after he left Mentor, concern "low molecular weight siloxanes" -- the smaller members of a large family of silicone compounds in the implants' gel. Over time, some can pass through the plastic skin of the implant into the body.

In one of Mentor's studies, implants were submerged in the blood serum of pigs for a prolonged period. Chemists measured the amount of small silicone molecules in the liquid and found essentially no increase.

The scientist said he later determined that the silicone molecules were sticking to proteins and fat in the pig serum, making them uncountable. He devised a way to use a solvent to release them.

"The diffusion data that was submitted to the FDA is meaningless," he said in an interview.

But, he added, "even when we were aware in the corporation that this data had no meaning, we didn't inform the agency. As a matter of fact, the person who had oversight of my department tried to give validity to the data basically with a hand-waving approach." He said he considered that "intentional deception."

In another study, company scientists measured the concentration of various silicone compounds in implants that had been removed from women, some after a decade of use. Curiously, they found higher concentrations of small compounds than in implants that had never been used. For some molecules, there had been a tenfold increase, from 10 parts per million to 100 parts per million.

Why this occurred is unknown. Two possibilities are that body heat or motion may have caused large silicone molecules to break down into smaller ones.

"The bottom line is that somebody needed to go and look at this," the scientist said.

In a statement yesterday, FDA spokeswoman Heidi Valetkevitch said the agency "took the whistle blower allegations very seriously."

She said the agency "found no evidence of wrongdoing and nothing that would raise questions about the safety of the product under review or the integrity of the data submitted to FDA."

She added that manufacturers must submit any new data that could affect the safety and effectiveness of their products, but that "our investigation and inspection determined that the company's test results did not fall into this category."

In a statement, Mentor said: "During July, representatives from FDA visited our Santa Barbara facility. They asked questions and reviewed documents specific to our preclinical testing. To our knowledge, all questions were answered to the satisfaction of FDA."

Justice Department Gives Police Agencies Grants For Bulletproof Vests (GFPS)

By Don Lehman

Glens Falls (NY) Post-Star, October 13, 2006

Three local police agencies have been given federal grants to help them purchase new bulletproof vests.

Sheriff's Departments in Warren and Washington counties and Whitehall Police received money from the U.S. Department of Justice to purchase new body armor.

The Washington County Sheriff's Department will receive the most money of the three agencies, $4,462 that will be used to buy 6 vests for members of the department's newly created emergency response team, said Washington County Sheriff Roger Leclaire.

The Warren County Sheriff's Department will receive $3,847 for 18 new vests, 6 of which will replace old ones and 12 for new officers Sheriff Larry Cleveland has asked county leaders to hire.

Whitehall Police Chief Richard LaChapelle said the $3,115 the department has been chosen to receive will go toward 11 new vests to replace older ones.

LaChapelle said the department's memebers have some dating back 10 years, past when it is recommended they be replaced. The federal money will pay about half the tab, with the village picking up the rest, he said.

"You do have to replace them every so often," he said. "We're going to go to a lot lighter vest."

The grants were announced this week by U.S. Sen Charles Schumer, D-N.Y.

Leclaire said the Washington County Sheriff's Department also received word recently that it will receive a federal grant of $24,681 to purchase an iris scan machine. Iris scans are used as a means of identifying people.

Leclaire said it will be particularly useful for identifying children and Alzheimer's Disease patients.

"When we get it we'll make it available for use by any surrounding agencies," he said.

CIVIL LAW:

Class Action Suit Over ID Theft Tossed Out (CNET)

By Declan McCullagh And Anne Broache, Staff Writers, CNET News.com

CNET News, October 13, 2006

Acxiom, a data warehouser, had its databases looted at least twice. But judge throws out an ID-theft class action suit.

A federal judge in Arkansas has thrown out a class action lawsuit against Acxiom, which exposed massive amounts of Americans' personal information in a high-profile Internet security snafu three years ago.

Even though a spammer had downloaded more than one billion records from the company, U.S. District Judge William Wilson ruled that there was no evidence that Acxiom's purloined database had been used to send junk e-mail or postal mail.

Because the class action attorneys could not prove that anyone's information had actually been misused, Wilson dismissed the case and the request for damages on the grounds that any harm would be entirely speculative. "Because plaintiff has not alleged that she has suffered any concrete damages, she does not have standing under the case-or-controversy requirement," he wrote.

The decision (PDF), published on Oct. 3, could prove influential in other identity fraud cases where breaches have exposed personal information such as home addresses and Social Security numbers, but there's no proof that the information has been misused.

"If this case is not the first, it's certainly one of the first to deal with these issues," said David Kramer, a partner at the law firm of Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati, who represents Acxiom.

It's not entirely clear what information was downloaded from Acxiom, except that it was information owned by one of its customers rather than information Acxiom collected itself. Acxiom's business includes providing databases for direct marketers, including InfoBase, described by the company as "the largest collection of U.S. consumer and telephone data in one source," and Personicx, which features the "specific consumer and demographic characteristics" of tens of millions of American households. Acxiom also provides information to law enforcement agencies, and once counted former presidential candidate Wesley Clark as a board member.

In a related case dealing only with the rules governing federal agencies, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in 2004 that someone who had his Social Security number disclosed by the Department of Labor--but experienced no actual harm such as identity fraud--was not entitled to damages (PDF).

The class action lawsuit arose out of a security breach at Acxiom in 2003 in which the company allegedly did not adequately protect a server used for file transfers (FTP). Earlier this year, Scott Levine was sentenced to eight years in prison after a federal jury convicted him of 120 counts of unauthorized access to Acxiom's computers.

Levine is a native of Boca Raton, Fla. and former chief executive of a bulk e-mail company called Snipermail.com, which had been dubbed a spammer by the Spamhaus Project. But federal prosecutors said there was no evidence that Levine used the downloaded data for identity fraud.

According to court documents, Levine and others broke into an Acxiom server used for file transfers and downloaded an encrypted password file called "ftpsam.txt" in early 2003. Then they ran a cracking utility on the ftpsam.txt file, prosecutors said, discovered 40 percent of the passwords, and used those accounts to download even more sensitive information.

The revelations raised eyebrows, in part because Acxiom Chairman Charles Morgan had offered public assurances about the company's security, including in testimony (click here for PDF) to the Federal Trade Commission. Morgan said that his company takes "exceptional security measures to protect the information we maintain for our own information products...to ensure that information will not be made available to any unauthorized person."

No decision about an appeal

An attorney who is co-counsel on the lawsuit against Acxiom said on Wednesday that the plaintiffs have not yet decided whether to appeal. "We're going to consider what our potential avenues are over the coming week or so, and then make a decision," said Scott Poynter of the firm Emerson Poynter in Little Rock, Ark.

Emerson Poynter describes itself as a firm that has "specialized in class action litigation for over 15 years" and says all of those cases are handled on a contingency-fee basis. It has filed class-action lawsuits against companies including AOL Time Warner, Nortel Networks and Coca-Cola, typically alleging securities fraud. It has indicated it will target companies that are accused of stock option backdating as well.

"Our client tried to find out from Acxiom if her information was compromised, and they wouldn't tell her," Poynter said. "We think the consumers that have their private information stored by a company should have that right...But maybe the law needs to catch up with the Internet and the way people's privacy is being invaded today."

In the lawsuit that Emerson Poynter and a second law firm filed against Acxiom in April, they raised two vague arguments: That the data-broker was negligent, and that its actions "caused an unreasonable intrusion on the privacy" of people whose records were exposed. Those legal claims require someone to have suffered actual harm beyond a possibly increased risk of identity theft, Judge Wilson concluded. (The lawyers asked for "compensatory and punitive damages" and attorneys' fees of an unspecified amount.)

"This may lead attorneys looking to bring these sorts of claims to ensure their clients have suffered actual harm rather than speculative injury before filing suit," said Kramer, Acxiom's attorney.

But Chris Hoofnagle, a senior fellow at the University of California at Berkeley's law school who has been critical of Acxiom, thinks that the outcome might have been different if the attorneys had filed the suit in California. State law (AB1950) requires businesses that own or license personal information about Californians to "implement and maintain reasonable security procedures," Hoofnagle noted, though that law was not in place at the time of the Acxiom incident.

"I would hope that one could think of more causes of action other than identity theft and negligence," Hoofnagle said.

Levine's was not the first prosecution to stem from the security practices on Acxiom's FTP server. An Ohio man named Daniel Baas previously pleaded guilty to illegally entering Acxiom's FTP site. That investigation led federal police--including the FBI and Secret Service--to Levine, according to the Justice Department.

Letters On Voter ID Under Fire 200,000 Mailed Out After Law Struck Down (AJC)

By Ernie Suggs, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 13, 2006

Less than a week after a judge struck down Georgia's photo ID requirement for voters because it violated the state Constitution, nearly 200,000 letters — not the originally reported 20,000 — were sent out to registered voters, notifying them they may not have a valid driver's license or state-issued photo ID.

David Worley, a Democratic appointee to the State Election Board, is threatening to file a complaint with the U.S. Justice Department, charging the board with voter suppression for mailing the letters after the law was struck down.

The letter suggests that if a voter does not have a photo ID, they will not be allowed to vote on Election Day.

"Essentially, this is a taxpayer-funded voter suppression effort by the Republicans and a willful violation of the court's order," Worley said. "I think it is a violation of the Voting Rights Act, and I intend to take whatever legal action is available, including filing a complaint with the Justice Department. This shows the lengths to which Republicans are willing to go to stay in power."

The "Dear Georgia Voter" letter was part of a voter education campaign designed to remind voters about the January legislation that required voters to show one of six forms of government-issued photo identification at the polls. Worley said that in early September the State Election Board voted to send out 300,000 letters to Georgians who were on the voter registration list but who did not have a driver's license.

Tex McIver, the vice chair of the election board who authorized the $55,000 mailing of the letters, said the board was only acting on an earlier order by U.S. District Judge Harold L. Murphy to educate the public about changes in Georgia voting law.

But Worley said letters should not have been sent out after the law was struck down in state court.

"I think it was necessary to send out the letter, but once the judge issued his order [voiding the law], that necessity evaporated," Worley said. "At that point, sending out the letters was intentionally misinforming the voters. "

Worley said that at a Sept. 22 State Election Board meeting, he asked if the letters had been mailed.

"The vice chair said that at the time the order came down on the 19th, all but 20,000 of the letters had gone out," Worley said.

But according to a printing and postal delivery schedule provided on Wednesday by the State Elections Division of the Secretary of State's office, there were 79,496 letters delivered to the post office for mailing on Sept. 20 and another 115,747 sent on Sept. 25.

McIver said that he was told by staffers that only 20,000 letters had not been mailed and authorized that final batch to be sent after the Sept. 19 ruling. He said had he known that nearly 200,000 letters had not been sent, he would have still authorized the shipment.

"It doesn't change my opinion at all. I am under a federal order to educate these voters and that is what we were doing," McIver said of the letters mailed after the ruling.

"[Worley's] complaints were that this was adding to voter confusion, but everything we did was to prevent confusion," McIver said. "The letter should not confuse anybody. In it, we said that if you don't have a driver's license, go get a free one. That letter never said you can't use the 17 forms [of ID to vote]. It did say get a free ID. It also said you can vote absentee. It was not confusing."

But Jennifer Owens, executive director of the League of Women Voters of Georgia, isn't buying it. She said she has fielded several calls from confused voters and her office is in the process of mobilizing grass-roots efforts to meet with potential voters around the state to educate them on the voting process.

"From where we are sitting, this is one of the worst things that could happen as far as voter confusion," Owens said. "It certainly sends quite a clear message to those voters that they might have to show a driver's license. And if they are not paying attention to court rulings, they are not sure what they are gonna do. It raises red flags."

Carolyn Gray said her 90-year-old mother, Corrie Gray, received one of the letters.

Corrie Gray, who is black, has been voting for decades in Temple with a voter registration card and other forms of ID. She has never had a driver's license.

"She gets this letter, that she does not have photo ID. I knew that the photo ID had been blocked, so I was wondering why is this coming to her, when we know, it is not required," said Carolyn Gray. "If I had not been paying attention, I would have been running around trying to get her a photo ID. For her and a lot of elderly black folks, getting a photo idea is hell on wheels."

Worley said that he was going to ask Secretary of State Cathy Cox — who chairs the State Election Board — to call an emergency meeting next week.

Chris Riggall, Cox's spokesman said it is unprecedented that the elections board would have sent out the letters, since traditionally it was the job of the election division of the Secretary of State's Office. The General Assembly put the elections board — which is majority Republican — in charge of informing voters of the changes in voting law, Riggall said.

"There is a majority on the election board, which [Cox] is not in, that has made sure that Tex [McIver] would be the point person and the board has directed the elections division to stay out of this project," Riggall said. "It has been a situation in which the board, under Mr. McIver's leadership, has undertaken this and they have called the shots."

McIver said sending the letters after the judge's ruling has been helpful.

"By continuing to mail them, it helps me refine that list," said McIver, adding that several people have responded to the letters telling the state that they do have driver's licenses. "This was a way of building a better, cleaner, smarter, more accurate list."

Current law, which will be in effect for the Nov. 7 elections, allows voters to show one of 17 forms of identification, including some non-photo ID such as a utility bill or Social Security card. It also allows voters to sign a statement swearing to their identity if they can't produce identification.

Officer Convicted In Md. Inmate Death (AP)

By Brian Witte, The Associated Press

AP, October 13, 2006

BALTIMORE (AP) — A former correctional officer was conficted Thursday in the beating and stomping death of an inmate at a troubled jail.

Dameon Christopher Woods, 34, was one of three guards charged. A jury convicted him of second-degree murder and depraved heart, as well as first- and second-degree assault in the death of Raymond Smoot.

The jury acquitted Woods of second-degree murder, voluntary manslaughter and involuntary manslaughter charges.

James Leonard Hatcher, 45, another former correctional officer who faced the same charges as Woods, was acquitted of all charges Thursday. Circuit Court Judge John M. Glynn this week dismissed a murder charge against former officer Nathan D. Colbert.

DOJ_NMG_0080393

Smoot, 51, was beaten and stomped in his cell at the Baltimore Central Booking and Intake Center in May 2005 after getting into an altercation with officers who had trouble getting him back into his cell. He was being held on a theft charge but had a history of disciplinary problems, jail officials have said.

Eight correctional officers were fired less than a month after the death. The attack prompted the FBI to open a civil rights investigation, which is still active.

The state-run facility, which opened in 1995, has been criticized for its overcrowded and unhealthy conditions. It was designed to process as many as 45,000 people a year but has handled more than double that amount.

Kenya Kelly, Smoot's oldest daughter, said she was shocked and disappointed that only one person was convicted. She faulted a sloppy investigation and said she believed more than three participated in the beating.

"It's kind of hard to take what happened today, because justice wasn't served to the fullest extent," said Kelly, whose family has sued the state.

Mark Cohen, a prosecutor, said after the verdict that he believed prosecutors pursued the matter as far as possible.

Defense attorneys had argued that their clients were scapegoats of a conspiracy hatched by the correctional officers who were truly responsible. Woods' attorney, Margaret Mead, said she planned to file an appeal.

"How could they have found him guilty of depraved heart?" she told reporters outside the courthouse. "It's completely a miscarriage of justice."

Depraved heart is distinguished from second-degree murder in that it is not intentional and requires an extreme disregard for human life.

Sentencing is set for Dec. 12. Woods faces up to 30 years in prison on the murder charge.

Police Interview Girl In Beard Case (LNA)

By Ron Brown

Lynchburg (VA) News & Advance, October 13, 2006

State police have interviewed a 16-year-old girl who was in Clarence Lightfoot Beard Jr.'s James Crossing apartment when he died on Sept. 24.

Beard's death, which occurred while he was in custody of Lynchburg police, sparked the State Police investigation.

The girl has said she begged Lynchburg police officers to quit striking Beard, said L. Garnell Stamps, a local civil rights activist, in an interview earlier this week.

Lynchburg police said Beard struck two officers who were looking for a female fugitive at the apartment complex at about 3 a.m.

It is unclear what sparked the confrontation between Beard and police.

The city is not making 911 tapes and dispatchers' logs about the incident available to the public. The News & Advance requested the records earlier this week under the Virginia Freedom of Information Act.

The identity of the officers involved also has not been released by the city, which has said the incident is a "personnel matter" that is exempt from public disclosure.

In addition to the State Police investigation, which was requested by City Manager Kimball Payne, the Lynchburg Police Department is conducting two internal investigations.

Albert Rose, the girl's grandfather, said in a telephone interview Thursday that the State Police interview occurred on Wednesday.

"I can't say anything about the interview," he said.

Rose said more details could be made public sometime next week.

"There is a whole lot to this story," he said. "It is going to be coming out step by step."

Rose met Wednesday night with a group of local civil rights leaders and gave them a report on the incident. The group has asked the U.S. Justice Department's Civil Rights Division to look into the circumstances surrounding Beard's death.

In addition to Stamps, the civil rights advocates included Walter M. Fore Jr., president of the Lynchburg Voters League; Danny McCain, president of Concerned Citizens For Justice and Equity; W.E. Clark, chairman of the legal redress committee of the Lynchburg NAACP; the Rev. Willie Butler, president of the Lynchburg NAACP; and the Rev. James Coleman, state president of the National Action Network.

Stamps said Thursday the girl's story has been consistent since the night Beard died.

"Her story is what I call rock solid," Stamps said. "It has not changed. There are no discrepancies in her story. All that does is strengthen the case against the officers who were, in our opinion, being excessive and showing no restraint and being verbally abusive to an innocent party."

The girl told Stamps that she was repeatedly cursed by officers when she begged them to stop striking Beard.

DOJ_NMG_0080394

An autopsy showed Beard had two lumps on his head, an abrasion to his forehead and a small bruise on his temple.

Preliminary findings by a state medical examiner indicated that Beard suffered from advanced coronary artery disease.

The final version of the autopsy report will be released once a toxicology report is completed. That report will reveal what, if any, drugs Beard had in his system.

Stamps said Thursday that at least two young children and another woman were in Beard's apartment the night he died.

The civil rights group has tried to determine whether mental health counseling is needed for the 16-year-old and the two children, ages 2 and 4.

Stamps said at least one of the small children has acted out what they saw in Beard's apartment that night.

"It was our hope that the children would not have seen a lot of the things," Stamps said. "It is my thinking that the city should assume some responsibility. It was while officers of the Lynchburg Police Department were there that these three children saw this negative behavior."

Congressman Ask Justice Department To Review Law That Convicted Ramos (OIVB)

By Sara A. Carter, Staff Writer

Ontario Inland Valley (CA) Bulletin, October 13, 2006

In an eleventh-hour plea, a half-dozen congressmen are asking the Justice Department to review the federal law used to convict two Border Patrol agents of shooting a Mexican drug smuggler.

Congressman Walter B. Jones, R-N.C., circulated a letter Thursday among his colleagues that slammed federal statute 924(c), which addresses discharging a firearm in relation to a crime of violence. Conviction under the statute carries a minimum 10-year sentence in federal prison.

Jones and five other members of the caucus -- including California Reps. Gary Miller (R-Brea), Dana Rohrbacher (R-Huntington Beach) and Ed Royce (R-Fullerton) -- contend in the letter that El Paso, Texas, Border Patrol Agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean should not have been charged under the statute because carrying a firearm was a necessary part of their jobs, and that they used the firearms while on duty.

``Yesterday (Tuesday), a motion to delay sentencing for Ramos and Compean was denied. Sentencing is now scheduled for Thursday, Oct. 19," the letter reads. ``We urge you to take any action you can to either delay this sentencing or have the ... charges dropped."

NJ Gets More Time To Implement Required Voter Database (AP)

By Jeffrey Gold, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 13, 2006

NEWARK, N.J. -- New Jersey has been given until next year's primary election to implement a federally required statewide voter registration list, the state and the U.S. Justice Department announced Thursday.

In a series of court filings, New Jersey acknowledged it had missed deadlines required by the Help America Vote Act and a related state law.

The petitions, if approved by federal and state judges, should prevent problems that could threaten the integrity of the Nov. 7 general election if the statewide list were used exclusively, state Attorney General Stuart Rabner said.

Federal prosecutors charged, in a complaint filed along with a proposed settlement, that New Jersey had also failed to collect driver's license numbers on the applications of new registrants, as required by HAVA, and "failed to perform reasonable registration list maintenance" as required by the National Voter Registration Act of 1993.

"We were very concerned that four years had passed without compliance with federal voting laws by the state Attorney General's Office," Christopher J. Christie, the U.S. attorney for New Jersey, said in a statement. "We are very pleased that Attorney General Rabner has taken this issue so seriously and has put the resources of his department behind fixing it as soon as possible."

If the petitions are approved, New Jersey would use the existing voter registration rolls in 20 of the 21 counties for the Nov. 7 election.

The attorney general's office said that any eligible voter whose name appears in the county poll book will be able to cast a regular ballot. Those whose names are not in the book but believe they have registered to vote can cast a provisional ballot.

Hunterdon County would use the new statewide voter registration list exclusively, while the statewide system would be tested in the others.

Rabner's office said other states have had problems implementing a statewide voter database and that deadlines have also been extended in California, Maine and New York.

DOJ_NMG_0080395

New Jersey blamed its delay on continuing "software problems that would threaten the integrity of the upcoming general election."

The state's agreement with the Justice Department sets a number of deadlines for the state, including:

_Implementing the statewide voter registration list by May 30. The primary is in June.

_Taking steps by May 30 to identify possible duplicate registrations and refer them to the counties to be checked, and, if confirmed, removed by July 25.

_Obtain by May 30 driver's license numbers (or other identification if the person does not have a driver's license) for people who registered to vote after Jan. 1.

Black Plaintiffs Attack Voting Method For Chancery, Circuit Judges (AP)

AP, October 13, 2006

JACKSON, Miss. - A group of black plaintiffs has filed a federal lawsuit challenging how Mississippi will elect state circuit and chancery judges in November.

Attorney Carroll Rhodes of Hazlehurst, who filed the lawsuit in federal court in Jackson on Oct. 3, said Thursday that he does not wish to stop any judicial elections.

Rhodes said he wants the judiciary races to be run under the election law before it was rewritten by the Legislature in 2005.

Rhodes said the new law was to take effect Jan. 1, 2007. He said the State Election Commission erroneously is using the new law for this year's election.

"All we are asking is for the ballot to be changed, not that the elections be stopped. We are not asking that anything be withdrawn. We are not asking for anything burdensome," Rhodes told The Associated Press.

No hearing date has been set for the lawsuit.

Rhodes' lawsuit, which represents only one side of a legal argument, says that in six chancery court and nine circuit court districts, the opportunity for the election of black candidates has been harmed by the new law.

In those districts, the Legislature changed the election process from a "herd" system to a "post" system. The lawsuit asks a federal panel to revert to the herd system for the Nov. 7 elections.

Under the herd system, all candidates run in a pack and the top vote getters win the available seats. The herd system was put in place in the late 1980s as part of a settlement of a lawsuit that also claimed the judicial election method diluted black voting strength.

Supporters argue the herd system can help blacks be elected because minorities can make their vote count more by voting only once, presumably for the black candidate.

For instance, in a district where two circuit judges will be elected, voters who cast a ballot for only one candidate will carry more weight than voters who select two candidates.

Lawmakers eliminated the herd system in many districts because they said it was not helping to elect minorities.

What the Legislature created was "posts," where candidates choose the post for which they are running. Many incumbents like the post system because generally a challenger will opt not to run against an incumbent if there is an open spot to pursue.

Attorney General Jim Hood, who's one of three members on the state Election Commission, said the election change was approved by the U.S. Department of Justice. Federal law requires all election changes in Mississippi to obtain Justice approval to ensure black voting efforts will not be harmed.

"We feel the Department of Justice was correct in its ruling, and we believe that the federal court will ultimately agree," Hood told the Northeast Mississippi Daily Journal newspaper.

Rhodes, however, said the Election Commission did not ask the Justice Department for approval - called preclearance - to make the new law apply to the 2006 election.

"Technically, it shouldn't be used in any area of the state," Rhodes said. "Here, the state of Mississippi is trying to implement an un-precleared voting changes for this election."

The Abstinence Shtick, Minus Jesus (WP)

By Michael Alison Chandler

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

Christian comedian Keith Deltano did a lot of things at Loudoun County High School yesterday to encourage teenagers to stay away from sex. He sang bad hip-hop, told stories about oozing diapers, read from a government report on how condoms can fail and waved a cinder block over one unfortunate male student's genital zone.

But he never once talked about Jesus. Although he often delivers one-liners tailored to his faith, Deltano gave a routine expunged of religion to more than 1,000 students at the public high school in Leesburg.

Some civil liberties advocates, skeptical of such shows, said school officials must enforce a line that is tested by religious performers who are invited into public schools to entertain and educate but not preach.

"Having so-called secular performances or speeches in public schools by Christian evangelists" is a growing trend, said Barry W. Lynn, executive director of Americans United for Separation of Church and State. "Schools need to be extremely careful when they tread into these waters."

In recent years, evangelist bodybuilders and extreme athletes have toured schools across the country with anti-drug and anti-suicide messages. The brother of a devout Christian victim of the 1999 Columbine school shootings has toured some Loudoun schools bringing with him a powerful anti-bullying presentation called "Rachel's Challenge."

Many parents, administrators and teachers see such assemblies as an effective way to convey hard-to-teach life lessons. But occasionally there have been controversies.

Last year, twin comedians Rick and Mick Vigneulle gave an anti-drug motivational assembly in several Charles County schools that prompted some criticism. The American Civil Liberties Union objected to fliers the duo circulated that advertised a free, off-campus pizza party during which they delivered a Christian message.

When it heard about Deltano's event, the ACLU sent a letter last week to Loudoun County High Principal Bill Oblas. The group sought assurances that the comedian would not promote the Christian pregnancy center in Lansdowne that hired him or plug his religious books and videos. It also sought a prohibition on invitations to off-campus religious activities.

Oblas said he and Deltano had already established clear parameters. The principal had previewed the performance and determined that the message was "identical" to the system's sex-education curriculum, which emphasizes abstinence. He also sent notes to parents and gave students the option of not attending.

"I understand the division of church and state. To me, it's very clear," Deltano said afterward. The former middle school teacher has been speaking about abstinence for more than 10 years and said he has toured 46 states.

His Web site has two distinct portals, one for school shows and another for faith-based shows. The site also refers browsers to the text of a federal law that spells out rules for programs that receive federal funding for abstinence education.

Stephen Budiansky, father of an 11th-grader at Loudon County High, alerted the ACLU to the event. He said he was alarmed that the school system would invite a sex-ed presentation from someone who was not a health-care professional and who has what Budiansky called "a clear religious agenda."

"There is a curriculum . . . that goes through peer review and gets scrutiny from scientific experts," Budiansky said. "Teachers are very well trained to deal with questions that arise in class and to give accurate, scientifically valid information."

One parent who attended the assembly, Eva McGann, said she would like Deltano to speak at her daughter's school -- Stone Bridge High in Ashburn -- because she said it's important for students to hear the message from someone other than teachers and parents.

Students gave Deltano mixed reviews. Many cheered and laughed at his jokes; some blushed. Afterward, sophomore Megan Patlen, 15, said that she loved it.

"Abstinence is definitely the way to go," she said, describing herself as Christian.

Junior Ghislaine LeFranc, 16, said she didn't like how abstinence was "pressed" on her in her sex-education lessons and in the assembly.

"Although it's not about Christianity, there is an underlying conservative belief," she said, which she said she does not agree with.

Oblas said he thought that the students learned something. The presentation added to the school's curriculum by reaching students in different ways, he said.

They respond to his jokes, "his high energy and his loudness," Oblas said.

Same-sex Marriage Back Before Voters, But Mood Different (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, October 13, 2006

Two years after voters in 13 states approved constitutional bans on same-sex marriage, gay rights activists hope to reverse that course next month.

Colorado's first-in-the-nation ballot proposal to create same-sex domestic partnerships had strong support in a recent poll. Polls in three of the eight states that will vote on banning same-sex marriage show the measures trailing or leading narrowly.

“It could be a watershed year,” said Carrie Evans, state legislative director at the Human Rights Campaign, a gay and lesbian advocacy group.

Jim Pfaff, state policy director for the conservative group Focus on the Family, disagrees. He says all same-sex-marriage bans will pass because voters “believe that marriage is the union of one man and one woman.”

DOJ_NMG_0080397

Any victory for gay groups would be unprecedented. Voters have approved each of 19 proposals for state constitutional bans on same-sex marriage; support has averaged 70%. The questions began appearing on ballots in 1998 after a Hawaii court struck down the state's same-sex-marriage ban.

Now, well-run opposition campaigns and growing acceptance of homosexuality are eroding support for such bans, pollsters say.

In Arizona, a recent poll from Arizona State University on a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage showed 51% of registered voters were opposed; 38% supported it. A Mason-Dixon Poll in July in South Dakota showed a similar measure trailing 49% to 41%. "We have a very good chance of killing this," said Ken Clark of Arizona Together, which opposes the measure.

Cathi Herrod of Project Marriage Arizona, the group that got the amendment on the ballot, predicted it would pass because U.S. voters have always approved such measures. Polls traditionally underestimate support for bans on same-sex marriage, she said.

In Colorado, a mid-September Rocky Mountain News poll showed 58% supported a ballot measure to create domestic partnerships that would give same-sex couples many rights of married couples, such as health insurance benefits and hospital visitation. The poll showed 38% opposed it. The same poll showed a Colorado ballot issue to ban same-sex marriage was favored by 52% to 42%.

Approval of the domestic-partnership measure would embolden activists to push for similar legal recognition in other states, said Evans of the Human Rights Campaign. Gay rights advocates believe "people are not altogether bigoted and discriminatory and do want to provide rights to same-sex couples. Colorado is testing that," she said.

Americans are torn about recognizing same-sex couples, said Scott Keeter of the Pew Research Center. A Pew survey in July showed 56% of respondents opposed gay marriage, but 54% favored civil unions.

Six states and the District of Columbia give gay couples legal rights, such as the ability to make medical decisions for a partner or to sue for wrongful death. Only Massachusetts lets them marry.

Focus on the Family and other conservative groups say constitutional bans keep courts from overturning laws barring same-sex marriage, which 26 states have.

The Arizona proposal, Proposition 107, would bar the state and cities from granting unmarried couples legal rights. That has brought rebukes from the mayors of Phoenix and Tucson. They say public entities couldn't offer domestic-partner benefits, making them less-appealing places to work. Such "high-profile" opposition is "the main reason 107 may not pass," said Bruce Merrill, director of the ASU poll that showed the same-sex proposal trailing.

Foes of Proposition 107 focus on rights they say unmarried couples would lose. "This has nothing to do with gay or straight," said Clark, opposition campaign director.

Most same-sex-marriage bans that have passed or are facing voters next month bar rights for gay couples. Courts decide how those bans affect areas such as health benefits for domestic partners, said Evans of the Human Rights Campaign. But putting such bans on the ballot can undermine them, said Brad Coker of Mason-Dixon pollsters. "The more complicated the language, the more likely people are to vote no."

Cypress: Justice Department To Probe Static Random Access Memory Market (AP)

AP, October 13, 2006

SAN JOSE (AP) - The U.S. Department of Justice's antitrust division has opened an investigation into the static random access memory market, communications-chip maker Cypress Semiconductor said Thursday.

SRAM memory is faster than dynamic random access memory, the most common type used in personal computers. SRAM is found in relatively small quantities in PCs, it's also used in disk drives, communications equipment and networking gear.

In a statement, Cypress said it will fully support the investigation.

A Justice Department spokeswoman could not immediately be reached to confirm the start of the investigation or comment on its scope.

A separate DOJ investigation into price-fixing among DRAM companies has so far resulted in more than a dozen charges against individuals and more than $731 million in fines against Samsung Electronics Co., Elpida Memory Inc., Infineon Technologies AG and Hynix Semiconductor Inc.

Cypress shares lost 78 cents, or more than 3.8 percent, to $19.34, in Thursday trading on the Nasdaq Stock Market.

US DoJ Launches Probe Into S-Ram Pricing (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner In Washington And Chris Nuttall In San Francisco

Financial Times, October 13, 2006

The US Department of Justice has launched an investigation into possible price-fixing in the market for electronic memory chips, known as S-Ram. Companies contacted in connection to the probe include Samsung, the South Korean chipmaker, Cypress Semiconductor and Micron Technology.

The investigation comes just one year after Samsung, the leader in the S-Ram market, pleaded guilty and paid a $300m fine for its role in an international conspiracy to fix prices in the D-Ram chip market, marking the second-largest criminal antitrust fine in history.

That probe ultimately ensnared four companies and 13 individuals and elicited $731m in fines.

Samsung and Micron both said they had received subpoenas in connection to S-Ram sales and marketing and were co-operating with prosecutors. But Micron added that it did not believe it was a target of the investigation. The company received amnesty in the justice department's D-Ram investigation because of its co-operation.

Cypress said it would make available employees, documents and all other relevant information to the DoJ's antitrust division to support the investigation.

The news of the probe, just one day after the DoJ approved without any conditions the takeover of BellSouth by AT&T, underscores the two-pronged approach the Bush administration has taken on antitrust matters.

While critics contend that competition authorities have given the green light to a number of mega-mergers with few conditions, including two AT&T deals, the DoJ has also markedly ramped up its prosecution of price-fixing cases.

Unlike the D-Ram price- fixing conspiracy, which officials said forced companies such as Hewlett-Packard to increase the price of personal computers, the S-Ram market is much smaller, with sales of less than $3bn forecast this year.

DOJ Probes SRAM Market (THESTREET)

By Alexei Oreskovic, TheStreet.com Staff Reporter

TheStreet.com, October 13, 2006

Cypress Semiconductor said it is cooperating with the Justice Department in an investigation into the SRAM memory-chip market.

In a short statement released Thursday, Cypress said the DOJ's antitrust division had notified the company that there will be an investigation into the SRAM market. Cypress said it will make available its employees, documents and all other relevant information to the government to fully support the investigation.

Shares of San Jose, Calif.-based Cypress were down 3.5%, or 70 cents, at $19.42 in midday trading.

News of the investigation marks a new phase in the government's probe of computer-memory makers. For several years, the Justice Department has been investigating price fixing in the market for DRAM, the standard type of memory chips used in personal computers. SRAM memory, which is faster and more expensive than DRAM, is used for specialty purposes like a microprocessor's cache.

The DRAM probe has so far resulted in jail sentences for executives at Samsung, Hynix Semiconductor and Infineon Technologies (IFX - news - Cramer's Take), as well as more than $700 million in fines.

That investigation centers on collusion between executives at various chipmakers to set the price of DRAM chips between 1999 and 2002.

Cypress didn't disclose whether the new SRAM probe was focused on price-fixing or on different issues. A representative of the Justice Department's antitrust division was not immediately available for comment.

Justice Probing SRAM Industry (MERCN)

By Scott Duke Harris

The San Jose Mercury News, October 13, 2006

The U.S. Department of Justice, which already cracked down on price-fixing in one part of the memory chip industry, is now scrutinizing the possibility of anti-competitive practices in another, the agency confirmed Thursday.

San Jose-based Cypress Semiconductor, the world's third-largest producer of static random-access memory chips, said it was cooperating with the investigation. Other industry leaders include Korea-based Samsung, Japan-based NEC and Toshiba, and Micron Technnology, of Boise, Idaho, but none of the other companies mentioned the investigation.

In a press release, Cypress said it ``would make available employees, documents and all other relevant information to the U.S. Department of Justice's Antitrust Division to fully support the investigation."

Cypress spokesman Don Parkman declined further comment. Cypress shares lost 41 cents, or more than 2 percent, to $19.71, in Thursday trading. IDT, a relatively small SRAM producer also based in San Jose, has not been contacted by federal investigators, said company spokesman Chad Taggart.

The probe comes on the heels of a previous federal antitrust crackdown on a larger part of the memory chip industry involving DRAM, or dynamic random-access memory. That investigation resulted in more than a dozen charges against individuals and more than $731 million in fines against Samsung, Elpida Memory, Infineon Technologies and Hynix Semiconductor. California was among 34 states that in July sued seven DRAM manufacturers for allegedly fixing prices on chips that store data in personal computers and other gadgets. Cypress is not in the DRAM business.

Gina Talamona, a Department of Justice spokeswoman, confirmed the probbe but declined to say whether the investigation was focused on price-fixing, dumping or other practices, and declined to identify companies under scrutiny.

The new investigation surprised some industry observers. ``In DRAM, that price-fixing had an affect on consumers worldwide," said Mark DeVoss, a memory chip analyst with iSuppli. ``The SRAM content is so small, how much can anybody be hurt by price-fixing?"

The cost to consumers of SRAM, DeVoss said, is less apparent. An SRAM chip is more powerful than a DRAM chip, but the SRAM function is increasingly moving from discrete semiconductors to more complex devices, known as a system-on-a-chip. As a result, the SRAM market is ``flat to down," with DeVoss forecasting a 7 percent annual decline in the coming years.

The SRAM chip market in 2005 was measured at between $1.4 billion and $2.7 billion, depending on if it included the so-called pseudo-SRAM chips that are often used in cell phones, said DeVoss. That compared to a $24.8 billion DRAM market, projected to reach $30 billion this year, he said.

SRAM is a high-speed chip that ``for mission critical operations," DeVoss said. DRAM are low-performance chips that store data while a device is turned on, and in computers store programs in main memory.

FCC Chief Martin Delays AT&T Vote, Looks For Support (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Molly Peterson

Bloomberg, October 13, 2006

Oct. 12 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. Federal Communications Commission Chairman Kevin Martin delayed today's scheduled vote on AT&T Inc.'s purchase of BellSouth Corp., a sign he needs more time to win approval of the $79 billion transaction.

The FCC meeting on the merger was postponed to tomorrow while Martin and fellow Republican Commissioner Deborah Tate try to win over the panel's Democrats. AT&T lobbyist Robert Quinn said today that the San Antonio-based company is open to some conditions on the purchase to secure votes.

Rescheduling gives Martin and Tate an extra day to negotiate with Democrat members Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein, who criticized yesterday's Justice Department backing of the deal without conditions. The fifth commissioner, Republican Robert McDowell, has said he expects to be barred from voting because of his past work as a lobbyist.

``It does appear that the Democrats are holding up this decision for added concessions from AT&T," said Coleman Bazelon, vice president of Analysis Group, an economic and financial consulting company.

Shares of AT&T, the largest U.S. phone company, rose 37 cents to $33.33 at 10:34 a.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading and had gained 35 percent this year before today. Shares of BellSouth, the third biggest, gained 57 cents to $44.01 in New York trading and had risen 60 percent.

Final Hurdle

``We will negotiate all night if we have to," AT&T's Quinn told reporters in Washington. ``I fear if we don't get it done, election-year politics will take over everything."

An impasse between the FCC's Democrats and Republicans could delay a vote until the end of the month, in part because Martin is scheduled to go to China next week, said Blair Levin, a Stifel, Nicolaus & Co. analyst, in a note to investors.

``If so, the FCC may not be able to act before late October," Levin wrote.

The FCC is the last regulatory hurdle AT&T must surmount before it can complete the deal. Martin last month circulated a proposed order to approve the sale without conditions.

The draft was a starting point for talks and doesn't mean the acquisition will sail through without requirements imposed by the commission.

Rising Competition

AT&T is expanding to meet competition for phone customers from cable-television providers such as Comcast Corp. and Internet-based companies including Vonage Holdings Inc. They have created enough rivalry that regulators can support the combination of two large telephone companies, the Justice Department said yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0080400

The purchase will increase AT&T's local-phone service area to 22 states. Atlanta-based BellSouth sells local-phone service in nine southeastern states.

The deal also would give AT&T full ownership of Cingular Wireless LLC. Atlanta-based Cingular, the largest U.S. mobile-phone carrier, is now jointly owned by AT&T and BellSouth.

In approving the transaction, the Justice Department said the deal probably won't ``substantially'' reduce competition.

``The presence of other competitors, changing regulatory requirements and the emergence of new technologies in markets for residential, local and long-distance service indicate that this transaction is not likely to harm consumer welfare,'' Thomas Barnett, the department's antitrust chief, said in an e-mailed statement.

FCC Delays AT&T-BellSouth Vote (MRKTWTCH)

By Jeffry Bartash

Market Watch, October 13, 2006

Agency to meet Friday; Justice Dept. has cleared merger

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) - The Federal Communications Commission delayed until Friday a vote on AT&T Inc.'s $80 billion acquisition of BellSouth Corp., suggesting the agency's commissioners are still negotiating over whether to add conditions to the deal.

The FCC had been expected to vote Thursday on the merger, which will create the largest U.S. telecommunications provider.

The delay comes after antitrust regulators at the U.S. Justice Department approved the transaction on Wednesday, saying the merger - initially valued at $67 billion when it was unveiled in March -- is likely to benefit consumers.

The Justice Department said the deal would not hurt competition "substantially" in any part of the U.S. communications industry, and they didn't require the companies to sell off any assets or attach other conditions.

That decision was blasted by consumer groups and some Democrats, who accused the department of "rubberstamping" the merger. They urged the FCC to add conditions designed to protect customers.

AT&T, formerly known as SBC Communications, is the largest long-distance operator in the U.S. and the dominant local phone provider in California, Texas and the Southwest.

BellSouth and AT&T already co-own Cingular Wireless, the biggest mobile operator in the U.S. The combined entity would cater to 70 million local phone customers in 22 states, mostly in the South, Midwest and far West.

It would also serve 10 million broadband Internet users and employ more than 300,000 workers.

The company's total revenue would exceed $120 billion and an enlarged AT&T would have a market value of more than $200 billion.

The delay at the FCC suggests that Kevin Martin, the Republican who chairs the commission, and the four other commissioners - two Republicans and two Democrats - are still negotiating whether to attach conditions to its approval.

The Justice Department was widely expected to approve the deal, although there was some question as to whether the agency would require the two companies to sell off some wireless spectrum or special high-speed access lines that serve business customers.

"After thoroughly investigating AT&T's proposed acquisition of BellSouth, the antitrust division determined that the proposed transaction is not likely to reduce competition substantially," said Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general, in a DOJ statement.

FCC urged to intervene

Opponents of the deal blasted the Justice Department and called for the FCC to impose tough conditions to prevent harm to customers.

"The government has been deceived before by false promises that mergers of potential competitors benefit the public," said Gene Kimmelman, senior vice president for Consumers Union. "It should not be fooled again."

Critics had also urged Congress to block the deal, saying it would reduce competition and raise costs for homes and businesses. Although several top lawmakers in both parties sent letters to regulators questioning aspects of the merger and requesting a delay, Congress has mostly been silent on the matter.

The phone companies, for their part, insisted they could offer better services at lower prices if they were allowed to combine. They are spending billions of dollars to upgrade their networks to deliver improved wireless coverage, superfast Internet access and pay-television service over fiber-optic lines.

"AT&T is focused on bringing more video choices and next-generation broadband services to as many consumers as possible and our merger with BellSouth will help deliver these benefits to more consumers, more quickly," AT&T General Counsel James D. Ellis said in a statement.

Frenzy of mergers

Since the historic Telecommunications Act of 1996, which partially freed the industry from extensive regulation, phone companies have merged or gone out of business at a dizzying pace amid a severe boom-and-bust cycle.

The 10 leading phone companies a decade ago -- AT&T, MCI, Sprint and the seven Baby Bells created by the 1984 breakup of the old Ma Bell -- are set to be reduced to just four: AT&T Inc., Verizon Communications, Sprint Nextel Corp. and, to a lesser extent, Qwest Communications International Inc. A host of smaller regional players also exist.

Yet pricing trends do not entirely bear out the claims of opponents or supporters of phone-industry mergers.

Local rates are somewhat higher now compared to 10 years ago, while long-distance prices have flattened out lately after years of sharp decline. Wireless prices, meanwhile, fell sharply after the late 1990s and Internet-access costs have plummeted in recent years.

Because competition is still intense, regulatory analysts have long predicted that the AT&T-BellSouth merger would pass regulatory muster with few conditions attached. The companies compete directly in very few markets.

At the same time, the cable industry is increasingly moving into the phone business while Verizon Communications and Sprint Nextel Corp. are challenging AT&T in the wireless and corporate-services.

The Justice Department concurred with that assessment.

"The presence of other competitors, changing regulatory requirements and the emergence of new technologies in markets for residential local and long distance service indicate that this transaction is not likely to harm consumer welfare," Barnett said.

AT&T and BellSouth have already won approval for their merger in all U.S. states in which they have a large presence. Foreign countries in which AT&T operates have also approved the deal. Jeffry Bartash is a reporter for MarketWatch in Washington.

AT&T Purchase Prompts Claim U.S. Tries To Avoid Court Review (BLOOM)

By James Rowley

Bloomberg, October 13, 2006

Oct. 13 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Justice Department's decision to approve without conditions AT&T Inc.'s $79 billion takeover of BellSouth Corp. has triggered complaints that the agency tailored its clearance to avoid judicial scrutiny.

Consumer groups and Democratic lawmakers say the department tried to head off a court review that would have been mandatory were conditions attached. The accusation caused at least a temporary delay in approval of the deal by the Federal Communications Commission.

Senator Patrick Leahy, a Vermont Democrat who co-sponsored a 2004 law calling for more detailed judicial review of mergers, accused the Justice Department of ``thumbing its nose at Congress and the courts'' by unconditionally permitting the deal. Leahy noted that lawmakers in both parties urged the Justice Department to wait until a court fight over two 2005 mergers was resolved before clearing the latest combination.

``The Bush administration has embraced the political agenda of the largest phone and cable companies,'' said Jeff Chester, executive director of the Center for Digital Democracy, a Washington consumer advocacy group.

The Justice Department defended its approval of the combination of San Antonio-based AT&T and Atlanta-based BellSouth, saying it found the deal posed no harm to competition that needed to be remedied.

The agency's antitrust enforcers are engaged in a protracted court battle over conditions imposed last year when the government cleared New York-based Verizon Communications Inc.'s purchase of MCI Inc. and SBC Communications Inc.'s acquisition of AT&T Corp. SBC changed its name to AT&T Inc. after the 2005 deal.

Earlier Transactions

U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan in Washington is examining those transactions. Two industry groups challenged the remedies as insufficient to preserve competition for business- phone service.

Sullivan ``exposed fundamental flaws'' and ``probably embarrassed'' the Justice Department by asking common-sense questions, said Gene Kimmelman, Washington director of Consumers Union.

The sponsors of the 2004 legislation said it is intended to ensure that judges don't act as rubber stamps when reviewing merger decisions. The Bush administration has generally taken a business-friendly approach in clearing such transactions.

Congress ``thought things had tilted too far towards virtually complete deference'' to the government, said Stephen Calkins, who teaches antitrust law at Detroit's Wayne State University.

At a July 12 hearing in the 2005 phone company mergers, Sullivan made his position clear: He said he wanted everyone to know ``I am not a rubber stamp.''

Economic Harm

DOJ_NMG_0080402

Under the 2004 law, federal judges now must determine whether settlements between the Justice Department and merging companies are pro-competitive and prevent economic harm.

Before the changes, judges had wider discretion to sign off on any deals they determined were in the ``public interest.'' They are now required to apply a set of factors before making that determination.

Sullivan, an appointee of President Bill Clinton, ordered the government to provide more information about its investigation of last year's twin phone mergers. He wants to know whether the Justice Department's requirement that the combined company lease excess fiber-optic cable serving office buildings in 19 cities will restore lost competition for business services.

Two trade groups representing customers and competitors such as Reston, Virginia-based Sprint Nextel Corp. and Chicago-based XO Holdings Inc. argued that the sale of the cable -- which the merging companies weren't planning to use anyway -- isn't sufficient.

``That remedy does nothing at all,'' said Jonathan Lee, a lawyer for Comptel, a Washington trade group challenging the government's remedies. It's ``like leasing some unused couch in your garage,'' Lee said. ``No one is using it.''

Customer Lists

The groups also said the government should have required the merged companies to sell customer lists and support operations to help others compete for business customers.

The latest phone company combination, between AT&T and BellSouth, still must be approved by the Federal Communications Commission, which meets today to vote on it. FCC Chairman Kevin Martin postponed a scheduled vote yesterday after two Democrats on the commission criticized the Justice Department decision to impose no conditions.

The takeover would combine two of the former regional operating companies of the original AT&T, or ``Ma Bell,'' which was broken up in 1984 by a judicial decree that concluded a landmark government antitrust case.

Scott Cleland, an industry analyst and chief executive officer of Washington research firm Precursor LLC, said criticism of all three telecommunications deals is misplaced.

`Ridiculous Proposition'

To suggest more stringent remedies are needed ``is a ridiculous proposition'' because ``rapidly evolving technology and innovating markets'' will ensure more competition, he said. He also questioned the notion that the government's decision was motivated by any desire to avoid another court fight. ``When people allege that, they are placing a motive that may or may not be there,'' he said.

Congress attached the judicial review requirement to the 1974 Tunney Act, which was enacted after the Watergate scandal and allegations that political contributions influenced a Justice Department antitrust case. The agency was accused of dropping a demand that International Telephone and Telegraph Co. divest ownership of the Hartford Fire Insurance Co. after an IT&T unit donated to the Republican Party.

AT&T-BellSouth Deal Hinges On Democrats (AP)

By John Dunbar, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- If the Federal Communications Commission votes as planned on AT&T Inc.'s acquisition of BellSouth Corp. on Friday, it means the agency's Republican chairman compromised with two outspoken Democrats who sought significant changes in the deal.

Past comments from Democratic commissioners Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein and word from people familiar with the negotiations suggest points to some of the remaining unresolved issues, including:

-"network neutrality," which deals with whether Internet service providers must provide equal treatment to all traffic on their networks.

-"interconnection," or the right to access an incumbent telephone company's network.

-a possible divestiture of some of BellSouth's wireless broadband spectrum holdings.

Copps and Adelstein are in an unusually strong position on the five-member commission, which has three Republicans. One of those GOP commissioners, Robert McDowell, is a potential tie-breaking vote who has withdraw from the case because he was a lobbyist who representing competitors of AT&T and BellSouth.

Republican Deborah Taylor Tate is expected to vote with the agency chairman, Kevin Martin, in favor of the acquisition.

The FCC is the last major regulatory hurdle for the deal. The Justice Department on Wednesday approved AT&T's purchase without any conditions.

When the deal was originally announced, it was worth about $67 billion. But the rising price of AT&T's stock has pushed the value of the deal to $80.8 billion at the close of trading Thursday.

The deal would extend AT&T's dominance as the biggest provider of phone, wireless and broadband Internet services.

After the Justice Department's decision, Adelstein denounced it as "a reckless abandonment" of the department's responsibility to protect consumers and smaller businesses.

The FCC vote was scheduled for Thursday, but was pushed back a day so Martin had more time to negotiate with the two Democrats.

There still was a chance Martin could ask McDowell to vote, but only if the FCC's general counsel determines the former lobbyist does not have a conflict of interest.

Much can be learned from what Copps and Adelstein said after they approved the Verizon Communications Inc.-MCI Inc. and AT&T Corp.-SBC Communications Inc. mergers.

For example, on the network neutrality issue, they wrote: "Consumers will have an enforceable right to use their bandwidth as they see fit, going where they choose and running the applications they want on the Internet."

Jessica Zufolo, an independent equity analyst with Medley Global Advisors, said the commissioners probably would argue for strong interconnection requirements from AT&T. Telephone service offered by a cable company must be able to connect with a wireline provider to stay in business.

Zufolo said that interconnection standards need to be affirmed to include cable voice-over-internet and other entrants such as Vonage. She said some telephone companies, large and small are "very actively pushing back against the onslaught and growth" of such communication.

There may also be a discussion about divesting BellSouth's radio spectrum holdings in the 2.5 GHz band, which could be used by independent competitors to offer a wireless broadband option. AT&T would not have much incentive to offer a broadband service that competes with its own DSL (digital subscriber line) service.

AT&T would not discuss the negotiations. A company spokesman, Michael Balmoris, said "it's always been our position that we would accept any reasonable conditions in order to obtain approval from the commission."

Mother And Child Reunion (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

Twenty-two years ago the government broke up AT&T, creating the regional baby bells. So there was much irony in the decision this week by the Justice Department Antitrust Division to allow Ma Bell to reunite with one of its most profitable step-children: BellSouth.

Approving this $78.5 billion deal was the right call. The merger will give AT&T the added scope and scale to invest billions of dollars into building out the nation's telecommunications/broadband infrastructure. The U.S. currently ranks 19th in the world in broadband penetration -- a constraint on America's global competitiveness. The companies' shareholders are also big beneficiaries of the deal. BellSouth's stock value has risen 40% since the merger was announced in March, a $20 billion increase in shareholder wealth based on investor calculations of the business synergies.

Assistant Attorney General Thomas Barnett got it mostly right when he declared that, thanks to the combination of existing corporate competitors and emerging technologies, "the proposed transaction is not likely to reduce competition substantially." A strong case can be made that the merger won't reduce competition at all. Why? Because AT&T plans to use the merger to hasten its penetration in the Southeast into DSL Internet service and cable TV -- where competitive forces have been lacking and prices charged to homeowners artificially inflated. The biggest opponents of the merger are precisely such cable companies as Comcast and Internet firms that fear this new entrant into the market.

Last year the feds approved the AT&T merger with SBC and the acquisition of MCI by Verizon. Consumer groups predicted these new telecom behemoths would engage in predatory pricing and other anti-consumer behavior -- precisely the charges that are being made now. But according to FCC data, DSL and wireless service costs have declined in the year since those mergers were consummated.

Now the fate of the AT&T-BellSouth marriage lies in the hands of the Federal Communications Commission, which may decide as soon as today whether to agree to the deal. FCC Chairman Kevin Martin favors the deal but he may not have enough votes on the commission to prevail. One worry is that the two Democratic Commissioners may insist on onerous conditions such as price controls on AT&T services, prohibitions against bundling telecom services, and even so-called net neutrality to "protect" consumers by blocking phone companies from charging for access to their Internet pipes.

But the best way to help consumers is to allow the business scale and return on investment that will bring the information superhighway into the living room of every home and business in America. That appears much more likely to happen -- and more quickly -- with this merger than without it.

A Growing Free-for-All (NYT)

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0080404

By approving the merger between AT&T and BellSouth unconditionally, the Bush administration has again abdicated responsibility for protecting consumers when huge companies combine.

Fierce competition between private companies is at the core of the nation's economic strength. But government still has an important role to play as referee, making sure that the rough-and-tumble game of capitalism doesn't become perversely uncompetitive through significant concentrations of market power in the hands of a few companies.

From the very start, the Bush administration's approach to antitrust and merger policy has been much more hands-off than its predecessors'. In an era of rapid consolidation and deregulation, the Justice Department hasn't brought a single major monopoly case under the Sherman Antitrust Act since the Clinton administration went after Microsoft for illegally defending its monopoly for the Windows operating system. The department settled that case during President Bush's first year in office.

That set the tone for a merger policy that often appears to be little more than "anything goes." One gets the impression at times that the referee has left the playing field.

Perhaps the clearest example came earlier this year when the department cleared Whirlpool's $1.7 billion acquisition of Maytag, which gave the combined company up to three-quarters of the market for some home appliances. As Stephen Labaton reported in The Times shortly thereafter, that decision actually demoralized career officials in the department's antitrust division.

Not only has the government failed to bring many significant cases, it is opposing one brought and won by a third party. The Supreme Court will hear a case in which a jury found that Weyerhaeuser monopolized a market for logs in the Pacific Northwest. The Bush administration filed a brief asking the court to reverse the decision, already upheld on appeal.

A federal district judge is reviewing the antitrust settlements that previously allowed SBC Communications to acquire AT&T and Verizon to buy MCI. But by approving the AT&T-BellSouth merger without a single condition, the Justice Department has allowed this one to avoid judicial review.

That leaves the Federal Communications Commission. The commission has scheduled a meeting to discuss the merger today. It should take a long, hard look at the deal, and the overall trend toward consolidation in the telecommunications industry. There are strong arguments that competition with cable companies and Internet phone services have changed the playing field. But the commissioners should pursue the question thoroughly rather than wielding a rubber stamp as the Justice Department sometimes appears to. They must think first about protecting consumers, while bearing in mind that bigger is not always better.

Five Multiple Listing Services Agree To Equal Treatment For Discount Brokers (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

The Federal Trade Commission said yesterday that five regional real estate listing services had agreed to treat listings from discount brokers no differently than those from traditional agents.

The commission also said that it would pursue administrative cases against two Detroit multiple listing services. It says the two services either do not allow discount brokers' listings or refuse to send them to other real estate Web sites.

The announcement suggests that regulators are making headway in their campaign to deal with practices in the real estate industry that they say have reduced competition and supported high sales commissions.

More than a year ago, the Justice Department sued the National Association of Realtors, the large trade group for real estate agents, charging violations of antitrust rules. That case is still pending.

At its crux, the F.T.C. case is about the power real estate agents exercise through their control of regional home listing services, which are often the dominant and most comprehensive databases of homes for sale in an area. There are 900 such systems nationwide, and most are controlled by local Realtors.

Theoretically any real estate agent can list homes on the systems for a fixed fee, but many operators bar or restrict "exclusive agency listings," which are popular with discount brokers. Under these listings, home sellers enter into contracts with agents to list and try to sell their properties but keep the right to sell their homes themselves without having to pay a sales commission. These so-called limited-service brokers often charge commissions less than the 5 percent industry average or they refund a portion of the fee to their clients.

By contrast, under traditional listings popular with Realtors, home owners agree to pay agents regardless of who sells the home. The fees are negotiated, but they typically range from 4.5 percent to 6 percent of the sales price.

"The rules these brokers made drove up costs and reduced the choice for consumers, and they violated federal law," Jeffrey Schmidt, director of the F.T.C.'s competition bureau, said in a statement.

Officials at Realcomp II and MiRealSource, the two Michigan listing services, could not be reached for comment yesterday.

The settlement with the five firms — which are based in Colorado, New Hampshire, New Jersey, Virginia and Wisconsin — requires the systems to carry exclusive agency and other lawful listings without any restrictions. The commission recently reached a similar deal with a Realtor group in Austin, Tex.

DOJ_NMG_0080405

The National Association of Realtors said it disagreed with the F.T.C.'s characterization of listing services, noting that the systems assist competition by making it easy for buyers to search for homes. But officials for the group added that the settlements with the five firms indicated that the government might now be amenable to reaching a national deal with the industry.

The trade group has reached out to the agency twice before in an effort to "craft an industrywide solution" to concerns over listings, Laurie Janik, general counsel for the trade group, said in a statement. "We understand that the F.T.C. is now looking at the possibility of taking N.A.R. up on its offer to address this issue."

FTC Targets Real Estate For Alleged Unfair Practices (INMAN)

Agency files complaints against 2 Michigan MLSs, announces agreements with 5 others

The U.S. Federal Trade Commission today announced litigation against two multiple listing services and settlements with five other MLSs based on policies restricting a classification of property listings.

The five consent agreements resolve separate investigations against the MLSs over similar policies that prohibited the display of certain property listings on some home-search Web sites, and the litigation targets two MLSs in Michigan that have refused to withdraw similar policies.

Several other MLSs are also under investigation for similar policies, said Jeffrey Schmidt, director of the FTC's Bureau of Competition. But he did not provide specifics about how many investigations are pending, and whether the FTC would take actions against those MLSs.

Today's announcement marks the latest in a series of FTC and U.S. Justice Department actions against alleged anti-competitive practices in the real estate industry. The agencies have also opposed state measures that seek to establish a range of minimum service required for all real estate professionals, at least for some types of agreements for representation in a real estate transaction.

And the Justice Department is engaged in an antitrust lawsuit with the National Association of Realtors trade group over the association's policies for the online display and sharing of property listings information.

For most of the FTC actions announced today, the agency took issue with policies that prevent the display of property information at some home-search Web sites when MLS members entered into "exclusive agency" agreements with home sellers.

Under an exclusive agency agreement, property owners have the right to sell a property without extensive help from the listing broker and are not required to pay the broker if they directly locate a buyer for the property. Meanwhile, the MLSs did not place similar restrictions on the more popularly used "exclusive right to sell" agreement, under which sellers must pay the broker a commission when the property is sold.

According to the FTC, exclusive agency agreements are "often used by home sellers who do not wish to purchase the full range of brokerage services. Under an exclusive agency listing agreement, the listing broker often charges an up-front fee, but may receive a reduced commission, or no commission at all if the owner sells the property without the broker's further help."

Officials at MLSs that have adopted such rules have said that the rules aim to prevent MLSs from hosting for-sale-by-owner transactions in which the MLS member has little or no involvement in the transaction. The MLS, they have said, is intended to facilitate cooperation among its members and not to assist with direct home sales between a buyer and seller who may not use the professional services of an MLS member.

The FTC filed administrative complaints against Realcomp II Ltd., a corporation owned by several Realtor boards and associations in Michigan that has about 14,800 members, and broker-owned MIRealSource Inc., which has about 7,000 members.

Karen Kage, CEO for Realcomp II Ltd., said today that the action "is not unexpected." The MLS passed a rule in 2004 that prohibits exclusive agency listings from reaching popular property-search site Realtor.com, an MLS-owned property-search site at MoveInMichigan.com, and all of its members' sites that feature property information through a data-sharing agreement with other brokers.

National Association of Realtors-affiliated Realtor.com consistently ranks among the top property-search sites for consumer traffic on the Web.

"I feel very firmly that consumers do have choices and we're not taking away those choices. There are a lot of Web sites out there where listings can be published for free or for a fee, so we don't feel we're taking away consumers' choices," Kage said.

DOJ_NMG_0080406

The FTC complaint against Realcomp II charges that the MLS has violated antitrust laws in adopting "policies that limit the publication and marketing of certain properties," and states that "these policies discriminate against certain kinds of lawful contracts between listing real estate brokers and their customers, and lack any pro-competitive justification."

Another complaint, against MiRealSource Inc., charges that the MLS adopted "a series of rules designed to thwart competition by firms using alternative business models," including an August 2003 rule that prevents the MLS from accepting any listings to the MLS other than exclusive-right-to-sell listings.

The complaint also alleges that the MLS "was well aware that … alternative business models used exclusive agency listings to offer a menu of services that a home seller could choose from at a significantly lower price" and that the MLS "believed that these alternative business models were gaining ground with home sellers and home buyers during this time period and adopted rules in response to this additional competition."

Officials at MiRealSource had no comment today about the complaint.

The complaints against the Michigan MLSs will by heard by administrative law judges for the commission unless the FTC reaches settlement with the MLSs prior to trial.

The FTC also announced complaints and consent orders with Information and Real Estate Services LLC of Loveland, Colo.; Northern New England Real Estate Network Inc. of Concord, N.H.; Williamsburg Area Association of Realtors Inc. of Williamsburg, Va.; Realtors Association of Northeast Wisconsin Inc. of Appleton, Wis.; and Monmouth County Association of Realtors Inc. of Tinton Falls, N.J.

Consent orders for these five MLSs are subject to a 30-day public comment period before the FTC can finalize the orders.

Schmidt, of the FTC, said that the FTC actions seek to stop abuse and discrimination by MLSs against some members. "This is not an attack against the real estate industry as a whole," he said, and is intended "to protect consumers and the choices they have in a real estate transaction."

He added, "There is no doubt about it -- increased competition in every industry, including real estate, leads to more choices, better prices and increased services for consumers. This isn't about the FTC saying that one form of brokerage is better than another -- our point is that consumers should have a choice as to what they want, what they need."

Charles Melidosian, vice president and chief information officer for the Baird & Warner real estate company in Chicago and a member of the MLS of Northern Illinois, one of the largest MLSs in the country, said of the FTC actions, "At times I think the FTC steps a little bit too far. I don't like the fact that the FTC is stepping in and forcing lower-cost service providers to leverage the resources of higher-cost service providers."

He also said, "If someone has a new business model, go for it. Develop your own Web site. Develop your own MLS for all practical purposes. But for the federal government to come in and say MLSs who have invested a significant amount of money and time to develop these services … to force it to accept anyone and everyone to market within the MLS, I think is unfair competition.

"The next step is then 'Why can't the consumer put their listings directly in the MLS and pay nothing?' At some point you need to draw the line what is fair business practices versus healthy competition," Melidosian said.

Derek Eisenberg, a real estate broker and creator of MultipleListingSystem.com in Hackensack, N.J., has opposed the exclusive agency restrictions. "The MLS position is without merit. Their assertions that they are doing it to avoid promoting FSBOs are absurd," as addresses are typically not published for listings submitted through MLSs in his market area and there are typically no notations in the public property descriptions that suggest that a property is an exclusive agency listing, he said. "Buyers finding an (exclusive agency) owner would be like searching for a needle in a haystack."

In a statement today, National Association of Realtors officials said they have "continued to reach out to the Federal Trade Commission in an attempt to address FTC concerns regarding the treatment of exclusive agency listings."

"MLSs are a powerful force for competition," said Laurie Janik, NAR general counsel, in a statement. The announcement states, "Janik has been attempting to work with the FTC for a number of months on the inquiries into the activities the FTC views as being in violation of antitrust laws."

And NAR president Thomas M. Stevens said in a statement, "Working with the industry to develop constructive solutions is not something the FTC is accustomed to doing, and it is rewarding to see that our efforts to develop a cooperative relationship may be paying off. The result will be, we hope, the elimination of duplicative actions such as consent orders."

Homeowners Get More Access To MLS (BLOOM)

By James Rowley

Bloomberg, October 13, 2006

Real estate multiple-listing services in five states, including Colorado, agreed to drop rules that the U.S. Federal Trade Commission charged hurt competition from discount brokers.

The FTC announced the settlements as it accused two Detroit-area multiple-listing services of breaking antitrust law by barring sellers who hire discount brokers from advertising their homes on popular Web sites.

"The rules these brokers made drove up costs and reduced choice for consumers, and they violated federal law," Jeffrey Schmidt, head of the FTC's Bureau of Competition, said in a statement.

Discount brokers charge a fee for listing a property with a local multiple-listing service and may not offer the full range of services that traditional brokers provide home sellers. Full- service brokers show homes to prospective buyers and negotiate the sale with the buyer's broker.

Traditional brokers require clients to sign an agreement that authorizes them to be the exclusive agent to sell the property. Agreements with discount brokers give homeowners the ability to sell the home without help from the listing agent, the FTC said.

Internet advertising of homes "has blossomed since 2000," Schmidt said, citing a National Association of Realtors survey that found that 77 percent of home buyers used the Web to search for new homes.

The FTC brought administrative complaints against two multiple-listing services in southeastern Michigan that together serve almost 22,000 member brokers. The cases will be tried before an administrative law judge.

"What we are talking about is a group of competitors getting together, creating a rule that harms rivals and harms consumers in the process," Schmidt told reporters in Washington.

The FTC negotiated settlements, identical to one it reached in July with a multiple-listing service in Austin, Texas, with listing services based in Loveland, Colorado; Williamsburg, Virginia; Concord, New Hampshire; Tinton Falls, New Jersey, and Appleton, Wisconsin.

Schmidt said the FTC was seeking an agreement with the National Association of Realtors to get its member brokers to lift such restrictions. Not all multiple-listing services are associated with the realtors' trade group, he said.

One of the two Detroit-area multiple-listing services is not affiliated with the trade group, he said. That service barred any multiple listings by clients of discount brokers, in addition to barring them from being posted on Web sites.

Real Estate Groups Settle FTC Complaint (WP)

By Dina Elboghdady

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

The Federal Trade Commission yesterday said groups representing thousands of real estate agents in five states have agreed to drop practices that hampered rival discount brokers from posting home-sale listings on Internet sites.

In a meeting with reporters, FTC regulators also said they are suing two more groups in the Detroit suburbs -- Realcomp II Ltd. and MiRealSource Inc. -- over similar allegedly anti-competitive practices.

The FTC's actions are the latest step in an ongoing struggle between traditional full-service real estate agents (who typically earn 5 to 6 percent in commission on each house they sell) and their newer rivals, firms that offer limited services for a lower commission, mostly on the Internet. At stake are tens of billions of dollars in real estate commissions.

Each side is accusing the other of doing a disservice to consumers. The traditional firms say their rivals often offer poor service and leave consumers in the lurch. In recent years, they have pressed several states to enact laws that force nontraditional agents to offer a wider array of services. Newcomers say that practice is designed to stifle competition and allow real estate agents to charge excessive commissions.

Yesterday, the FTC said it is not endorsing one model over the other or trying to attack the real estate industry as a whole.

"Our aim is to provide consumers with as many choices as the marketplace can provide," said Jeffrey Schmidt, director of the FTC's bureau of competition.

Some antitrust experts say the aggressive role the FTC has taken signals a possible shake-up ahead for an industry that has long clung to its way of doing business. The newer firms generally offer a la carte services, such as entering a listing but not holding open houses, for reduced commissions or flat fees.

"The industry will either undergo a revolution where you will see brokers' fees go down and alternate business models thrive or incumbents will prevail," said Mike Cowie, a former FTC official who is now a lawyer at Howrey LLP.

At the center of the issue are multiple-listing services, cooperatives formed by real estate brokers in which all their properties for sale are lumped together in one database. Most of the nation's 900 multiple-listing services display members' listings on Internet sites that can be accessed by the public.

The five companies that settled with the FTC yesterday were all charged with barring the listings of some competitors from appearing on the public Web sites, though they did allow them on Web sites open only to agents. The companies did not admit to violating the law but agreed not to engage in those practices.

DOJ_NMG_0080408

Those firms were Information Real Estate Services LLC, based in Loveland, Colo.; Northern New England Real Estate Network Inc., Concord, N.H.; Williamsburg Area Association of Realtors Inc., Williamsburg; Realtors Association of Northeast Wisconsin Inc., Appleton, Wis.; and Monmouth County Association of Realtors Inc., Tinton Falls, N.J.

Of the two Michigan groups that did not settle, Realcomp was accused of the same practice. The FTC alleges that the other group, MiRealSource, will not let alternative agents list on its MLS at all.

Karen Kage, chief executive of Realcomp, said her group did not settle with the FTC because it does not think it discriminates.

"The job of the MLS is to promote cooperation and ensure compensation to our Realtor members," Kage said. "They are the subscribers who pay fees to us to keep us in business. So we don't see that our position should be to promote the sale of properties between consumer and consumer. . . . Our position is to promote properties represented by Realtors to bring the buyer and seller together."

Some of the firms that settled with the FTC also said they did nothing wrong, including the Williamsburg Area Association of Realtors.

Linda Kinsman, the group's chief executive, said the National Association of Realtors provides model governing documents. In 2002, one of these documents included optional language that barred from public Web sites "exclusive agency" listings, in which the seller retains the option to sell the property to a buyer he or she identifies and not pay a commission to the broker. Some limited-service firms use such listings.

Kinsman's group adopted the language but "never implemented the policy and never caused public harm," she said. "We were muscled by the FTC into signing the consent order."

Ralph Holmen, associate general counsel at the National Association of Realtors, said the home seller who operates under an exclusive agency listing is essentially competing against the broker he hired. Any seller who wants to list on the MLS must hire a broker, he said.

"Why should [the seller] get the benefit of being on these public Web sites when in the end, they sell it without paying commission to the brokers?" Holmen said.

Steelmakers Seek New Tie-Ups That Are Short Of True Mergers (WSJ)

By Paul Glader

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

BUENOS AIRES -- Steel companies, particularly in Asia, are finding new ways to link up short of actual mergers, as a way to compete against -- and possibly fend off -- growing industry rivals.

The new agreements include forming joint ventures, taking small investment stakes in other companies and signing technology-licensing agreements. In part, the activity is prompted by the €28 billion ($35.1 billion) combination of Mittal Steel Co. and Arcelor SA earlier this year and India's Tata Steel Ltd.'s announcement last week that it might make a bid that could be valued at more than £5 billion ($9.3 billion) for British steelmaker Corus PLC.

In the wake of these new giants, "everybody is in the middle of brainstorming" to find competitive solutions, said Ku Taek Lee, chief executive and Chairman of South Korea's Posco, the world's third-largest steel producer, which reported 30.5 million metric tons of production last year. Among the options being considered by Posco: increasing its small stakes in other Asian steelmakers, pooling research, co-owning certain operations or linking up to purchase raw materials.

Big deals have increased investor attention on steelmakers, and the companies have plenty of cash on hand thanks to healthy steel prices over the past few years.

But many companies say they want to avoid large deals, either as a target or as the surviving company. For acquirers, stock prices are relatively high, making a deal costly, they say. Others say their corporate cultures are incompatible with those of steelmakers in certain parts of the world, making a merger difficult, or they are wary of political risks. In some cases, companies say they simply don't see acquisitions that would add value, either in terms of the product mix or geographical positions.

Still others are making moves to discourage outside bidders. A move last month by Japan's JFE Steel Corp. to buy $172 million of shares in South Korea's Dongkuk Steel Mill Co., lifting JFE's stake in the company to 15% from 4.09%, was seen by steel analysts as a defensive move. JFE has said the move has nothing to do with other mergers.

Japan's Nippon Steel Corp. is considering several growth and investment options. One is boosting its stakes in fellow Japanese steelmakers Sumitomo Metal Industries Ltd. and Kobe Steel Ltd., or expanding an existing joint relationship with Mittal Steel in North America to make auto-quality steel. "Everything is under study," said Akio Mimura, president of Nippon.

Peter Marcus, a partner in research firm World Steel Dynamics, Englewood Cliffs, N.J., says Asian steelmakers are focused on growth, saying size equals status in Asia. But, he says, Asian steelmakers are generally more wary of large mergers with Western producers and would prefer to grow organically or in ventures with fellow Asian producers. "They are more likely to try joint ventures, partnerships and affiliations," said Mr. Marcus.

John Surma, chairman and CEO of Pittsburgh-based U.S. Steel Corp., says that although the company does have joint ventures with Posco and Russia's OAO Severstal, it prefers acquisitions over partnerships. "Alliances and joint ventures are not always good value creators," he said, indicating they involve more bureaucracy in making decisions and divided interests, at times, on production, profits and future strategies.

Executives at Nucor Corp., based in Charlotte, N.C., say they are open to acquisition possibilities but would rather grow by licensing technologies Nucor is developing, such as new methods for casting thin sheets of steel, with partners abroad.

In Taiwan, China Steel Corp. is considering expanding a joint venture with Japan's Sumitomo Metal Industries and building plants in Taiwan that would about double China Steel's production to nearly 20 million metric tons a year by 2010, up from present capacity of 11 million metric tons.

Rent-Way Nears Vote On Rent-A-Center Deal (AP-YBIZ)

AP, October 13, 2006

Rent-Way Shareholders to Vote Nov. 14 on Takeover by Rent-A-Center

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Shareholders of Rent-Way Inc., a rent-to-own chain operator, will vote Nov. 14 on the company's proposed sale to Rent-A-Center Inc., the largest U.S. furniture rental chain, according to a Thursday filing with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

If the deal is completed, Rent-Way shareholders will be entitled to receive $10.65 per share in cash on the date of the merger, according to the filing.

The companies last month said the deal, which is expected to be completed in the fourth quarter, had received government antitrust clearance. Plano, Texas-based Rent-A-Center will pay about $576 million to buy Rent-Way of Erie, Pa.

Rent-Way's board of directors unanimously approved the agreement and is recommending shareholders vote for its adoption, according to the filing. If the deal is terminated, Rent-Way will be required to pay a termination fee to Rent-A-Center of $17.5 million and up to more than $4.1 million in expenses.

The acquisition would mark an end to Rent-Way's turnaround after an accounting scandal six years ago when founder and CEO William Morgenstern announced that some executives had cooked the company's books to meet Wall Street earnings expectations in the late 1990s.

A federal investigation confirmed that three company officers acted on their own, improperly writing down $98 million in operating expenses. Rent-Way closed a $25 million settlement with shareholders in 2004.

Shares of Rent-Way fell a penny to $10.55 in afternoon trading on the New York Stock Exchange, while Rent-A-Center added 22 cents to $28.88 on the Nasdaq.

E. Coli Strains Match Samples From Ranch (USAT)

By Elizabeth Weise And Julie Schmit

USA Today, October 13, 2006

State and federal investigators came closer to pinpointing the source of the 26-state E. coli outbreak with the discovery of samples matching the deadly strain from a Salinas Valley cattle ranch that also grew spinach, California officials said Thursday.

The outbreak that killed three people and sickened about 200 has been tied to bagged spinach.

Three cattle fecal samples from one of four ranches being investigated were an exact DNA match with the deadly O157:H7 strain, said Kevin Reilly of the California Department of Health Services. Samples from the remaining three ranches are still being tested. Some fields on all four ranches were surrounded by cattle pastures, a common practice in the valley, Reilly said.

Officials were quick to point that the finding doesn't mean they have “a smoking cow.” The method of contamination “is still in question,” Reilly said.

The case marks the first time investigators have traced an E. coli strain identified in an outbreak definitively back to a Salinas Valley ranch. The valley has been implicated in 10 of 17 E. coli O157:H7 outbreaks associated with lettuce or spinach since 1996, according to the Food and Drug Administration.

All spinach implicated in the recent outbreak has been recalled and traced back to processor Natural Selection Foods of San Juan Bautista, Calif.

DOJ_NMG_0080410

Natural Selection couldn't say when it last inspected the ranch in question for following good agricultural practices because the ranch hasn't been identified. Typically, the company inspects ranches that grow lettuce or spinach weekly during growing and harvesting seasons, spokeswoman Samantha Cabaluna said.

The conditions described by officials can't be considered good agricultural practices, said Trevor Suslow, an expert on produce safety at the University of California, Davis. Placing crop fields next to cattle pastures is known to carry a level of risk, he said, as cattle are natural carriers of E. coli O157:H7.

"These are ready-to-eat products that people consume without cooking," the FDA's Robert Brackett said. "It's absolutely essential that every farm in the area and the country do what they can to ensure this never happens again."

Source Of Deadly E. Coli Is Found (NYT)

By Libby Sander

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

CHICAGO, Oct. 12 — Cattle manure collected from a California ranch under investigation by federal and state authorities contains the same strain of E. coli that killed three people and sickened nearly 200 in a recent outbreak linked to tainted spinach, federal and state food safety officials said Thursday.

"We know where the E. coli comes from," said Dr. Kevin Reilly of the California Department of Health Services.

But while the discovery of the match between E. coli in the manure and in the tainted spinach is an unprecedented development in the scientific investigation of food-borne illnesses, Dr. Reilly said, it does not solve the mystery of how the spinach was contaminated in the first place.

"We are continuing to try to determine the connection between these findings and how spinach on the fields may have been contaminated," Dr. Reilly said in a news conference.

Pinpointing how the bacteria made its way into the spinach fields, whether from tainted irrigation water, flooding, poor hygiene among field workers or by wildlife capable of breaking through fences, is the next challenge for investigators, he said.

The manure samples were taken from a large ranch in the Salinas Valley that has a beef cattle operation as well as fields where produce is grown, Dr. Reilly said. Investigators collected the samples — which are 3 of about 650 specimens taken from various ranches since the investigation began — about a half-mile from the spinach fields, he said.

The authorities are also investigating three other ranches. All of the ranches in question are in either San Benito or Monterey Counties, and none are currently growing any produce, Dr. Reilly said.

Joan Rose, a microbiologist and food safety expert at Michigan State University, said she was not surprised by Thursday's finding that the E. coli came from animal feces.

"If you start to look at the pathogen levels even in untreated sewage, it's minor compared to animal waste," Ms. Rose said, dismissing the notion that a field worker with poor hygiene could have spread the bacteria. "One person can't touch that much spinach."

The close proximity of farm animals to produce fields "has always been a concern" of the Food and Drug Administration, said Dr. Robert Brackett, director of the Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition at the agency. Dr. Brackett declined to comment on whether the agency would try to regulate how close those animals can be to fields where ready-to-eat produce is grown.

The ability to trace a nationwide outbreak of E. coli back to cattle manure on a specific Salinas Valley ranch within a matter of weeks is a scientific leap that would not have been possible a decade ago, Dr. Reilly said.

"This is the first time in nine outbreaks that have linked back to the Salinas Valley that we have had the ability to match up the genetic strain" of the E. coli, he said, crediting improved laboratory technology with the advance.

The history of E. coli outbreaks traced to leafy vegetables grown in Central California, particularly in the Salinas Valley, is long, the F.D.A. said. Federal and state food safety officials have asked industry groups to present long-term strategies for minimizing the likelihood of future outbreaks, and the agency has said it will not rule out the possibility of regulatory requirements.

The most recent outbreak has sickened people in 26 states and Canada, and resulted in deaths in Idaho, Nebraska and Wisconsin.

Earlier this week, Mexico announced that it would halt its imports of lettuce grown in the United States after another Salinas Valley company, the Nunes Company, issued a voluntary recall, believing that some of its lettuce may have been irrigated with water containing harmful E. coli. Laboratory tests later showed that concern to be unfounded, and Dr. Brackett of the F.D.A. said the agency was working with the Mexican government to address the issue.

Investigators found E. coli in cattle feces near Salinas Valley spinach fields that matches the strain of the bacteria that sickened 200 people and killed at least three -- a major discovery in the nearly two-month search for the cause of the outbreak.

The fecal samples were found within a mile of spinach fields, on a farm with both beef cattle and produce operations, Kevin Reilly, a California food safety official, said yesterday.

Investigators are turning their attention to how the deadly bacteria could have gotten into spinach crops. Theories include contaminated irrigation water, poor worker hygiene, and wild pigs running through pastures and into the spinach fields.

"We do not have a smoking cow at this point, no," Reilly said.

Reilly was careful to say that yesterday's finding does not mean that investigators found the source of the outbreak. Over the past several weeks, investigators have collected more then 650 specimens of soil, water, plants and feces, and they are still testing for E. coli. Officials have not ruled out other sources of contamination.

The California and federal health officials conducting the investigation have narrowed its focus from 12 fields on nine farms to four fields on four farms, Reilly said. The growers that operate the four implicated fields, in Monterey and San Benito counties, have stopped growing ready-to-eat produce on those fields.

Though last month's E. coli outbreak was the 20th in 10 years linked to leafy greens and the ninth traced to the Salinas Valley, investigators have never found a specific source of contamination, which made yesterday's finding unusual.

"This is a significant finding because it's the first time we've linked a spinach or lettuce E. coli . . . outbreak to test results from a specific ranch in the Salinas Valley," Reilly said.

E. coli O157:H7 is an especially toxic form of E. coli, which can cause bloody stool, kidney failure and death.

Knowing the precise source of the outbreak could help regulators and farmers come up with more effective ways to prevent contamination, food safety experts said.

The family of an elderly Hagerstown woman who died last month after eating bagged spinach has filed a federal wrongful-death lawsuit against Natural Selection Foods LLC and Dole Food Co., one of several such suits. The death of June Dunning, 86, was not definitively linked to the outbreak because of problems completing a genetic test on the bacteria that infected her. Her death is still considered "under investigation" by public health officials.

Samantha Cabaluna, a spokeswoman for Natural Selection, said she has not seen the lawsuit and declined to comment.

Dunning died the day before the Food and Drug Administration first told the public to avoid eating fresh spinach. The outbreak was quickly traced to Natural Selection, a processor in Salinas that immediately recalled all its spinach products. Five other produce packers did the same.

About two weeks ago, after the investigation was narrowed to nine Salinas Valley farms, FDA officials said any fresh spinach that wasn't recalled was safe to eat again.

EPA Ties Plant Here To Illegal Burning (CCCT)

By Dan Kelley, Caller-Times

Corpus Christi (TX) Caller-Times, October 13, 2006

Allegations about Encycle and waste false, Asarco says

A Corpus Christi metal recycling plant took part in what the government called sham recycling, sending hazardous waste to El Paso and Montana to be burned illegally, according to federal documents.

The company, Asarco Inc., said Wednesday the allegations are old and false.

The Environmental Protection Agency document does not disclose what the materials were. More than 5,000 tons in 247 shipments left Asarco's Corpus Christi Encycle facility in about 10 years, until July 1998, according to the EPA memo. Some sludge from a wastewater treatment process was also mixed with metal smelting byproducts, known as slag, which Asarco later burned illegally in its El Paso copper smelter and another facility in East Helena, Mont., according to the memo.

Asarco agreed in 1995 and 1996 to clean 30 contaminated properties in two Corpus Christi neighborhoods, Dona Park and Manchester Place, after tests showed high amounts of lead and other heavy metals linked to health problems.

An environmental group says waste manifests indicate at least 300 tons of that material was generated at the Army's chemical warfare depot at the Rocky Mountain Arsenal.

Attorneys for the EPA wrote the memo to refer the company to the Department of Justice for sanctions. Negotiations between the company and the Justice Department led to a 1999 consent decree between Asarco and the government. The consent decree contains no admission of guilt. A 1999 EPA news release hailed the agreement as an unprecedented potential model for other companies. The release faults Asarco for "failing to properly manage hazardous waste and otherwise engaging in unlawful recycling practices."

The El Paso smelter closed in 1998. The company is applying to reopen it.

The Justice Department said Wednesday in a written statement that both federal agencies considered all available information before reaching the settlement and that it was open to a 30-day comment period before approved by a federal judge.

Two environmental groups, Get The Lead Out El Paso and Concerned Citizens of Sunland Park, obtained the EPA information this week through a request under the Freedom of Information Act.

"The EPA knew Asarco burned toxic waste right here in downtown El Paso," said state Sen. Eliot Shapleigh, D-El Paso. "EPA made a memo showing hundreds of violations. Now lawyers say it was not meant to be public. Why do we find out now?"

EPA regional spokesman Dave Berry said the memo didn't become public sooner because at the time it was drafted, it was considered a communication between attorneys preparing a legal case, and therefore would have been exempt from public release.

Tom Aldrich, Asarco's vice president of environmental affairs, said the allegations were "not new and not true."

The company also released documents from the Texas Commission on Environmental Quality interpreting the sham recycling allegation to mean no more than that the product sent to El Paso didn't contain enough metal.

Shapleigh called for a federal investigation into why charges weren't filed against the company.

Heather McMurray, a representative of both environmental groups, said she sought the documents after the steelworkers union in 2004 released memos purporting to connect the contamination in Corpus Christi to El Paso.

"We've been contaminated," McMurray said. "We realized they would find the same stuff Asarco released in Corpus."

Asarco in 2005 filed for Chapter 11 reorganization under the bankruptcy code, leading to what Shapleigh said were billions of dollars in environmental cleanup liabilities in "94 communities in 21 states." In 2002, the EPA gave Asarco notice of potential liability in an emergency cleanup of several El Paso properties that also contained high levels of lead.

God Can Make A Tree, But Olaf Ribeiro Can Save Its Life (WSJ)

By Susan Warren

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

OLYMPIA, Wash. -- Plant pathologist Olaf Ribeiro crouched beneath the spreading evergreen branches of a sequoia tree on the state capitol grounds and peered into the underground world.

A colleague had just used an "air spade" to blast away dirt with a jet stream of air, uncovering the dense network of shallow roots at the base of the tree. Dr. Ribeiro immediately spotted a killing fungus eating away at the roots. "We have to save this tree!" he told the team of tree experts gathered around.

"I worry that future generations will know of giant old trees only by the stumps preserved in museums," he says. "I want to save old trees so that people can stand at the base of them and say, 'My God, look what nature can do.'"

Trees are dying in large numbers in cities all over the country. American Forests, a nonprofit organization in Washington, D.C., that fights for preserving trees in urban areas, says satellite reconnaissance shows metropolitan areas in the eastern U.S. have lost 30% of their tree cover in the past 20 years. It argues that about 635 million trees need to be planted in cities nationwide. Urban tree loss, due mainly to developmental sprawl, contributes to the decline in air quality as well as flooding problems in metro areas. Tree roots and the soil they are in soak up excess water, and trees consume carbon dioxide that would otherwise contribute to greenhouse gases.

Dr. Ribeiro sees the loss of trees as unnecessary. In fact, he is trying to prove that trees can live forever given the right conditions. As an expert in plant diseases like the fungus that caused the 19th-century Irish Potato Famine, Dr. Ribeiro believes the key to tree longevity is in the dirt.

Trees have evolved in sync with a complex underground world that nourishes them and keeps them healthy. Farmland cultivation, construction, foot traffic and pollution have upset the balance, cutting short trees' lives, argues the energetic, 68-year-old Dr. Ribeiro, who runs a private lab near Seattle that specializes in diagnosing diseases in crops and trees. He believes that if the original microbial activity around the tree could be duplicated, "There's no reason the tree shouldn't go on living."

Even death is just a passing phase for many trees, he says. A tree can go on living for centuries, through a rotting stump that nourishes new life, or through roots and branches that sprout saplings.

Arborist Neville Fay, of Britain's Ancient Tree Forum, calls these perpetually regenerating life forms "phoenix trees." He believes that letting old trees die destroys the chance to study, and learn more, about the oldest life forms on the planet. Ancient trees are colonized by micro-organisms that may date back thousands of years. "The tree is an ark that carries these organisms through time," he says.

Mr. Fay and Dr. Ribeiro are joining with others to form interdisciplinary teams that can diagnose problems with dying trees and keep them alive many years longer.

DOJ_NMG_0080413

To be sure, saving individual old trees is criticized by some tree experts, who deride it as "geriatric forestry." Rescues are labor-intensive and expensive, at prices that can run up to $30,000 per tree. Eric Oldar, who works for the California Department of Forestry, worries that too much focus on single trees could detract from the larger problem of cities eating away at the nation's forest canopy. The effort and money to save one old tree might be better spent protecting younger, more productive trees in the environment, he says.

Whether to save old trees comes down to measuring their value, and that's a tough call, says David Nowak, a forestry expert with the USDA Forest Service in Syracuse, N.Y. "Yes, we can keep it going. But what are you getting in return?" he asked. "Is that tree actually growing? Or is it just hanging on?"

Forestry experts agree that some old trees -- especially those with historical significance -- are worth saving at almost any cost. Deborah Gangloff, executive director of American Foresters, says such trees can be "living landmarks." "It's like paying to make sure the Liberty Bell or the Bull at Wall Street are maintained," she says.

Dr. Ribeiro believes people pay too much attention to what they can see, so when a tree appears to be dying, they rush to cut it down before it falls and causes damage.

Lately, he has focused his attention on the venerable old trees of the state capitol in Olympia. In 2003, he got together with Rob Lloyd, owner of Lloyd's Arboricultural Consulting in Battle Ground, Wash., and Neal Wolbert, president of Landscape Health Care in Olympia, to save a dying Norway Maple at risk of being cut down.

The team relies heavily on the air spade, a long-handled tube with a half-moon shield connected to an air compressor. The tool, designed to help excavate trees for moving, blasts away the dirt with high-pressure air that leaves roots undamaged. It allows Dr. Ribeiro to pinpoint root problems with surgical precision.

With a clear view of the roots of the giant maple, Dr. Ribeiro and Mr. Wolbert were able to identify and treat the area where fungus was devouring the roots, then backfill with a special prescription of nutrient-enriched soil and mulch. Now, the tree is flourishing.

Air-spading at the base of an ailing redwood, used as the state Christmas tree, revealed that small roots circling the tree were choking larger roots. "This is radical stuff," acknowledged Mr. Wolbert, as Mr. Lloyd fired up a chain saw to cut away the offending growth.

The team rescued another Norway Maple nearby. Mr. Lloyd designed a steel pole to suspend cables for supporting the tree's huge, majestic limbs, which had been weakened by rot and posed a risk of falling on passersby. Some arborists might have recommended cutting it down. But now, "this one will go forever," said Dr. Ribeiro.

Finally, the team noticed a young sequoia, planted in 1980 in honor of Dixy Lee Ray, Washington's first woman governor. It needed help. Though the tree looked green and healthy above, mushrooms sprouting at its base signaled trouble below. Air spading revealed extensive, treatable root rot that was spreading to another nearby tree. "It's a little like 'CSI,'" said Dr. Ribeiro, summing up his day's work.

New Combatant Against Global Warming: Insurance Industry (CSM)

By Ron Scherer

The Christian Science Monitor, October 13, 2006

NEW YORK

Insurance companies, who like to stay out of the limelight, are becoming leading business protagonists in the assault on global warming.

· Next week, Travelers, the giant insurance firm, will offer owners of hybrid cars in California a 10 percent discount. It already offers the discount in 41 other states and has cornered a large share of the market.

· This fall, Fireman's Fund will cut premiums for "green" buildings that save energy and emit fewer greenhouse gases. When it pays off claims, it will direct customers to environmentally friendly products to replace roofs, windows, and water heaters.

· In January, Marsh, the largest insurance broker in the US, will offer a program with Yale University to teach corporate board members about their fiduciary responsibility to manage exposure to climate change.

The insurance industry's clout is sizable. It's the second-largest industry in the world in terms of assets, and has a direct link to most homeowners and businesses. It insures coal-fired power plants as well as wind farms, so it can influence the power industry's cost structure. With its financial muscle, the industry could help advance the use of new financial instruments designed to allow companies to trade greenhouse-gas emissions in the same way that commodities are bought and sold.

"The insurance industry has the ability to change behavior, policies and communicate with clients," says Nancy Skinner, US director of the Climate Group, which lobbies for business and government action to address global warming.

Some consumers are already noticing a negative effect of this shift. In the past year, some 600,000 homeowners living in a zone that an insurer considers a high storm risk in an era of climate change have seen their policies cancelled or not renewed.

DOJ_NMG_0080414

This includes coastal areas stretching from Texas to New York. Currently, coastal properties are valued at $7.2 trillion. Reassessing risk

One reason for this massive change in coverage is an ongoing shift in the way insurance companies view risk. Insurers are starting to change their risk-assessment models to reflect future climate-change scenarios instead of past weather patterns.

"Climate change represents an ever- increasing risk, a risk far too great to ignore," says Clement Booth, a member of the Board of Management at Allianz AG, one of the world's largest insurance firms.

This week, Allianz, in cooperation with the World Wildlife Fund, issued a report on steps the insurance industry could take to reduce the physical impact of global warming or to help society adapt.

"The industry is in a unique position to incentivize," says Miranda Anderson, an author of the report and a vice president at David Gardiner & Associates. "This is the very beginning of thinking through this issue."

In fact, the industry is not driven just by an attempt to help the environment: It also wants to make money. In Travelers' case, the impetus to give a policy discount on hybrid cars came when Greg Toczydlowski, a senior vice president of product management, was gassing up his wife's Ford Excursion.

"A hybrid zipped in and out while I was still pumping, and it occurred to me it takes so little gasoline and runs so much longer on a tank," says Mr. Toczydlowski. "I came back and did research on how many hybrids are out there and what's the profile of the customer. We discovered it was a preferred customer - middle-aged, very responsible, and stable financially."

Now hybrid owners, besides saving on their fuel bills, can save money on their auto insurance - about $100 a year, according to Travelers. Attentive state regulators

The attention on climate change is likely to receive a boost from state insurance regulators, who had planned to discuss its risks in September 2005 in New Orleans, at their annual meeting. Hurricane Katrina intervened, however, and the meeting was moved to Chicago.

"As a result, regulators spent an enormous amount of time on climate change and what changes to promulgate to make sure the companies are financially sound," says Mindy Lubber, president of Ceres, a coalition of investors, environmental groups, and public-interest organizations in North America.

Ceres has made two reports on what the insurance industry can do to profitably manage climate change. In a report issued in August, Ceres details some steps currently under way, such as Swiss Re's investment in new solar technology, Munich Re's insurance renewable energy projects, and Lloyds of London's insurance on predicted energy savings.

In the US, one of the more unique and potentially far-reaching efforts will be rolled out this fall by Fireman's Fund. After a building is damaged, Fireman's will specify that it must be repaired with "greener" materials, including consumer electronics that must have Energy Star ratings from the Environmental Protection Agency. If a building is a total loss, it will be rebuilt as a "green" building. The insurer also plans to pay for an engineer to make sure ventilation systems and boilers are installed properly, which could also save energy.

"All the evidence suggests [that] if you decrease energy usage in a building, the owner's net operating income increases and you will improve the asset value," says Steven Bushnell, product director of Fireman's, owned by Allianz.

Insurance companies, adept at managing risk, are also trying to educate their customers. Marsh and Yale will train 200 board directors to understand risks of climate change. Again, part of the motivation is money: Insurance companies provide liability insurance for board members.

Drug Czar Visits Two States To Slam Pro-pot Initiatives (WT)

By Valerie Richardson

The Washington Times, October 13, 2006

DENVER -- Federal drug czar John P. Walters barnstormed through Colorado and Nevada this week to criticize two ballot initiatives that would legalize marijuana as polls showed the proposals inching too close for comfort.

"Over 30 years of painful experience has shown us that more substance abuse doesn't make anyone's life safer or better," Mr. Walters told students at South High School in Denver. "We need to make it clear that we're going to push back."

Mr. Walters made two appearances in Colorado Wednesday before flying to Nevada for a speech yesterday to the Las Vegas Chamber of Commerce. Both states are considering measures that would legalize possession of up to 1 ounce of marijuana for those 21 or older.

Polls show the initiatives trailing, but by single digits. The Colorado measure, Amendment 44, lags by a margin of 29 percent to 36 percent, with 35 percent undecided, according to a SurveyUSA poll taken Sept. 28 for NBC affiliate KUSA-TV.

Question 7, the Nevada proposal, has 42 percent of voters in favor and 51 percent against, with 7 percent undecided, according to a Sept. 26 poll conducted for the Las Vegas Review-Journal.

Mr. Walters' arrival prompted an outcry from the pro-marijuana campaigns in both states, which accused him of spending taxpayer dollars to meddle in state affairs. In Nevada, the Committee to Regulate and Control Marijuana used the occasion to debut a television ad criticizing the use of "taxpayer dollars" on the drug czar's campaign stops.

"D.C. has the money to interfere in a Nevada election, but they want to slash our homeland security funding?" says the ad, which shows a photo of Mr. Walters. "Tell Washington to get their priorities straight."

Mason Tvert, campaign manager of Safer Alternative for Enjoyable Recreation, the group behind Amendment 44, called Mr. Walters a "federal agent" who was "coming to our state and lying about a state initiative."

Part of the drug czar's charge is to oppose initiatives and legislation that would promote substance abuse, said Walters spokesman Jennifer de Vallance.

Both states have a history of marijuana proposals: In 2002, Nevada defeated a legalization measure by 61 to 39 percent. In 2004, Denver approved a citywide legalization proposal in a campaign, run by Mr. Tvert, that called marijuana safer than alcohol.

The campaigns are relying on different strategies. Mr. Tvert continues to push the theme that marijuana is less dangerous than alcohol, while the Nevada group emphasizes that marijuana can be better regulated and controlled if it's legal.

While Mr. Walters was awarding Colorado a $15 million federal grant for drug screening, the Amendment 44 campaign unveiled a billboard featuring a picture of the drug czar saying that marijuana is the "safest thing in the world."

The quote comes from "Pete's Couch," an anti-marijuana ad produced for the Office of National Drug Control Policy, showing three teenage boys who prefer sitting on a couch and smoking pot to leaving the house.

"I smoked weed, and nobody died," says a teenager in the ad, which plays on the Internet sites YouTube and abovetheinfluence.com. Instead of leading an active life, "you wanna keep yourself alive; you go over to Pete's and sit on his couch until you're 86. Safest thing in the world."

Mr. Walters called the billboard quote "a lie" and said marijuana can cause "demotivational syndrome," which prompts people to lose interest in leading normal lives in favor of drug use.

"Does Colorado need more young people in the basement on a couch wasting their lives?" he said.

He also blamed the marijuana-legalization push on the efforts of "three billionaires," Democratic Party financier George Soros, University of Phoenix founder John Sperling and insurance magnate Peter Lewis, whom he accused of conducting a "social experiment" at the expense of Coloradans.

The three have backed medical-marijuana and legalization advocacy groups over the years.

Drug Czar Criticizes Nevada Proposal To Legalize Marijuana (AP)

AP, October 13, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) - Backers of an initiative to legalize small amounts of marijuana are trying to conduct "a social science experiment on the families of Nevada," a Bush administration official said Thursday.

John Walters, the administration's drug czar, said the initiative on Nevada's November ballot is supported by outsiders who want to take advantage of the "blind spot people have about marijuana."

"It has addictive qualities and especially in the hands of young people and teens ... has caused, as you well know, quite a loss of life," Walters, the director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, said in an interview with the Associated Press.

Walters appeared Thursday with U.S. Rep. Jon Porter to speak out against the initiative, known as Question 7, and announced $500,000 in federal funding for a Clark County anti-drug program.

Backers of the measure protested Walters' visit to Nevada, which included speeches and media interviews, saying he was using tax dollars to campaign against the initiative.

Question 7 would allow people 21 and older to posses 1 ounce of marijuana in their homes - the same amount allowed under Nevada's medical marijuana law. The measure also directs marijuana growers, distributors and retailers to be licensed, taxed and regulated. And, it doubles penalties for selling or giving pot to minors and for vehicular manslaughter while under the influence of drugs or alcohol.

It is backed by The Committee to Regulate and Control Marijuana, a group that has pushed legalization measures in several states with funding from the Washington D.C.-based Marijuana Policy Project.

The group argues that the legal system is bogged down by low-level marijuana offenses. It claims that taxing and regulating pot would put drug dealers out of business while freeing law enforcement resources to pursue violent crime.

DOJ_NMG_0080416

Neal Levine, executive director of the committee says anyone who wants marijuana can get it already, so it makes more sense to put it into a tightly controlled and regulated environment.

Walters defended current drug laws.

"The laws are working. The fact of the matter is we have lower rates of substance abuse now than we did several years ago," he said.

He said new drug courts that handle only nonviolent drug-related offenses are succeeding in diverting drug users out of jails and into treatment centers. He said that a change in the law would send the wrong message to young people.

"The law is an important expression of what people take seriously," he said.

Fight To Legalize Marijuana Escalates War Of Words (KLAS)

KLAS-TV, October 13, 2006

The nation's drug czar John Walters, the National Drug Control Policy Director, was in Las Vegas Thursday urging voters to say 'No' to ballot Question 7. The initiative would make the possession of a small amount of marijuana legal. Here are the provisions.

The measure would allow the sale, use and possession of one ounce or less of marijuana for people at least 21-years of age. It imposes a tax on the sale of the drug.

The measure would double the prison sentence from 20 to 40 years for those who cause death or injury while driving under the influence of marijuana.

For Brittany Faber legalizing marijuana will always be a very personal battle. She says ten years ago the drug took from her the most important person from her childhood.

"My dad had just dropped my sister off at middle school and he was on his way to work," Brittany Faber, a Las Vegas resident, says.

Her father never made it. An 18-year-old, high on marijuana, traveling 85 mph in a 45 mph zone hit her dad's car.

"He hit my dad on the drivers side. He hit him so hard. My dad's head shattered the passenger side window," Faber says.

Brittany was 8 years old at the time. To this day, she's angry at the teen who took her father's life and received only house arrest. In 1997, there was no driving under the influence of drugs law in the state.

She fought to help get one passed in the memory of her dad.

"He would always make me milkshakes and we would sit and watch TV and eat milkshakes together. He was such a good dad. He was such a good father," Faber says.

The debate over legalizing marijuana brings up long buried feelings. She joined the national drug czar in Las Vegas to oppose legalizing marijuana.

"The willingness to say well it's only on ounce. Letting people walk around with 60 or 80 joints, that's what it amounts to really, becomes kind of a drug dealer protection act," John Walters, National Drug Control Policy Director, says.

Not everyone welcomed John Walters.

A dozen protesters let him know they approve legalizing marijuana.

"People have a choice to make. Do we want marijuana in a tightly regulated and controlled system, or do we want the current free for all that we have now. As a parent, I want it in a tightly regulated and controlled system," Neal Livine from the Committee to Regulate & Control Marijuana says.

Voters will decided on the issue on November 7. Meantime, Walters announced a $100,000 to the Las Vegas anti-drug coalition. The money will be used to prevent drug use among local teens.

Opposing Sides Discuss The Legalization Of Marijuana (KVBC)

KVBC-TV, October 12, 2006

A key question confronting voters on election day is whether or not to allow limited legalization of marijuana.

Question 7: The Marijuana Initiative, would:

Exempt persons 21 years of age and older from any civil or criminal penalty due to the possession or use of one ounce or less of marijuana.

Provide for the regulation and taxation of marijuana by the state and earmark part of those revenues to prevent and treat drug abuse.

Stiffen penalties for a person age 18 and older who supplies marijuana to persons under the age of 18.

Increase the penalty for driving under the influence of marijuana.

Thursday morning on News 3 at Sunrise, Sue Manteris and Mitch Truswell were joined by White House Drug Czar John Walters, against legalization, and the organization "Regulate Marijuana," for legalization, to discuss the initiative.

Drug Czar Visits Colorado, Some Question His ((/KUSA)

9 News/ KUSA, October 11, 2006

DENVER - John Walters, Director of National Drug Control, toured several Colorado schools to announce a $14 million grant aimed at curbing drug use amongst students.

The U.S. Drug Czar visited Colorado Wednesday and supporters of Amendment 44 say it is because he is against the legalization of marijuana. 9NEWS at 4 p.m. October 11, 2006.

However, some wonder if the so-called Drug Czar is really campaigning against Amendment 44.

Amendment 44 is a ballot initiative which, if passed, would legalize the possession of up to one ounce of marijuana for those 21 or older. The effort is spearheaded by SAFER and its director, Mason Tvert.

Tvert says Walters' visit less than month before the election is telling.

"The federal government is pouring their resources into this state right now," Tvert said. "It goes to show that they're very scared."

Walters says he is in Colorado to tout the $14 million package Colorado will receive over the next five years. It will expand drug screening programs in school-based health clinics.

The money will also be used to train medical personnel, create promotional materials against marijuana use and fund follow-ups with students who admit they are using drugs.

"We want to prevent addiction by identifying those people who suffer from using," Walters said. "Marijuana has created a blind spot in our society that it's not being taken seriously. Yet, it is the cause of the biggest treatment need among illegal drugs."

Walters said the need for more student drug screening will increase if Amendment 44 passes.

"It tries to deceive voters," Walters said. "It claims, contrary to the evidence, that you can decrease harms from alcohol by having more harms from marijuana."

While Walters is slamming the Amendment 44 campaign, Tvert has unveiled a billboard supporting it with Walters' face on it with the words, "I call marijuana the safest thing in the world."

Tvert is citing a public service announcement created by Walter's office. The theme of the television commercial is that if you smoke pot, you will never get off the couch. Tvert thinks that means Walters believes marijuana is not harmful.

"They are not running an anti-laziness ad," Tvert said. "The Drug Czar clearly signed off on this ad."

"I never said that," Walters said. "The effort is premised on stacking one lie on top of another lie."

Walters said the billboard takes the message out of context and that marijuana is a significant threat to Colorado children.

"Does Colorado need more young people and more young adults who spend their lives in the basement on the couch wasting their time and effort?" Walters said. "To try to suggest that we ought to have more young people use marijuana is outrageous."

Tvert believes Walters' presence in Colorado and his response to the ad show his campaign is working.

Marijuana Use Measure Smokes Out Pros, Cons (GJS)

By Gary Harmon, The Daily Sentinel

Grand Junction (CO) Sentinel, October 13, 2006

A campaign to legalize possession of an ounce of marijuana is billed by proponents as a prudent substitute for alcohol. Its opponents dismiss it as “a con.”

Colorado Attorney General John Suthers, joined by local elected and federal law enforcement officials, tore into the measure, Amendment 44 on Thursday.

Amendment 44 backer Mason Tvert was there to tear back, complaining that elected officials were misusing their positions to campaign against the measure.

The officials criticized the amendment after addressing the Mesa County Methamphetamine Task Force at the Doubletree Hotel.

Legalizing marijuana, said Hiram Reyez, would undermine the goals of the meth task force. Legalizing it would lower natural barriers against drug use and make the job of combatting meth all the more difficult, he said.

With disputes raging about the dangers posed by marijuana, Reyez said the problem he sees with pot is more insidious. Hard users, he said, aren’t so much dangerous in his experience as they seem to be lazy, “densensitized” to normal needs and drives.

While some see marijuana use as a personal choice, Reyez, owner of a development-consulting company in Grand Junction, said he saw it as “a threat to my community.”

DOJ_NMG_0080418

David Cox saw it differently, standing below the billboard that will greet eastbound drivers on Patterson Road at Commerce Boulevard until the election.

He helped Safer Alternative for Enjoyable Recreation, the organization backing the amendment, get the $1,250 sign location, and he helped collect signatures for the measure at Country Jam this summer.

Mesa County, Cox said, has a treasure trove of votes for legalization if the word gets out.

"If there's an active discussion, then it can't lose," he said.

Critics pointed to the increase in potency of marijuana over the years as a threat to the health of users, but Cox said that just means less gets ingested.

"Just one puff gets you the desired result," he said.

Proponents and opponents pushed and pulled over the merits of alcohol and marijuana.

Marijuana has never been identified as the direct cause of any death, Tvert said, unlike a myriad of deaths related to alcohol.

It is, however, involved in nearly every drug-related crime that law enforcement investigates, Mesa County Sheriff Stan Hilkey said.

Meth and marijuana are related in some way, insisted Mesa County District Attorney Pete Hautzinger.

"I know there's a link because I see it every day," he said.

Marijuana is at the heart of 62 percent of drug-rehabilitation cases, Suthers said.

"It's hardly a benign drug," he said.

But drug rehab also has become the weapon of choice by judges leery of filling jails with marijuana users, Tvert said.

Scott Burns, deputy director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy, said Colorado is at the center of the legalization effort that wants to make the state the "pot capital of America. Don't fall for the con."

Suthers also criticized the amendment as "sloppy" because it was drafted in such a way that it would allow adults to transfer an ounce to someone as young as 15.

The amendment is intended to change Colorado statute only for adults, Tvert said, and it's not aimed at encouraging use among juveniles.

In fact, he said, Amendment 44 isn't intended to encourage marijuana use at all, only to recognize an alternative that is safer than alcohol, he said.

Opponents of the measure live "in an ideal world" of encouraging sobriety, Tvert said. "We live in the real world."

Deputy Drug Czar Opposing Amendment 44 (KKCO-TV)

By Elyse Webb

KKCO-TV, October 13, 2006

A Denver–based organization is hoping to make history in Colorado by making small amounts of marijuana legal. The consumption and distribution has been illegal since 1937, and many say making it legal is a bad idea.

Amendment 44 will be on the ballot this November and many worry for the well-being of Colorado.. if the initiative is passed. Yet, Deputy Drug Czar, Scott Burns says he is confident that Colorado will follow the trend of previous states that have tried to pass this amendment.

"They have been to Alaska and the amendment failed, in Nevada it failed, California, it failed. Frankly, I believe that with people focusing on this the last few weeks before election, it will fail in Colorado, too," says Burns.

Amendment 44 would make it legal for anyone over the age of 21 to posses less than one ounce of marijuana. The manufacturing and distributing of the drug would still be illegal.

Drug Czar Visits Two States To Slam Pro-pot Initiatives (WT)

By Valerie Richardson, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 13, 2006

DENVER -- Federal drug czar John P. Walters barnstormed through Colorado and Nevada this week to criticize two ballot initiatives that would legalize marijuana as polls showed the proposals inching too close for comfort.

"Over 30 years of painful experience has shown us that more substance abuse doesn't make anyone's life safer or better," Mr. Walters told students at South High School in Denver. "We need to make it clear that we're going to push back."

Mr. Walters made two appearances in Colorado Wednesday before flying to Nevada for a speech yesterday to the Las Vegas Chamber of Commerce. Both states are considering measures that would legalize possession of up to 1 ounce of marijuana for those 21 or older.

DOJ_NMG_0080419

Polls show the initiatives trailing, but by single digits. The Colorado measure, Amendment 44, lags by a margin of 29 percent to 36 percent, with 35 percent undecided, according to a SurveyUSA poll taken Sept. 28 for NBC affiliate KUSA-TV.

Question 7, the Nevada proposal, has 42 percent of voters in favor and 51 percent against, with 7 percent undecided, according to a Sept. 26 poll conducted for the Las Vegas Review-Journal.

Mr. Walters' arrival prompted an outcry from the pro-marijuana campaigns in both states, which accused him of spending taxpayer dollars to meddle in state affairs. In Nevada, the Committee to Regulate and Control Marijuana used the occasion to debut a television ad criticizing the use of "taxpayer dollars" on the drug czar's campaign stops.

"D.C. has the money to interfere in a Nevada election, but they want to slash our homeland security funding?" says the ad, which shows a photo of Mr. Walters. "Tell Washington to get their priorities straight."

Mason Tvert, campaign manager of Safer Alternative for Enjoyable Recreation, the group behind Amendment 44, called Mr. Walters a "federal agent" who was "coming to our state and lying about a state initiative."

Part of the drug czar's charge is to oppose initiatives and legislation that would promote substance abuse, said Walters spokesman Jennifer de Vallance.

Both states have a history of marijuana proposals: In 2002, Nevada defeated a legalization measure by 61 to 39 percent. In 2004, Denver approved a citywide legalization proposal in a campaign, run by Mr. Tvert, that called marijuana safer than alcohol.

The campaigns are relying on different strategies. Mr. Tvert continues to push the theme that marijuana is less dangerous than alcohol, while the Nevada group emphasizes that marijuana can be better regulated and controlled if it's legal.

While Mr. Walters was awarding Colorado a $15 million federal grant for drug screening, the Amendment 44 campaign unveiled a billboard featuring a picture of the drug czar saying that marijuana is the "safest thing in the world."

The quote comes from "Pete's Couch," an anti-marijuana ad produced for the Office of National Drug Control Policy, showing three teenage boys who prefer sitting on a couch and smoking pot to leaving the house.

"I smoked weed, and nobody died," says a teenager in the ad, which plays on the Internet sites YouTube and abovetheinfluence.com. Instead of leading an active life, "you wanna keep yourself alive; you go over to Pete's and sit on his couch until you're 86. Safest thing in the world."

Mr. Walters called the billboard quote "a lie" and said marijuana can cause "demotivational syndrome," which prompts people to lose interest in leading normal lives in favor of drug use.

"Does Colorado need more young people in the basement on a couch wasting their lives?" he said.

He also blamed the marijuana-legalization push on the efforts of "three billionaires," Democratic Party financier George Soros, University of Phoenix founder John Sperling and insurance magnate Peter Lewis, whom he accused of conducting a "social experiment" at the expense of Coloradans.

The three have backed medical-marijuana and legalization advocacy groups over the years.

High Time For Pot Law, Supporters Say (GJFP)

Grand Junction (CO) Free Press, October 13, 2006

White House official, state's attorney general, clash with pro-pot forces

Will Colorado become the "pot capital of America"?

Is marijuana the safer alternative to alcohol?

And who paid for a press gathering Thursday in a conference room at the Doubletree Hotel, where federal, state and local officials urged voters to reject a pro-pot initiative on Colorado's November ballot?

The last question became the topic of a heated exchange between Amendment 44 campaign director Mason Tvert, Scott Burns, deputy director for state and local affairs for the White House's Office of National Drug Control Policy, as well as Colorado Attorney General John Suthers.

Tvert accused Suthers of violating Colorado campaign finance law, parts of which limit government employees' expenditures while advocating for or against a ballot initiative.

"Who paid for this press conference?" Tvert asked from the back of the room.

"I am not spending a dime of taxpayer money right now," an angry Suthers retorted.

Heather Janik, spokeswoman who accompanied Burns from Washington, D.C., later said expenses were paid by the Office of National Drug Control Policy.

Mesa County Sheriff Stan Hilkey said the spat reflected one side of a debate trying to silence the other. Elected officials hold First Amendment rights, too, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0080420

"They don't want both sides of this story to be heard," Hilkey said. "If we were talking about legalizing dynamite, you wouldn't have a dispute about letting experts from ATF get up and talk about it."

Hilkey and a host of Western Slope law enforcement leaders were at the Doubletree to hear Burns' Thursday morning address, prior to the press conference. The topic of Burns' speech: methamphetamine abuse.

Dude, where's my ballot?

Amendment 44, pushed by the group Safer Alternative for Enjoyable Recreation, is a November ballot initiative that would legalize possession of an ounce, or less, of marijuana for anyone 21 years or older.

Under existing state law, possession of that amount is non-arrested petty offense — violators are issued a written summons and face up to $100 fines. If they're under 21, they could earn a suspended driver's license.

Thursday's gathering at the Doubletree called the pro-legalization effort a dangerous "con," involving a drug often associated with more serious crime. District Attorney Pete Hautzinger said it's plain "foolish."

"I'm not about to say marijuana is as bad as meth," Hautzinger said. "But in two years, I've virtually never seen a possession of marijuana case that doesn't involve meth."

Should the initiative pass, that sets up conflicts with other state, not to mention federal, drug laws, according to Hautzinger.

"It would still be against the law to buy it from somebody," he said. "You're fostering a legal piece to an illegal enterprise."

Hilkey rejected pro-pot arguments that decriminalization would "free up law enforcement to take on things like meth."

"It's exactly the opposite," Hilkey said. "The only people who are going to benefit from this are those who want to get stoned."

And you're not talking about your daddy's pot: Today's marijuana has chemical THC levels of 10 percent or higher — up from around 1 percent in the mid-1970s, according to data from Thursday's opposition rally.

Suthers argued today's youth are paying the price.

"Sixty-two percent of teens in rehab now are there because of marijuana," Suthers said.

'A failed policy'

Tvert slammed Thursday's Doubletree presentation as a "gross distortion" of Amendment 44.

"They're trying to make this a debate about children, and it's not about children," Tvert said. "People aren't interested in the federal government coming into their homes, where adults should be able to make a decision about whether or not they'll use something that's less harmful than alcohol."

Tvert, a Denver resident who claims a shoestring budget (two full-time staff members) pushing Amendment 44, called his own press conference Thursday morning — posing for cameras in front of a pro-marijuana billboard now towering over eastbound traffic at the southeast corner of F Road and Commerce Blvd.

David Cox, 24, a Palisade resident, worked the group's signature petition drive toward getting the measure on the ballot. Cox and others collected 800 signatures during this past summer's Pinnacle Homes Country Jam.

Cox knows the initiative faces an uphill battle in Mesa County.

"But if this is talked about enough, I don't think it can lose," he said. "Discussion is our ally."

That starts with getting everyone's position right, Tvert said.

"We're not saying that marijuana is safe or harmless," he said. "But if you're an adult over 21, why would we ask people to use something (alcohol) that can kill you in one sitting, versus something that's never killed anybody?"

Tvert also rejects claims that partial legalization would make the drug more accessible for younger users. A recent study found 87 percent of high school seniors said it's "very easy" to get the drug, according to Tvert.

"How could it be more available?" he asked. "If kids can get (marijuana) easier than adults, then that's the sign of a failed policy."

Rancor Rises At Pot Debate (DENP)

By Nancy Lofholm, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, October 13, 2006

Officials air opposition to Amend. 44; advocate cries foul

Grand Junction - Diverging opinions about a marijuana- legalization initiative led to a finger-jabbing shouting match during a news conference Thursday featuring local, state and federal officials opposed to Amendment 44.

The angry exchange came at the end of speeches given by White House National Drug Control deputy director Scott Burns and Colorado Attorney General John Suthers, who oppose the measure.

DOJ_NMG_0080421

Mason Tvert, campaign director for the Alcohol-Marijuana Equalization Committee, a group attempting to legalize possession of less than an ounce of marijuana for adults in Colorado, asked Burns, Suthers and other elected officials standing in front of a "Marijuana - Not in Our Community" banner, "Who paid for this press conference?"

"Why don't you have to file a campaign finance report when you are engaged in campaigning?" he asked as various speakers attempted to quell his questions.

Mesa County Sheriff Stan Hilkey, one of the speakers against Amendment 44, answered that, as drug experts, they had the right to talk about the marijuana initiative.

Suthers was visibly angered when he told Tvert, "You are just flat wrong" about campaign finance law - as wrong, he said, as Tvert is about drug laws. "As public officials, we are perfectly entitled to step up and express our opinions at any time," Suthers said.

The Colorado Fair Campaign Practices Act allows government employees to spend up to $50 to express opinions on a ballot initiative.

Heather Janik, a staff member with the Office of National Drug Control Policy, said that the federal office paid $50 to rent the room for the news conference and that Burns' travel to Grand Junction from Washington, D.C., was covered by his appearance at a conference to discuss methamphetamine abuse.

The thick packets of booklets and fact sheets with information opposing marijuana use that were handed out at the news conference did not specifically mention Amendment 44.

Tvert, who also held a news conference Thursday under a new billboard urging yes votes on Amendment 44, reiterated that "these guys, who are so concerned with the law, are breaking the law on this."

Other speakers at the anti-44 conference included Mesa County District Attorney Pete Hautzinger, who said "I virtually never see a meth case that doesn't also include marijuana."

Both Sides Of Ref. 44 Up In Smoke (GJFP)

By Josh Nichols

Grand Junction (CO) Free Press, October 13, 2006

Talk about a wedge issue.

Thursday was all about the weed here in the Grand Valley.

First, we had the pro-Referendum 44 folks passionately touting the importance of legalizing the bud in a billboard-unveiling press conference.

That was followed by a press conference hosted by the anti-Referendum 44 crowd, stressing how the bud is the root of all that's bad in our community.

After that, Scott M. Burns, deputy director for state and local affairs in the White House Drug Policy Office, stopped by the Free Press office. He too, said legalizing bud was bad.

Thought I was going to have to use the office dolly to roll away the stacks of paperwork he toted documenting just how bad marijuana was.

So, what onlookers like myself took away from Thursday is that some people say weed's good, and some say weed's bad.

Hence, the wedge.

Bored yet? If you are, that's OK.

Folks, I'm here to tell you that you shouldn't feel bad if you don't have strong convictions on this one.

Other than the fact that they "want to get high, sooo high," the pro crowd hasn't given many reasons on why the stuff should be legalized.

The no crowd, aside from discounting information pushed by the pro crowd, hasn't put up much of an argument as to why the stuff should be illegal.

But they're both pretty darn adamant in their stance.

Use this as a case study in politics as to what different camps do to twist the exact same information in favor of their own argument.

Myth 10 in the little book distributed Thursday by the Office of National Drug Control Policy read "the government sends otherwise innocent people to prison for casual marijuana use."

The Office of National Drug Control Policy states that this is a myth because, "It is extremely rare for anyone, particularly first-time offenders, to get sent to prison just for possessing a small amount of marijuana. In most states, possession of an ounce or less of pot is a misdemeanor offense."

Seems like a good point. Why legalize it, if law enforcement isn't making a big deal out of it anyway?

But the folks on the other side of the issue use the same information in a common argument for legalizing the stuff.

DOJ_NMG_0080422

If it's "extremely rare for anyone, particularly first-time offenders, to get sent to prison for possessing a small amount of marijuana," the drug must not be that bad, right?

They're letting offenders off easy anyway, so why not just legalize dope?

To which the Drug Control office would respond, "We're letting you off easy anyway, so what's the point of legalizing it?"

To which the pro-crowd says, "Why not?"

To which the Drug Control office says, "Why?"

And as we do so often in politics, we find ourselves in preschool before nap time.

Makes one think they're all smoking something.

Now look past the Referendum 44 haze for a moment, and remember the big issue law enforcement is facing.

Burns assured locals Thursday that the folks in Washington are paying attention to the meth problem.

"Every time I go to testify on Capitol Hill, meth is the subject," he said. He likes what he sees happening by local leaders, who have formed the Mesa County Meth Task Force. "It's a model for what has to happen," he said.

And it's a model focusing on the issue we should be focusing on.

Legalizing Marijuana Doesn't Make Sense (DAILYC)

Daily Camera, October 13, 2006

Just say no to Amendment 44, which would legalize possession of up to one ounce of marijuana for adults 21 or older.

In the first place, the language of the amendment, sponsored by Safer Alternative For Enjoyable Recreation, contains a major loophole. It leaves open the possibility that an adult giving marijuana to a child or young adult between 15 and 20 "appears to be legal," according to Mason Tvert, SAFER's campaign director, speaking for those who favor the amendment. He says another law, contributing to the delinquency of a minor, "covers" the loophole.

But isn't it necessary to be precise when amending the state law? We think so.

And so does Rob McGuire, a Superior attorney coordinating several organizations opposing the proposal. "They call it an unintended consequence," he says. "We considered it bad drafting."

Tvert says that opponents, whom he called "extremists, no matter how you look at it," are "going out of their way to make this about children, when it's not about children."

He argues that marijuana use is safer than alcohol use, which is legal, and that consequently pot should be legal, too: "We're not saying it's harmless; it's less harmful than alcohol."

For example, he says, referencing recent issues with alcohol abuse at the University of Colorado, "Why is that they can't stay home and smoke a joint before the football game? Instead what they do is drink as much before the game as they can."

It would be better, he suggests, to allow adults to choose between alcohol and marijuana.

Tom Gorman, a former cop who is now director of the Rocky Mountain High Intensity Drug Trafficking Area, differs emphatically.

"Do you know how much an ounce of marijuana is?" he asks. "Most people think it's a joint or two — but it makes 30 joints to as many as 80 or even 120." And, he notes that a heavy user is defined by drug enforcement as someone who smokes a joint a day.

As Gorman and others note, the police do not target people for simple possession, those whose only crime is having a small amount of pot

Gorman says if pot is legalized, its use will go up. Already, 14 million people in the United States are classified as regular users, having smoked a joint in the last month. He agrees that alcohol can be an even bigger problem, that more people are addicted to alcohol than to all drugs combined.

"Let's join forces and fight for sobriety," he urges.

Sobriety is the only safe alternative to being under the influence of alcohol, HIDTA maintains, saying, "Instead of trying to legalize another dangerous drug, we should be encouraging sobriety. "

And Guarding Our Children Against Marijuana, another organization opposing Amendment 44, cites physiological and psychological dangers of marijuana use, saying, "Children and teenagers don't need to hear the message that marijuana is safe when it is abundantly clear that marijuana's effects are harmful."

We urge a vote against the poorly drafted and misguided Amendment 44.

Roundhouse Roundup: Governor's Name To Grace Movie Screens (NM)

New Mexican, October 12, 2006

Everyone knows Gov. Bill Richardson loves Hollywood. And soon his name will be appearing in movie credits.

DOJ_NMG_0080423

No, major studios aren't clamoring over rights to a feature-length version of the Richardson campaign's "sheriff" commercials on TV.

The rules for a recent competition in which young filmmakers are seeking state grant money require that credits on any film they submit have to thank the governor.

On the state Film Office Web page announcing the program, potential applicants were told, "Awardees will acknowledge Governor Richardson and the New Mexico Film Office's New Visions/New Mexico Program in the end credits of the completed film."

The New Visions/New Mexico program, according to a news release earlier this year, offers a total of $160,000 in contracts "for New Mexico-based producers and directors to create narrative films, documentaries, animation and experimental works." Individuals can get up to $20,000 for a project.

A total of 230 filmmakers applied, Film Office Director Lisa Strout said Wednesday.

Not all were seeking the maximum amount. "I heard that one was asking for $100," she said.

The deadline for submissions was last week.

Funding recipients will be announced in December.

As for acknowledging Richardson, Strout said she wasn't aware that was a requirement.

"What's important is acknowledging the state," Strout said. Specifically mentioning the governor, she said, "isn't a requirement in my mind."

Who knows, maybe one of these films acknowledging Richardson will go on to win the next Bill Richardson Film Achievement Award -- the annual award established this year by the College of Santa Fe for outstanding national and regional contributions to film.

Oughta be in pictures: Richardson, of course, won't be the first New Mexico governor to see his name in film credits.

Former Gov. David Cargo oversaw creation of New Mexico's first state Film Office in 1968. According to its Web site, this was the first state agency in the country "whose primary goal was to enhance economic development via motion picture production."

But Cargo didn't stop there. He actually appeared in some movies made in the state.

According to the Internet Movie Guide, Cargo's roles were as follows:

He played a lowly newspaper reporter in The Good Guys and the Bad Guys in 1969 -- though his name didn't appear in the credits. Some names that did appear in the credits in this Western were Robert Mitchum, George Kennedy and David Carridine.

The next year, Cargo had a bit part in a comedy called Up in the Cellar, which starred Larry Hagman and Joan Collins.

Cargo played a state trooper in Bunny O'Hare, a comedy that starred Bette Davis and Ernest Borgnine as a pair of golden-aged bank robbers.

And he played "Cpl. Benton" in a Western called The Gatling Gun, (shot in 1969, but not released until 1973). Unfortunately, it appears Cargo was the biggest name in that movie.

What's in a name?: A little mea culpa here. In Wednesday's paper, I reported the Drug Policy Alliance contributed $25,000 to Richardson's re-election campaign. Reena Szczepanski, who heads the local DPA office, says that's not quite true. It actually was the Drug Policy Alliance Network that gave him the money.

The DPAN is affiliated with DPA, but they are funded separately. As Szczepanski explains it, donations to DPA are tax deductible, but donations to DPAN aren't. Thus, DPA is not legally able to contribute to political candidates while DPAN is.

Also, billionaire George Soros -- who as an individual gave Richardson $25,000 -- sits on the DPA board, but not the DPAN's.

Got all that?

Of course, all this only begs the question: Why is this drug-law-reform group giving so much money to Richardson?

True, Richardson came out this year in favor of a medical-marijuana bill -- though he didn't twist enough arms to get the bill through the House.

But Richardson frequently has criticized his predecessor Gary Johnson for advocating marijuana decriminalization. Richardson has made it clear he doesn't want the state known for wanting to legalize drugs.

During his first month in office, Richardson stood side by side with national drug czar John Walters, a committed drug warrior, calling the visit "a symbolic meeting to show we support (Walters') mission."

And just last summer when John Dendahl got the GOP nomination for governor, several members of Richardson's team attacked the Republican for his past support of several of DPA/DPAN's basic positions on liberalizing marijuana laws.

"We welcome the opportunity to hear John Dendahl explain his pro-drug legalization plan throughout the campaign," read a Richardson press release hours after Dendahl was nominated.

Of course, the $11.6 million Richardson campaign also welcomes the opportunity to collect campaign contributions.

Feds Respond To Chief's Concerns (GREENNR)

By Eric J.S. Townsend And Lorraine Ahearn, Staff Writers

Greensboro (NC) News-Record, October 13, 2006

GREENSBORO — Federal prosecutors are "gravely concerned" about notes from undercover drug cases appearing in a weekly newspaper, but they will not take a lead in investigating possible leaks.

In a letter hand-delivered to the police department Wednesday, U.S. Attorney Anna Mills Wagoner responded to interim police Chief Tim Bellamy's fear that a Sept. 21 article in the Rhinoceros Times "potentially compromised" two ongoing missing persons and possible homicide cases.

The same article revealed that two U.S. Customs agents were working undercover and quoted a verbatim conversation between the agents and the drug kingpin they were investigating.

Wagoner's comments came in response to a sharply critical letter Bellamy sent to her by certified mail Friday, signifying a widening rift between the federal and city agencies.

"I am very disappointed that you do not feel the public release of such information requires any action by your office, " Bellamy wrote. "... There is no question in my mind that the act of releasing this information has the potential of endangering lives."

The two missing persons cases Bellamy referred to were mentioned in the article: the disappearances of Sterling Porter, reported missing in 1997, and Sonjah Kingston, last seen in 2002.

Both Porter and Kingston had connections to Elton Turnbull, the convicted drug dealer whom former police Chief David Wray's Special Intelligence squad suspected of colluding with Lt. James Hinson. The unit never found evidence of illegal drug activity by Hinson.

Wray resigned in January, seven months after Hinson, a black police lieutenant, caught the covert unit trailing him while on duty. At the time, lawyers for Hinson said Special Intelligence was unfairly investigating black police officers, which Wray denied.

Where the Rhinoceros Times article may have raised flags for police was a section that quoted Turnbull telling the two undercover Customs agents that he was bringing Colombians to Greensboro to collect debts and to take care of people causing trouble for him. Without attributing its source, the article said Turnbull told the agents he didn't just want the Colombians merely to "hurt" those causing problems.

"People in the hospital talk," the article quoted Turnbull as saying. "I want them in the cemetery."

Rhinoceros Times editor John Hammer said Wednesday that the city has not offered any specific examples to him about why the stories are harmful.

"We certainly wouldn't want to do anything to endanger anyone undercover," Hammer said. "If they came back with something like that, we could modify what we were doing."

As for the missing persons, he said: "They have been missing for a long time, and I don't think anyone is looking for them anymore. We certainly don't feel they are in any danger."

Bellamy, named interim chief after Wray's resignation, said Wednesday night that he had not yet seen Wagoner's letter. The chief said he is concerned others with information that could help police may not come forward for fear that what they say may end up in the media.

A review of the Wray scandal conducted last year by city attorneys and a Raleigh consulting firm documented a three-year investigation in which Special Intelligence, dubbed the "secret police," reopened allegations against Hinson that Internal Affairs had already ruled groundless.

The most serious allegation was that Hinson was criminally involved with Turnbull, the drug kingpin, after Hinson's cell phone number was found in Turnbull's safe.

In an interview from prison with the News & Record last winter, Turnbull said Greensboro police detectives had repeatedly asked him to provide information against Hinson. He claimed his only connection with Hinson was that they were both romantically involved with the same woman, and that Hinson had sold Turnbull a house the officer had been renting to the woman.

According to court records, a number of co-defendants provided "substantial assistance" to federal drug investigators in exchange for reduced sentences. Turnbull's projected release date, according to the federal Bureau of Prisons, is Jan. 27, 2028.

Wagoner, in her letter to Bellamy , said she perceived no "rift" between the agencies. Yet an affidavit filed in the case two weeks ago stated her staff had not granted interviews to the State Bureau of Investigation. The SBI is investigating the Wray matter to determine whether any crimes were committed.

Wagoner wrote that on the advice of the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel, her staff had invited the SBI to submit questions in writing but had yet to hear back.

One aspect of the Wray investigation that allegedly involved Wagoner's staff was the brief presence of her chief criminal prosecutor during a Special Intelligence interrogation of a Greensboro woman.

Leilehua High School Teacher Arrested On Suspicion Of Meth Distribution (HA)

Honolulu Advertiser, October 12, 2006

Lee Anzai played baseball for Hawai'i Pacific University in the late 1990s. Authorities allege Anzai used ice in college, too.

A Leilehua High School teacher accused of selling crystal methamphetamine allegedly set up drug deals while at school.

Lee N. Anzai, 29, a special education teacher who lives in Mililani, is believed to be the first Hawai'i public school teacher prosecuted on charges of selling "ice." He also allegedly admitted to an undercover officer that he smoked ice.

A Department of Education spokesman yesterday said that under DOE policy, Anzai was not required to undergo drug testing before being hired and there were no drug tests during his six years at the school. DOE policy does not require regular drug testing for employees except in special cases, the spokesman said.

Anzai was arrested late Thursday night and charged with selling about 15 ounces of crystal methamphetamine to an undercover officer for $44,500.

The criminal complaint and affidavit filed in support of the charge against Anzai contain allegations he not only sold ice, but had been an ice user for seven to eight years — dating to 1998 or 1999, when he attended Hawai'i Pacific University and played on its baseball team.

"I gotta smoke," Anzai is quoted as telling an undercover deputy sheriff in the affidavit filed in support of the charge.

PALI LONGS PARKING LOT

Anzai is a former baseball player at Kaiser High School who was an honorable-mention selection on the state all-star team. He was recruited out of high school in 1995 to play for HPU.

He was arrested at the Longs Drug Store on Pali Highway about 11:55 p.m. and charged with selling ice to the officer on five different occasions in various parking lots — away from the Central O'ahu school — over a span of about a month.

But U.S. Attorney Ed Kubo said that for some of the sales, Anzai used a cell phone to set up deals while he was in his classroom or on campus. Kubo added there were no indications Anzai sold drugs to any students.

Authorities obtained a federal search warrant in the pre-dawn hours yesterday and searched Anzai's classroom before the start of the school day at Leilehua High to minimize the disruption to classes.

Federal prosecutors said that after Anzai was arrested, authorities found him in possession of a glass methamphetamine smoking pipe. A torch lighter, a gram scale and several plastic bags with residue that appeared to be consistent with ice were found in his car. A search of Anzai's Mililani home turned up a broken glass methamphetamine pipe, a scale, several marijuana "bong" pipes and a small amount of marijuana, according to federal prosecutors.

'VIOLATED PUBLIC TRUST'

Assistant U.S. Attorney Mike Kawahara said nothing was recovered from the classroom, but said Anzai was a "significant" dealer who had access to nearly a pound of ice that was sold to the undercover officer.

"As a teacher, Mr. Anzai holds a position of trust," Kubo told reporters at a news conference yesterday. By selling ice without any concern for the community, "Mr. Anzai has violated the public trust."

The five charges that Anzai faces carry sentences with a minimum of five years and up to life in prison without parole.

Kubo said if convicted, Anzai may face a stiffer sentence because of his position of public trust and also because negotiating the deals on campus will "weigh heavily" on the sentencing judge.

Anzai appeared in court yesterday afternoon, sometimes shaking his head and covering his face with his hands.

"Just be strong, babe," his wife, Sherri, told him from the gallery as he waited for the court to be convened.

"I love you," the wife said. "What's done is done, yeah?"

The Leilehua High School Web site lists both Lee and Sherri Anzai as special education teachers.

After yesterday's court hearing, Anzai's lawyer, Howard Luke, said it would be premature to respond to the charges. He said he will seek his client's release at a hearing tomorrow on the federal prosecutors' request to hold him without bail while his case is pending.

"He's very distraught," Luke said.

DOJ_NMG_0080426

Luke said his client does not have a criminal record and has the support of his friends and family. Other relatives in the courtroom also expressed support for Anzai after the end of the hearing before he was escorted from the courtroom, but the relatives declined to comment as they left the courthouse.

"He's otherwise a very decent young man and I think we'll be able to communicate that to the court this Friday," Luke said.

Anzai is charged with five counts of selling ice to a deputy sheriff posing undercover as a drug purchaser in amounts ranging from an ounce to 5 ounces.

The sales were conducted at the parking lots of the Kamehameha Shopping Center in Kalihi, the Foodland at Waipi'o Gentry, the Russ K. Makaha Quiksilver Boardriders Club on Kapi'olani Boulevard and the Pali Longs Drug Store, federal prosecutors said.

The undercover agent paid Anzai $44,500 for the ice, according to prosecutors.

Kubo as well as other federal prosecutors, police and Department of Education spokesman Greg Knudsen said they were not aware of any other ice prosecution against a public school teacher. The public schools currently have about 13,000 teachers.

NO CRIMINAL RECORD

Anzai was subjected to a criminal background check prior to employment, Knudsen said. The check showed Anzai had no criminal record when he became a special education teacher, Knudsen said.

Because DOE policy does not require it, he was not given a pre-employment drug screen.

"Under some circumstance we can request an employee seek medical evaluation and drug testing if we have cause to suspect that a person's job performance might be affected by the use of illegal substances," Knudsen said.

There was no evidence that Anzai's performance had been affected, Knudsen said. He declined to say whether Anzai had ever been asked to take a drug test.

"I understand that he related well to the students and at one point was probably a very excellent teacher," he said.

Anzai has been placed on administrative leave.

Teachers and employees in the DOE do not need to undergo any regular routine drug testing, except for some special employees, such as bus drivers, who fall under the regulations of the Public Utilities Commission. Individual employees could be asked to take a test if there is reason to suspect the use of drugs is affecting job performance.

"People can be hired and disciplined based on nonperformance in a number of forms. Whether or not they are not performing based on the effects of some drug or lack of preparation or poor attitude — all those things don't necessarily require drug testing," he said.

He also dismissed questions about whether a mandatory drug-testing policy should be implemented.

"I don't believe it is justified at this point. We are talking about one individual among 13,000 teachers and presumably, if you follow that logic, it should apply to all DOE employers. So we're taking 20,000 to 30,000 individuals and it's not fair to cast all of them under some cloud of suspicion based on this one case," he said.

The Hawai'i State Teachers Association could not be reached for comment yesterday.

COACHES ARE CHECKED

Last week, following the state auditor's finding that Kailua High School had failed to appropriately clear a number of coaches who had criminal records during the past three years — including one who had been convicted of murder — the DOE said it would verify that all public school athletic coaches statewide have had background checks.

The DOE continues to do those checks, and Knudsen said the DOE continues to examine the accuracy of the Kailua audit.

The prosecution's case against Anzai was outlined in a detailed 29-page affidavit by a federal Drug Enforcement Administration agent.

RECORDED PHONE CALLS

According to the affidavit, a confidential informant who owed Anzai a $3,000 drug debt provided the DEA with information. The informant later introduced Anzai to the undercover officer, a deputy sheriff who used the nickname "Duke."

The affidavit quoted extensively from what it said were recorded cell phone conversations detailing negotiations.

In one cell phone conversation, Anzai asked the undercover deputy if he was a "cop," according to the affidavit. The deputy denied it, then asked Anzai if he was really a teacher of if he was actually a cop.

Anzai is accused of selling ice to the undercover deputy two more times after that conversation.

Anzai lives at Apele Place in a quiet cul-de-sac of single-family homes and duplexes in Mililani.

RECENTLY HAD A BABY

Neighbors were shocked yesterday to hear of his arrest. They said Anzai and his wife were a pleasant couple who had recently had a baby.

"He seems like a good guy. He seems like a family man," said Jon Ferrell, who lives two doors down from Anzai. "I never saw anything weird there."

In addition to teaching special education, Anzai has served in various athletic coaching capacities since 2000, DOE spokesman Knudsen said.

Anzai's former baseball coach at HPU, Allan Sato, said he was "very shocked" by the allegations.

"Academically, he proved a lot of people wrong. I don't have anything negative to say about him," Sato said. "As far as drugs, I am shocked. Wow. I'm shocked."

Anzai was senior captain of the HPU baseball team in 1999.

"He was a team guy; he always wanted what was best for the team," Sato said.

He said Anzai was generally well-liked by team members and was popular among the general student body at HPU.

"He was no bully. He was not being Mother Teresa, either. But he was the kind of guy that tried to lead the team in the right direction," Sato said.

$3,000 AN OUNCE: 'THE STUFF IS DEADLY... YEAH, I TRIED' EM'

HHere are excerpts from a criminal complaint and supporting affidavit filed by a federal Drug Enforcement Administration agent in the case against Lee N. Anzai.

Anzai, a special education teacher at Leilehua High School, was arrested Tuesday night and later charged with selling about 15 ounces of crystal methamphetamine to an undercover state deputy sheriff on five occasions.

· Anzai allegedly first sold methamphetamine to an undercover deputy sheriff on Sept. 8. The sale was for 5 grams. He allegedly sold to the same deputy sheriff four other times: Sept. 14, 19, 29 and Oct. 10.

He was arrested at 11:55 p.m. Tuesday night after allegedly selling $12,500 worth of ice to the undercover officer. A methamphetamine pipe was found in his possession and assorted drug paraphernalia and cash was found in his vehicle, the complaint said.

· At 12:35 p.m. Sept. 19, Anzai took a phone call from the undercover officer, later referred to as UC, to allegedly set up a drug deal.

Anzai indicated he was on lunch break at Leilehua High School, and that "the bell going to ring in about 5 minutes."

The undercover officer joked that "make sure you're not late (for) the bell, uh?" and Anzai said, "No, no, no, I stay in my room; it's all good." UC asked, "You get your own classroom?" and Anzai said, "Yeah."

In the same conversation, Anzai also allegedly indicated he had 5 ounces in hand and could proceed directly to a meeting site to complete the drug transaction.

Honolulu Teacher Charged In Drug Case (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, October 12, 2006

HONOLULU -- A teacher accused of arranging drug sales while at school was charged with selling crystal meth to an undercover officer, officials said Wednesday.

If convicted, Lee Nobuo Anzai, 29, could face up to life in prison, said U.S. Attorney Edward Kubo Jr.

The Leilehua High School teacher is accused of selling nearly a pound of the drug between Sept. 8 and Tuesday night, the prosecutor said.

A telephone message left by The Associated Press for Anzai's attorney, Howard Luke, was not immediately returned Wednesday.

Anzai had been a special education teacher for six years at the school in Wahiawa and has been put on administrative leave.

Department of Education spokesman Greg Knudsen said there is no drug screening program for the state's 13,000 teachers without cause or justification.

Anzai's case "didn't involve students and it didn't really affect his job performance," Knudsen said.

Unit Is Scoring Big In War On Drugs (HA)

Honolulu Advertiser, October 12, 2006

The anti-drug task force played a big role in the arrest of a Leilehua High School teacher suspected of selling crystal methamphetamine. Members of the task force were present at the press conference in which U.S. Attorney Ed Kubo announced the arrest.

An anti-drug task force that played a major role in this week's crystal meth arrest of a Leilehua High School teacher has recorded a series of knockouts since being created eight months ago, officials said yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0080428

The Hawai'i Rapid Reduction Drug Unit has produced 30 federal and seven state drug arrests, seized 35 pounds of crystal methamphetamine and 5 pounds of cocaine, 11 firearms, five vehicles and $710,000 from February through September.

Lt. Gov. James "Duke" Aiona and Anthony "Tony" Williams, assistant special agent in charge of Drug Enforcement Administration operations in Hawai'i, spearheaded the formation of the joint federal, state and city law enforcement task force.

It was a deputy sheriff assigned to the drug unit who posed as the buyer in the investigation and arrest of Leilehua High special-education teacher Lee Anzai, officials said.

Other significant task force investigations resulted in convictions of Rudy Generalao, who has admitted to controlling ice distribution from Nanakuli to Wai'anae; Jarret Kaneshiro's organization, which included career criminals Bryan Higa, Marvin Quemado and Denny Quiambao; and another group with Oakland, Calif.-based Alejandro Panares supplying ice and crack cocaine to Hawai'i dealers Joseph Tomo, Linda Masuda and Henry Liu.

Aiona said the drug unit was organized to address a common community complaint that law enforcement agencies do not respond when drug activity is reported. "It has not disappointed," Aiona said of the unit.

The Rapid Reduction Drug Unit's full-time core group consists of three deputy sheriffs from the state Public Safety Department, two Honolulu police officers, one agent each from the FBI, Immigration & Customs Enforcement and DEA, and also a part-time DEA agent, Williams said. All have DEA enforcement powers, Williams said.

"The key here is the public should know their calls and complaints matters and are not falling on deaf ears," Williams said. "We want them to know we will protect you. Our investigations are designed to be swift and impact communities."

The Rapid Reduction Drug Unit is among the many joint task forces under the umbrella of Hawai'i High-Intensity Drug Trafficking Areas program.

By targeting the distribution network and not just top-level players, the drug unit is helping to take out what Williams calls "individuals who have been flying under the federal radar for years."

The distribution network includes many players involved in burglaries, thefts, robberies, auto thefts, identity thefts, extortion and fraud, federal officials said.

Leilehua Teacher Charged In 'ice' Distribution (HSB)

Honolulu Star-Bulletin, October 13, 2006

The quick arrest of a high school teacher for allegedly selling "ice" could not have been accomplished without a new anti-drug task force, one official said.

The Hawaii Rapid Reduction Drug Task Force was created in February and is made up of members of the Honolulu Police Department, Sheriff Division, Drug Enforcement Administration, Federal Bureau of Investigation and Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

It was formed to review complaints made by the community about suspicious drug-related activities and to match up the information to intelligence under the federal government, U.S. Attorney Ed Kubo said during a news conference.

Its mission is to "quickly and aggressively investigate and arrest in a mid- to low-level neighborhood drug dealers in hopes of working our way into the prosecution of drug organizations above them," Kubo said.

The arrest of special-education teacher Lee N. Anzai just before midnight Tuesday was initiated through calls made by residents to the Honolulu Police Department's Narcotics/Vice Division.

Members of the task force match complaints received through the Honolulu Police Department and collaborate with 12 other agencies, Kubo said.

From February through September, the task force:

» Made 30 federal drug-related arrests.

» Seized 35 pounds of ice and five pounds of cocaine.

» Seized 11 firearms, five vehicles and $710,000 in cash.

Authorities continue to urge residents to call the HPD's Narcotics/Vice Division at 529-3101 if they suspect drug activity in their neighborhood.

"The public should know that your calls and complaints are not falling on deaf ears and that they do matter," said Tony Williams, assistant special agent-in-charge of the Drug Enforcement Administration in Honolulu. "A lot of times, the information that we receive from the public would give us a little bit more, that small piece of puzzle that would help investigators succeed."

Complaint calls made to authorities involved in the task force led to the arrest of Bryan Higa and Marvin Quemado, who allegedly stole $2 million worth of jewelry from a salesman in Waipahu in June. Both have a criminal history involving drug-related offenses.

Ex-Police Lieutenant Gets Prison Term In Drug Money Case (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

A retired police lieutenant who admitted to stealing more than $110,000 in drug cash over three years, all while he supervised 40 narcotics detectives in Upper Manhattan, was sentenced to 14 months in federal prison yesterday for conspiring to launder the money.

The retired lieutenant, John T. Maguire, supervised two detectives who stole money with him and who were later captured on videotape in 2003 robbing a drug courier of $169,000, a crime that led to a sweeping police corruption investigation and the department's biggest scandal in a decade.

The investigation ultimately implicated as many as 10 current or retired detectives, but only Mr. Maguire, the two men caught on videotape and a third detective were charged with crimes. Another detective has been fired. The department is seeking to fire two others.

Mr. Maguire, who earned a degree from Columbia University, where he studied political science on a basketball scholarship, faced nearly four years in prison. But the prosecutor in the case wrote a letter that cited his cooperation with the investigation and enabled the judge in the case, Carol B. Amon of United States District Court in Brooklyn, to hand down a lighter sentence.

In agonized and remorseful remarks, Mr. Maguire, wearing a blue pin-striped suit and a red tie, apologized for the humiliation, dishonor and pain he had brought upon the Police Department and his wife and three young daughters. The girls and their mother, along with other family members and friends, filled the courtroom gallery's first two rows.

"I'm ashamed of myself and I live in shame every single day," he said.

"I knew I did wrong and I confessed to God my sins," he added, pausing as his voice choked with emotion. "I asked his forgiveness."

His lawyer, Eric W. Siegle, called the crimes "despicable and horrible." But he sought to distinguish the 51-year-old Mr. Maguire from the two men caught on the video, Thomas Rachko and Julio C. Vasquez. They robbed people, sometimes at gunpoint, and resold drugs, he argued, while Mr. Maguire just stole drug money from apartments, and in one case $96,000 packed in cereal boxes stashed in a parked car.

Mr. Siegle requested a sentence of probation for his client. But the judge said that while she found Mr. Maguire to be genuinely remorseful, the crimes he committed while in a position of power and authority warranted a prison term.

"He was their commander," she said early in the proceeding, speaking of Mr. Maguire's relationship with Mr. Rachko and Mr. Vasquez. "He knew what they were up to. He had the power to stop all this."

When Judge Amon handed down the 14-month prison term, all three of Mr. Maguire's daughters began to weep, and the oldest dropped her head into her mother's lap, shaking with sobs.

Mr. Maguire, who retired in July 2001 after 20 years on the force, worked in a narcotics unit when the three men stole together. Earlier, he had served as a Harlem precinct's Integrity Control Officer. He forfeited $110,000 as part of his plea.

Last week, Mr. Vasquez was sentenced to six years in prison.

Today, Mr. Rachko faces up to life in prison.

Uribe Vs. The Drug Thugs (WSJ)

By Mary Anastasia O'Grady

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

To get an idea of how long Afghanistan's war against narco-trafficking terrorists could last, the Colombian experience with criminals of a similar ilk might be instructive -- though not encouraging. That thought occurred to me after an interview with Colombian President Álvaro Uribe in New York last week.

Mr. Uribe may be the most clear-thinking, courageous ally in the war on terror that the U.S. has in Latin America, and Washington has spent billions of dollars trying to eradicate coca plants in his country. That is to say, there has been no lack of political will in the fight against drug thugs in Colombia. If other world leaders have gone wobbly on fighting terrorism, Mr. Uribe has not. "Under no circumstances will the government weaken its policy on democratic security," he told me emphatically last week.

But as the popular president begins his second four-year term, his challenges are daunting. While it is true that guerrilla kidnappings and killings are down sharply since he instituted his policy of "democratic security" in 2002, it is also true that Colombians have rising expectations of the man who did so much in his first term to push back the terrorists and restore Colombian confidence. The trouble is that, despite these efforts, the persistent demand for illicit cocaine from the U.S. and Europe is still feeding an organized-crime network that has little incentive to take up honest work. Drug-financed terrorism remains a constant drain on resources and an impediment to Colombian development.

Mr. Uribe put the Sisyphean task ahead of him clearly when I asked about progress in the war on drugs: "Colombia is a great ally of the U.S. In spraying, extradition, forfeiture of assets and manual eradication we have done our best. However, in relation to our efforts, we need better results." In other words, despite copious amounts of Colombian blood, sweat and tears, the reality of demand for a high-priced commodity keeps the goal to end supply out of reach.

The most immediate challenge facing the president involves the fate of 62 kidnap victims now held by the drug-trafficking Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC). In recent weeks the FARC has turned up the pressure on Mr. Uribe to agree to an exchange of 500 FARC operatives held by the government for the 62 kidnap victims, some of whom have been hostages for years. The guerrilla objectives are clear: A good number of the FARC prisoners are important mid-level commandantes whom the organization needs.

To boost public support for an exchange, the FARC has been releasing video tapes of the hostages to the Colombian media. Relatives of the hostages are then filmed, tears streaming down their faces as they view their loved ones held captive.

It has long been the policy of the Uribe government that any prisoner release must be carried out in accordance with the law and that any prisoner who is freed must agree to lay down arms. So I asked Mr. Uribe whether he would negotiate with the guerrillas. "I have expressed my willingness to open negotiations under conditions of good faith," he told me. "So far we have no negotiations but given good faith, we would talk."

This seems, at first, a departure from the standard views of a hard-liner on terrorism. But in fact it is a continuation of his hope for reconciliation, a hope that Mr. Uribe has held since I first interviewed him in 1997, when he was governor of the Colombian state of Antioquia. That hope may be even greater today because of the success the government has had in bringing so many of the lawless in from the cold. It is a record he is proud of. "At this moment we have completed the demobilization of 40,000 [individuals]," he says. "Over 7,000 came from the guerrillas and over 30,000 were [in the paramilitary]. There is no previous comparison [of these results]. When Colombia had the demobilization of the [former rebel group] M-19, there were 900 people [demobilized]. This is the biggest guerrilla demobilization in our history."

Despite Mr. Uribe's hope, though, if the government sticks to its policy that freed prisoners must renounce violence, not much is likely to happen. The FARC wants the swap so it can regroup. Moreover, on the subject of a broader peace negotiation, FARC leadership seems to think it can play the same game it played with previous governments, pretending to want peace so as to gain a safe haven for its businesses in arms, drugs and kidnapping. That much comes through in an open letter from FARC leaders sent to the three branches of government on Oct. 2. The letter details the conditions that the FARC demands for peace talks, "once the swap [of prisoners for kidnapping victims] is completed."

At the top of the list is the demilitarization of the coca growing states of Caquetá and Putumayo, followed by the suspension of orders to the military for the capture of FARC leadership, and an army withdrawal to its barracks. As if those demands weren't ridiculous enough, the letter goes on to say that the government must make an appeal to the international community to stop referring to the FARC as terrorists. Tell that to the 12-year-old girl who lost her leg, her parents and her four-year-old sister in the FARC attack on Club Nogal in Bogotá in 2003. That bombing, aimed at innocent civilians, killed 35 people and injured more than 170. It is a good example of why polls in Colombia put public support for the FARC at 1%.

Mr. Uribe understands that in addition to being open to talks and pushing security, he also has to show that he is responsive to political, economic and social problems. In our interview he stressed judicial reforms under his government, including the introduction of an oral-trial system similar to what is used in the U.S., an increase in judicial independence and the transfer of more legal cases against the military to civilian court jurisdiction. He also emphasized the importance of boosting economic growth, although he has already tripped on this issue by allowing a bold tax reform -- designed to stimulate investment by cutting and simplifying taxes -- to be perverted by special interests. Analysts are now warning that if Mr. Uribe is smart, he will pull the bill rather than let it further damage Colombia's investment profile.

Still, his biggest problem remains security, and it is hard to imagine real progress unless the demand for illegal drugs collapses in Europe and the U.S., or rich countries change their prohibition policies.

Tax Revolt: Plaintiffs File Coordinated Cases Against IRS (LAW)

By Emma Schwartz, Legal Times

Legal Times, October 13, 2006

Michael Stephens hates the Internal Revenue Service. He believes it steals his money, and he won't stand for it.

"That's all we are, is slaves," says the 49-year-old truck driver from Georgia, who sued the agency. He claims he is entitled to damages through the Taxpayer Bill of Rights for alleged misconduct in tax collection by the IRS.

DOJ_NMG_0080431

Stephen's complaint -- which Judge Ellen Huvelle of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia dismissed in June -- might simply be a footnote in the flood of pro se cases that pour into the courthouse each year, except that Stephens isn't alone. His complaint is one of 108 nearly identical cases filed since last fall by plaintiffs from Oregon to Florida.

The effort hasn't seen much success; so far, 40 have been dismissed because of the plaintiffs' failure to exhaust their administrative remedies. But the cases managed to pique curiosity in judges' chambers.

So who's behind this effort?

Stephens won't say. Nor would more than two dozen other plaintiffs, who either did not return calls or declined to answer questions.

Seattle's Heidi Broward, whose husband Paul had his claim dismissed in July, says the suits are a coordinated effort by people who met through "various things over the Web and from years and years of networking."

The complaints are the brainchild of Chicago-based anti-tax activist George Pragovich, Broward says: "He's one of the major coordinators of what we're doing. I just fill out the forms and send them in."

But Pragovich wouldn't talk.

"Let me put it like this: Like they say on TV, I can't discuss pending litigation," Pragovich said before hanging up the phone.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Gives Hastert Boost In Time Of Need (AP-Y)

By Nedra Pickler

AP-Yahoo, October 13, 2006

President Bush stood shoulder-to-shoulder with embattled House Speaker Dennis Hastert on Thursday, offering a powerful boost in his moment of need and declaring the country "better off" with Hastert in power.

"I am proud to be standing with the current speaker of the House who is going to be the future speaker of the House," Bush said as he opened a speech to raise money for two Illinois congressional candidates.

The $1.1 million fundraiser provided the first picture of Bush with Hastert since a scandal broke involving a Republican congressman pursuing underage male pages. Although the president has spoken out in Hastert's defense — tepidly at first and more directly at a White House news conference on the eve of the fundraiser — their appearance together was an endorsement of Hastert when nearly half the country says he should resign.

Their long-scheduled fundraiser was sponsored by Hastert and came on the same day that the House Ethics Committee questioned ex-Rep. Mark Foley's chief of staff, Kirk Fordham, for five hours. Fordham has said he took complaints about Foley's conduct to Hastert's top aide three or four years ago.

Hastert's office has said it learned of Foley's conduct only last fall, and the speaker has said he first was notified in late September this year.

Bush defended him, without mentioning the Foley case.

"Speaker Denny Hastert has a long record of accomplishment," Bush said. "He's not one of these Washington politicians who spews a lot of hot air. He just gets the job done."

The crowd of Republican donors standing in a downtown Chicago hotel ballroom responded with loud applause.

"I have worked with him up close," Bush continued. "I know what it's like to work with a speaker who is determined to protect the United States of America and a speaker who wants to make sure that everybody who wants a job in America can find one.

"He has delivered results for the people," Bush said. "This country is better off with Denny Hastert as the speaker and it will be better off when he is the speaker the next legislative session."

Whether Hastert and the Republican Party will remain in power in the House next year is in doubt. Democrats need to pick up just 15 seats to win control, and Republican-held seats across the country are in jeopardy in the wake of the Foley case, continuing violence in Iraq and the dissatisfaction with Bush's leadership.

The beneficiaries of the fundraiser — Republican congressional candidates Peter Roskam and David McSweeney — spoke differently about the president.

McSweeney noted that although Bush lost Illinois in 2004, he won the district where he is running. "When the president comes to town, it provides good exposure," said McSweeney, who is in an uphill battle to oust freshman Democratic Rep. Melissa Bean.

DOJ_NMG_0080432

Roskam said he was thankful for the president's "tremendous fundraising boost" and his leadership on tax cuts and keeping America safe. But Roskam's Democratic opponent, Iraq war veteran Tammy Duckworth, has been criticizing his close ties to the party, and Roskam tried to distance himself from Bush's policies on education, spending and immigration.

"I've been very vocal in my separation and criticism of the administration," he said.

Attendees at the fundraiser had to donate at least $1,000 per person, and the invitation advertised that $10,000 would get a photo with the president, "two people, one click," and 10 reception passes.

Sen. John Kerry tried to use the Bush-Hastert appearance to raise money for Democratic candidates, calling it "a meeting of the no accountability caucus of the Republican Party."

"Denny Hastert has been the longest-running Republican speaker in history," Kerry, D-Mass., wrote in an e-mail to supporters. "But in 25 days, we can take the gavel out of his hands — and the smirk off George W. Bush's face."

When Bush arrived in Marine One at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport, he was greeted by rock star Bono, model Christy Turlington and Bobby Shriver, who runs an organization called DATA — or Debt, AIDS and Trade in Africa. The three were in Chicago to attend an AIDS event.

Turlington and Bono, who has been active in raising awareness of poverty and AIDS, climbed the stairs of Air Force One with the president. Bono flashed a peace sign before the group went in the plane for a 10-minute conversation with Bush about AIDS. The three visitors left the plane before it took off for Washington.

Bush Joins Hastert At Rally, And Lavishes The Praise (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

CHICAGO, Oct. 12 — President Bush came to the home turf of the House speaker, J. Dennis Hastert, on Thursday to give him a resounding pledge of support before a revved-up group of Republican donors, activists and leaders who were clearly glad to witness a presidential lift for the buffeted dean of their state party.

Appearing at a fund-raising event for two local Republican House candidates facing competitive races, David McSweeney and Peter Roskam, Mr. Bush bounded onto the stage alongside Mr. Hastert, whose Congressional district is several miles outside Chicago. Standing beside the speaker, Mr. Bush, wearing a smile that lasted for minutes, gave him a hearty handshake as Mr. Hastert, beaming, patted him on the back.

Mr. Bush came here with a far larger retinue of photographers and reporters than usual for such campaign trips. It was evidence of the anticipation surrounding his visit as questions continued to swirl about what Mr. Hastert's office knew, and when, about former Representative Mark Foley's e-mail to male pages.

Mr. Bush seemed more than happy to oblige, after Mr. Hastert introduced the president as "our friend" and "our leader."

"Before I liberate the speaker so he doesn't have to stand up here for that long, Speaker, I want to say this to you," Mr. Bush said. "I am proud to be standing with the current speaker of the House who is going to be the future speaker of the House."

"He's not one of these Washington politicians who spews a lot of hot air — he just gets the job done," Mr. Bush said as the room erupted. "This country is better off with Denny Hastert as the speaker."

Mr. Bush's appearance completed what has appeared to be a gradual but now unmistakable White House embrace of Mr. Hastert since news first surfaced that Mr. Foley had sent risqué e-mail to Congressional pages. The visit reflected in part a calculation by the White House and party leaders that providing a protective phalanx for the speaker would help cool some of the heat from the controversy and press ahead on the party's election-year message on terrorism and taxes.

Mr. Bush seemed to provide an object lesson to his party on that strategy here, weaving praise for Mr. Hastert into his standard stump speech that takes Democrats to task as trying to block his terrorism initiatives and threatening to end his tax cuts.

Speaking about Democratic resistance to the USA Patriot Act, a regular part of his campaign speeches, Mr. Bush broke off and said, "By the way, the speaker led the charge in making sure the House passed the Patriot Act the first time and then reauthorized it."

Accusing Democrats of failing to understand the true threat of terrorists, Mr. Bush said at another point, "I see the threat; the speaker sees the threat."

Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for Mr. Hastert, said his boss appreciated the gesture.

"It's the pick-me-up that everyone really needed to help us focus toward November," Mr. Bonjean said.

The event raised $1.1 million.

Bush And Hastert Rally The GOP (CHIT)

By Mark Silva And Rick Pearson

DOJ_NMG_0080433

Chicago Tribune, October 13, 2006

President Bush delivered an in-person show of support for House Speaker Dennis Hastert on Thursday and professed optimism for Republicans in next month's elections, but a new Tribune/WGN-TV poll shows a majority of Illinois voters disapprove of the president's job performance and nearly 60 percent are unhappy with the GOP-led Congress.

The survey also shows nearly half of voters disapprove of the way Hastert, of far west suburban Plano, has handled the congressional page controversy that led to former Rep. Mark Foley's resignation. Reflecting a potential parochial bias toward a native son, a narrow plurality of Illinois voters say Hastert should not resign as speaker.

The results of the poll, conducted from Sunday to Wednesday, came as Bush traveled to Illinois to raise funds for suburban Republican congressional candidates Peter Roskam and David McSweeney—and to deliver his first personal show of support for Hastert since the congressional page scandal consumed the House Republican leadership two weeks ago.

"I am proud to be standing with the current speaker of the House, who is going to be the future speaker of the House," Bush told several hundred people at an intimate fundraising reception at the Chicago Hilton and Towers on Michigan Avenue.

"Speaker Denny Hastert has a long record of accomplishment and he's not one of these Washington politicians who spews a lot of hot air," the president said. "He just gets the job done."

Bush and Hastert stood shoulder-to-shoulder—though only for a few minutes—on a low stage within arms' reach of a cheering audience. Hastert, who spoke only briefly in introducing Bush, called the president "our friend" and "our leader."

As Bush works to make the economy and war on terror the focal points in the final weeks of the campaign, he portrayed Hastert as a staunch ally.

"I have worked with him up close. I know what it's like to work with a speaker who is determined to protect the United States of America," Bush said. "The country is better off with Denny Hastert as speaker and it will be better off with him as speaker the next legislative session."

With those words, Bush turned and shook Hastert's hand, and Hastert and the party's congressional candidates left the stage to the president.

It was the first time that Bush had appeared in public with Hastert since Foley's resignation on Sept. 29 following reports that Foley had sent sexually explicit electronic messages to an underage congressional page. Hastert has maintained that he knew nothing of any improper communications between Foley and pages until that day. But several House members and staffers say they knew of problems {ndash} and reported them to the speaker's office {ndash} as long ago as 2000.

In Washington, the House ethics committee heard 4 ½ hours of sworn testimony from Kirk Fordham, Foley's former chief of staff, who has said publicly that he warned Hastert chief of staff Scott Palmer of Foley's inappropriate conduct with pages at least three years ago. Palmer has denied this.

Fordham would not discuss his testimony, but his attorney, Timothy Heaphy, said: "He has been consistent in his accounts of these events when he talked to the FBI and today met with the ethics committee."

The president maintains the page scandal, which has erupted in the weeks before the Nov. 7 elections in which control of Congress is at stake, will not "drive the election." Instead, he insists, GOP promises of tax cuts and protecting national security will resonate with voters.

"The biggest issue facing this country is who best to protect you," Bush said.

"I see the threat. The speaker sees the threat," the president said. "We've got a plan for victory in this war on terror."

While Bush presses tax cuts and a war on terror, Democrats are attempting to use the page scandal as one of their campaign weapons {ndash} questioning Hastert's leadership as Bush campaigned here.

Calling the appearance of Bush and Hastert "a meeting of the 'no accountability' caucus of the Republican Party," Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) issued his own fundraising appeal to supporters with e-mails Thursday.

The $850,000 that the Chicago fundraiser generated was one measurement of the popularity of Bush and Hastert.

But in a state that has been turning increasingly Democratic, the latest Tribune poll showed only 36 percent of Illinois voters approved of the job Bush has been doing in the White House, while 56 percent disapproved.

The Illinois results mirror recent national polls that have shown Bush's job approval rating ranging from 33 percent to 39 percent. One year ago, a similar Tribune survey found Bush's job approval rating at 33 percent.

The latest Tribune poll, conducted by Market Shares Corp. of Mt. Prospect, surveyed 600 likely Illinois voters for the Nov. 7 election. The survey had a margin of error of 4 percentage points.

As for Hastert, 48 percent of voters said they disapproved of his handling of the Foley situation amid FBI and House ethics committee investigations into whether congressional leaders, members or staff had prior knowledge of the former Florida Republican congressman's communications with teenage pages. Only 24 percent of the voters approved of Hastert's leadership on the issue.

DOJ_NMG_0080434

But a plurality of 42 percent of the state's voters said Hastert should not resign his speakership as a result of the controversy, while 32 percent said he should step down and 27 percent had no opinion.

Half of the voters surveyed said the scandal would not have any influence on their votes for Congress, but three in 10 voters said they would be more likely to cast a ballot for the Democratic candidate as a result.

Despite providing some home-state encouragement to stay on as speaker, the poll findings also show high voter dissatisfaction with the GOP-led Congress and Republican control of the White House, the Senate and the House.

A total of 58 percent of voters surveyed said they disapproved of the job being done by the Republican majority in Congress, including 55 percent of self-described independent voters who are a voting bloc key to GOP success in Illinois. More voters in the Republican-oriented suburban collar counties expressed dissatisfaction than said they were satisfied—44 percent to 40 percent—while 57 percent of Downstate and suburban Cook County voters also expressed disapproval.

Moreover, the poll found that 59 percent of Illinois voters believe Republicans have too much power in Washington through their control of the White House and Congress, including half of the voters in the collar counties, 54 percent Downstate, 59 percent in suburban Cook County, 78 percent in Chicago and a quarter of self-identified GOP voters.

At the fundraiser, Roskam and McSweeney each said they had no problems sharing a stage with Bush and Hastert. Roskam is running against Democrat Tammy Duckworth for the 6th Congressional District seat being vacated by veteran Republican Rep. Henry Hyde of Wood Dale. McSweeney is challenging first-term Democratic Rep. Melissa Bean of Barrington.

"It is obviously the first time that the speaker and the president will share a podium since the events as of late and it's gotten a lot of attention from that point of view," Roskam said, "but from my campaign's point of view, this is helping to raise funds so that we can get our message on television."

Bush Stands By Hastert At Illinois Fundraiser (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, October 13, 2006

CHICAGO -- President Bush yesterday stood shoulder to shoulder with embattled House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert and predicted that the Illinoisan will return after Election Day as the head of a Republican-controlled House.

Appearing with Mr. Hastert for the first time since Rep. Mark Foley, Florida Republican, abruptly resigned over sexually explicit messages he sent to teenage male pages, the president praised the speaker as a man of integrity. But Mr. Bush steered clear of the scandal that has hurt Republicans nationwide and left the speaker fighting for his political life.

"I am proud to be standing with the current speaker of the House, who is going to be the future speaker of the House," Mr. Bush said to whoops and cheers from Republican supporters.

"This man has a long record of accomplishment. You know, he's not one of these Washington politicians who spews a lot of hot air. He just gets the job done. ... He has delivered results for the people. This country is better off with ... Denny Hastert as the speaker, and it will be better off when he's the speaker the next legislative session," the president said.

Although the president did not call Mr. Hastert for several days after the Foley scandal broke, he traveled to Chicago yesterday to attend fundraisers for several local candidates and spent several minutes on stage posing with Mr. Hastert.

Mr. Bush has begun publicly backing Mr. Hastert, who appears to have withstood demands that he step down from his post for failing to police his own ranks. The president Wednesday called Mr. Hastert "very credible" and last week said he was a "father, teacher and coach who cares about the children of this country."

The campaign event yesterday was for U.S. House candidates David McSweeney and Peter Roskam, each of whom said he supports Mr. Hastert as speaker. Mr. McSweeney is trying to unseat a freshman Democrat, and Mr. Roskam hopes to succeed retiring Rep. Henry J. Hyde, Illinois Republican.

Mr. McSweeney said he supports Mr. Hastert but wants the several investigations under way completed swiftly.

"I believe that what we need to see is have a full and thorough investigation, see the [House] ethics committee investigation completed, the Justice Department investigation completed. I think Speaker Hastert is a man of integrity, and what I believe is we need to complete this investigation and get all the facts," Mr. McSweeney said.

Democrats continued their assault on the speaker. Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, trying to use the Bush-Hastert appearance to raise money for Democratic candidates, called it "a meeting of the no-accountability caucus of the Republican Party."

"Denny Hastert has been the longest-running Republican speaker in history," Mr. Kerry wrote in an e-mail to supporters. "But in 25 days, we can take the gavel out of his hands -- and the smirk off George W. Bush's face."

Mr. Hastert has insisted that he was unaware that the congressman from Florida was sending sexually explicit messages until Mr. Foley resigned two weeks ago. With less than a month to the election, the White House is doing its best to support the speaker. Press secretary Tony Snow is scheduled to appear at a fundraiser with Mr. Hastert tomorrow.

Mr. Hastert, who looked tired, made no comments at yesterday's event. Instead, he simply introduced Mr. Bush to the partisan crowd.

He was slow to get a handle on the scandal, as other Republican leaders sought to distance themselves from the embattled speaker. But two weeks of bad headlines have not hurt Mr. Hastert, 64, who has served 20 years in Congress and six years before that in the Illinois House. He is expected to win handily in his district, where he won two years ago with almost 70 percent of the vote.

Bush Backs Hastert When Backing Hastert Isn't Cool (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, October 13, 2006

CHICAGO — Under ordinary circumstances, there would have been nothing remarkable about President Bush's praise Thursday for House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert at a political fundraiser.

But this is not an ordinary year. Hastert is struggling to cope with the fallout from how his office handled reports that former Florida Republican Rep. Mark Foley dispatched inappropriate electronic messages to a former congressional page.

With his big verbal hug for the speaker, Bush left no doubt about his support for the Illinois Republican at the start of the $1.1-million fundraiser. He gave the speaker a handshake and declared at the start of his speech: "I am proud to be standing with the current speaker of the House, who is going to be the future speaker of the House."

His remark prompted applause and cheers.

"He's not one of these Washington politicians who spews a lot of hot air. He just gets the job done," Bush said of Hastert, the longest-serving Republican House speaker.

He continued effusively: "I have worked with him up close. I know what it is like to work with a speaker who is determined to protect the United States of America. And a speaker who wants to make sure that everybody who wants a job in America can find one. He has delivered results for the people. This country is better off with Denny Hastert as the speaker, and it will be better off when he is the speaker the next legislative session."

In addition to his support for Hastert, the president's remarks signaled his belief that the impact of the scandal should not reach beyond Foley.

Bush has had little to say in public on the matter, other than to express at a news conference Wednesday his strong disapproval of Foley's behavior, which included vivid sexual messages to pages and former pages.

Despite Bush's support, GOP candidates in several close races have canceled Hastert appearances at fundraising events.

Bush and other Republicans hope to return the focus of the campaign to national security issues. But the Foley scandal continued to play out Thursday as witnesses testified before the House Ethics Committee.

Among them was a former Foley aide who has said he complained to the speaker's office about Foley's conduct long before the speaker's office acknowledged having received a complaint.

Democrats, meanwhile, continued to highlight Foley's conduct. In the latest TV ad, which began running Thursday in a Nevada congressional race, Democratic challenger Tessa Hafen accuses Republican incumbent Jon Porter of taking "thousands in contributions from … leaders who covered up the actions of sexual predator Mark Foley."

Bush's praise for Hastert came at a fundraising reception at the Chicago Hilton Hotel for Peter Roskam and David McSweeney and other Illinois Republican congressional candidates. Roskam is in a difficult race against Tammy Duckworth, a former soldier who lost both legs from injuries in Iraq. McSweeney is seeking to unseat Rep. Melissa Bean.

Both races are drawing high-powered supporters — in addition to the president, they include First Lady Laura Bush and former President Clinton. Both districts, encompassing suburbs west and north of Chicago, are among the growing number seen as up for grabs and as key to control of the House.

Bush started his day Thursday in St. Louis at a conference on renewable energy, where he promoted tax credits for buyers of hybrid vehicles and federal spending to help industry develop new battery technology. He also talked up solar energy, wind power and particularly nuclear power.

Bush's advocacy of ethanol and other fuels that can be replenished drew mixed reviews from environmental advocates.

Nathanael Greene, with the Natural Resources Defense Council, praised Bush for focusing on the issue but said the nation needs to promote "solutions already available today — like stronger fuel-economy performance standards for all vehicles, and hybrid vehicles."

The president was interrupted briefly by a woman who shouted, "Out of Iraq now!"

As she was led out, she changed her chant to a message that reflected the theme of the conference: "Soldiers aren't renewable."

President Praises Hastert At GOP Fundraiser In Chicago (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

CHICAGO, Oct. 12 -- President Bush demonstrated his support for embattled House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) on Thursday, joining him at a GOP fundraiser where he praised Hastert as selfless and an effective leader.

Bush, making his first appearance with Hastert since conservative activists called for the speaker's resignation because of his failure to stem the congressional page scandal, made it clear that he hopes Hastert continues as House leader.

"I am proud to be standing with the current speaker of the House who is going to be the future speaker of the House," Bush said.

The president offered his personal endorsement of Hastert at a reception that raised about $1.1 million for Republican House candidates Peter Roskam and David McSweeney at a downtown Chicago hotel. Hastert introduced Bush at the event, and the two stood side by side until Bush began his remarks.

Hastert came under fire from conservatives after Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) stepped down over sexually explicit electronic messages he sent to teenage boys who had served as congressional pages. Hastert's critics say he should have intervened sooner to address the inappropriate behavior, which some in Congress said has been known in some circles for years. Hastert, however, insists he did not learn about it until two weeks ago when Foley resigned.

The scandal has broken at a particularly inopportune time for Republicans, who are struggling to retain control of Congress in the face of growing public discontent with the Iraq war and economic anxieties that persist despite a surging stock market and gasoline prices that have fallen in recent weeks after sharp increases.

Since Foley resigned, Bush has gradually ramped up his public shows of support for Hastert. "This country is better off with Denny Hastert as the speaker, and it will be better off when he is the speaker" in the next Congress, Bush said.

Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) mocked the president's appearance with Hastert in a fundraising e-mail to supporters, calling it "a meeting of the no accountability caucus of the Republican Party."

Earlier in the day, Bush spoke at a conference on renewable energy in St. Louis, where he touted his administration's efforts to ease the nation's dependence on foreign oil by promoting and developing alternative fuels such as ethanol, hydrogen, solar and wind power.

A woman in the crowd stood up during Bush's remarks and chanted, "Out of Iraq now." Bush ignored her and continued his speech, and the event staff swiftly removed the heckler.

While the president was well received by the audience at the St. Louis Convention Center, some environmental advocates accuse him of not doing enough to promote renewable energy sources while turning his back on conservation tools within his reach, including requiring more stringent fuel-economy standards.

"The president's budget falls well short of his rhetoric when it comes to supporting the development of biofuels," said Jim Presswood, a federal energy advocate for the Natural Resources Defense Council. "After a year of volatile and record-high gas price, surely we can do more to break our oil addiction."

Bush Says Lower Oil Prices Won't Blunt New-Fuel Push (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

ST. LOUIS, Oct. 12 — With a tailwind of strong political support behind them, advocates for renewable fuels declared Thursday that ethanol is here to stay and issued a call for greater research and investment to solve the challenges still preventing broader use.

At a conference to promote bio-fuels, President Bush suggested that the push to wean America from its oil addiction would be a priority of the last two years of his presidency.

"Let me put it bluntly," Mr. Bush said. "We are too dependent on oil."

Mr. Bush promised that his administration would continue to pay for research into breakthrough technologies in ethanol, hybrid vehicles and nuclear power, and would uphold tax credits that he said were encouraging private investment to flood into the sector.

While saying that corn-produced ethanol was good for farmers and good for the country's economy, he also said ethanol from noncorn crops, like wood chips and switchgrass, a tall, drought-resistant prairie grass, would be needed to supply enough of the fuel to substantially blunt America's dependence on oil.

"The low gas prices," he said, "are not going to dim my enthusiasm to diversify from oil."

DOJ_NMG_0080437

Mr. Bush's speech capped a two-day conference that featured government and industry leaders, including three members of Mr. Bush's cabinet, chief executives from Fortune 500 companies like Archer Daniels Midland and DuPont, and venture capitalists like Vinod Khosla.

Industry groups, in particular the National Corn Growers Association, have been holding a series of meetings across the country in recent months to cheerlead for ethanol and biodiesel, which are at the center of broad efforts to overhaul the Midwestern farm economy.

"We are guided by the need to structure and scale renewable energy projects to be commercially viable and replicable," said Alexander Karsner, assistant secretary for energy efficiency and renewable energy at the Energy Department.

The conference was an unusual collaboration between the Energy and Agriculture Departments, which jointly organized the event.

The Energy Department described some of its efforts to develop cheaper, more efficient ethanol from noncorn crops, but the central investment appeared to be $250 million over five years to "crack the technological barriers to developing wide-scale and cost-effective biofuels."

The critical issue is making a breakthrough in the cost of cellulosic ethanol, made from plant waste or nonedible crops. That fuel costs at least twice as much per gallon to produce today as corn-based ethanol.

The ethanol boom is at the heart of farm state politics these days, and some attendees dismissed the carefully stage-managed celebration, which included rock music, but no opportunity to ask prominent speakers any questions.

Some major issues were discussed. R. James Woolsey, the former director of the Central Intelligence Agency, said federal subsidies for ethanol should be revised to allow the industry to be more self-supporting. He agreed with a suggestion by Mr. Khosla that subsidies should float according to the price of oil, moving higher when oil prices fall.

Keith Collins, chief economist at the Agriculture Department, warned that if not carefully managed, the industry's heated rush to produce ethanol threatened to take too much land away from crop production for food. He said ethanol would consume 19 percent of corn production this year, up from 6 percent in 2000.

That could push up corn prices and cause ripple effects on America's ability to export corn to places like China, where food demand is growing rapidly.

Only one oil company — Chevron — was invited to the conference. The company is involved in several research initiatives with the Energy Department, some of them looking at ethanol and bio-diesel.

BP, an oil company that invests in biofuels, was snubbed because of concerns that it might not be strong enough in its support of ethanol, said a person at an oil company who had been informed of the decision.

Donald L. Paul, Chevron's chief technology officer, said in an interview that Chevron saw opportunities to help "industrialize" biofuels and ensure that they are sustainable over decades. "Our view is that fuel diversification will be important," Dr. Paul said. "To meet our fuel needs over the next 25 years we will have to add unconventional fuels, including biofuels. It will take every molecule."

But some questioned the oil industry's motives for seeming to support ethanol now when it fought so hard to keep it out of gasoline before. On Wednesday, Mr. Khosla, who helped start Sun Microsystems and has been stumping lately for biofuels and other alternative energy investments, accused the oil industry of trying to slow the effort to incorporate more ethanol into gasoline.

"Despite nice words from the American Petroleum Institute, make no mistake about it — they are not interested in a rapid transition," Mr. Khosla said after a speech by Red Cavaney, president of the institute.

Mr. Cavaney warned that a push to sell more of an 85 percent ethanol/15 percent gasoline blend could prove "unnecessarily expensive and risky, especially in the earlier years."

"If we are to encourage more long-term use of ethanol, we need to avoid surprising consumers with unanticipated problems."

He also cautioned against a "patchwork of state-by-state laws mandating ethanol use," which could result in price spikes and fuel shortages similar to the situation when "boutique fuels" were introduced with different ingredients in different regions of the country at the end of the 1990's.

Mr. Khosla accused the oil industry of trying to confine ethanol's role to 10 percent of gasoline at the pump, serving as a supplement to improve performance, which Mr. Cavaney said was the safest way to go.

Energy Secretary Samuel W. Bodman said in an interview that he had personally invited Mr. Khosla to speak because "he has a viewpoint that has to be heard."

Patricia A. Woertz, the chief executive of Archer Daniels Midland, the biggest ethanol producer, said partnerships across different industries and heavy investment in research and infrastructure would be needed to transform biofuels from "visionary to viable."

DOJ_NMG_0080438

"The question is not whether there will be a sustainable market for biofuels, but how big that market can or should that market become," Ms. Woertz said.

In his speech, Mr. Bush promised to push to make the research and development tax credit a permanent part of the tax code. And he said the flood of private investment into biofuels must continue.

"There is a lot of smart money in America going into energy diversification," Mr. Bush said. "I hope you make a good return, and I think you will."

Bush: 'We're Too Dependent On Oil' (WP)

By Bill Brubaker

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

President Bush today said he worries that declining gasoline prices will make Americans less concerned about the nation's future energy needs.

"Energy is -- look, let me just put it bluntly: We're too dependent on oil," he said at the Renewable Fuels Conference in St. Louis, sponsored by the departments of energy and agriculture. "Now, see, low gasoline prices may mask that concern."

Bush said he frets that the "low price of gasoline will make . . . us complacent about our future when it comes to energy."

Gasoline prices have dropped sharply in recent weeks, in part because of a slowdown in U.S. demand and a buildup in crude oil and gasoline inventories.

Today, the average price in the United States for a gallon of regular unleaded is $2.25, compared with $2.61 a month ago, according to the AAA motor club. In the Washington region, regular unleaded has dropped from $2.80 to $2.36 over the same period.

"I want to tell you that I welcome the low gasoline prices," Bush said. "However, it's not going to dim my enthusiasm for making sure we diversify away from oil. We need to diversify away from oil for economic reasons."

Bush offered his audience a dose of Energy 101, asserting early in his speech: "We live in a global world. When the demand for oil goes up in China or in India, it causes the price of crude oil to rise. And since we import about 60 percent of the crude oil we use, it causes our price to go up as well, which means the economy becomes less competitive."

"And then, of course, there's the national security concern for oil," Bush added. "Why? Well, we get oil from some countries that don't particularly care for us."

Bush's speech was interrupted by a protester who yelled, "No blood for oil! Out of Iraq now!" But the president pressed on, saying his administration has made hydrogen and fuel-cell technology a priority.

"And we will continue to research to make sure America's less dependent on foreign sources of oil," he said.

Bush trumpeted solutions to future U.S. energy needs that included "solar roofs that will enable the American family to be able to generate their own electricity" and hybrid cars that will run the first 40 miles on electricity and won't "look like a golf cart."

"I believe wind power has got the opportunity to help," Bush said. "All we need is to put a couple of windmills right there in Washington, D.C., and we'll be less dependent on foreign sources of energy," he said to laughter from the audience.

Bush promoted continued use of tax credits to encourage alternative energy sources, increased drilling for oil and natural gas in the Gulf of Mexico and expansion of nuclear power generation.

"Nuclear power is renewable, and there are no greenhouse gases associated with nuclear power," he said. "One of the problems we've had is that nobody wants to build any plants. They're afraid of the cost of regulation and the litigious nature that surrounds the construction of nuclear power plants."

At the end of the speech, Bush told his audience he had to leave to "get my limousine filled up by hydrogen."

He was on his way to Chicago to campaign for two Illinois Republicans -- businessman David McSweeney and state senator Peter Roskam -- who are running for House seats now held by Democrats.

The event at the Chicago Hilton will mark the first time Bush has appeared publicly with House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) since former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) resigned over disclosures that he sent sexually explicit messages to teenage male pages. Hastert has faced criticism over how he dealt with the Foley matter.

Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.), a member of the House energy committee, said late this afternoon that Bush's speech addressed only part of the nation's dependence on imported oil.

"Unless we mandate stronger fuel economy standards, biofuels by themselves will not be effective in helping us curb America's dependence on imported oil from the Middle East," Markey said in a statement. "Unfortunately, the President again failed to announce any new initiatives to improve motor vehicle fuel efficiency standards today."

Bush Urges Push For Alternative Energy (SLPD)

By Jeffrey Tomich

DOJ_NMG_0080439

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, October 13, 2006

President George W. Bush on Thursday said the push to develop alternative sources of energy and wean the nation off foreign oil shouldn't be slowed by falling gasoline prices.

"Gasoline prices are down, and that's good news," he told hundreds of people attending a renewable-energy conference at America's Center. "My worry is that it will make us complacent about our future when it comes to energy."

Crude oil has dropped by $20 a barrel in the last two months, dragging gasoline lower. At some stations across the St. Louis area Thursday, signs advertised self-serve regular unleaded for less than $2 a gallon.

Still, consumers are paying twice as much for gasoline than when Bush took office, winter heating bills have risen sharply and electric rates probably are headed higher in Illinois and Missouri next year. All of it has meant that energy prices have become a key campaign issue.

Bush spent most of his 25-minute speech repeating key points of his energy initiative unveiled eight months ago in the State of the Union message, when he declared that the United States is "addicted to oil."

The president wants to replace 75 percent of the nation's oil imports from the Middle East by 2025, and said tax credits and subsidies can help kick-start the adoption of alternative technologies such as hybrid cars and ethanol from corn, switch grass or wood chips.

Longer-term, Bush envisioned families would power their homes with rooftop solar panels, and presidential limousines would run on hydrogen, he said.

Critics, however, contend that funding for alternative energy research in the 2005 energy bill and this year's Advanced Energy Initiative is inadequate. They also say the administration has done too little to emphasize energy efficiency.

Improving the fuel economy of the nation's auto fleet is the "easiest way to protect the country from vagaries of the oil markets and the environmental impacts of our oil addition," said Nathanael Greene, an energy policy analyst with the Natural Resources Defense Council. "It's sort of inexcusable that no administration since the late 1980s has taken this issue on."

Bush was momentarily interrupted by a woman who stood up midway through the speech and chanted, "Out of Iraq now" and "Our troops are not renewable." Police removed her from the hall. The protester later was identified as Laurie Ann Meier, 30, of the 700 block of Limit Avenue in University City.

President's speech on renewable energy sources

The brief interruption didn't stop the president from citing the phenomenal growth of the renewable-energy industry in the past two years -- a point made by many of the speakers throughout the two-day conference, including three Bush Cabinet members and executives from a handful of Fortune 500 companies.

Production of ethanol has tripled since the start of the decade, to about 5 billion gallons a year, and there are now 100 plants making the fuel, with 40 others expected to begin operation next year. And while ethanol makes up just 3 percent of the nation's gasoline pool, it will account for 30 percent of the increase in consumption this year, said Thomas Dorr, undersecretary for rural development at the Agriculture Department.

Though the focus of the two-day conference was energy from renewable sources, such as the sun, wind and crops, Bush emphasized the need for oil and natural-gas exploration in the Gulf of Mexico and more terminals to receive shipments of liquefied natural gas from overseas to run power plants. He said also that America needs to utilize its 250-year supply of coal in ways that don't foul the environment.

The president repeated a desire to see development of advanced nuclear plants to help meet the country's need for electricity while helping reduce emissions of greenhouse gases.

Bush Touts New Energy Initiatives (KCS)

By Steve Kraske

The Kansas City Star, October 13, 2006

ST. LOUIS | Invoking the image of America's pioneers, President Bush on Thursday told a conference of energy entrepreneurs that the nation is moving rapidly toward independence from foreign oil.

Even the recent drop in gasoline prices won't stem the tide, the president told the "Advancing Renewable Energy" conference.

"It won't dim my enthusiasm for making sure we diversify away from oil," said the former Texas oilman.

Bush enthused over a host of new technologies — including ethanol, hydrogen, solar and even new uses of soybeans — and suggested that with each one, new markets are at hand and even ready to explode.

"Ethanol is coming," he said, a refrain he used repeatedly about different technologies.

DOJ_NMG_0080440

Critics, though, complained afterward that Bush's push for renewable energy has proceeded too slowly. America, they said, is ready to move even quicker.

Kate Johnson of the U.S. Public Interest Research Group cited one specific example: mileage standards for new cars and trucks. That's one of the easiest ways to reduce reliance on foreign oil, yet "unfortunately, the administration and Congress have not taken action."

The new American car fleet averages about 21 miles a gallon, she said. That's worse than even 10 years ago. Her group would like to see manufacturers pushed to boost it to 40 miles a gallon by 2018.

Bush's visit to St. Louis was quick. He made only the one stop at America's Center to speak at the energy conference, jointly sponsored by the U.S. Energy and Agriculture departments. In attendance was Republican Sen. Jim Talent of Missouri.

"These are exciting times," Bush said. "People are beginning to take advantage" of new technologies.

The new ideas not only wean us off foreign oil, they are good for the environment, the president said.

Solar energy may soon be common in American homes, Bush said. And wind power has huge potential.

Bush talked in strong terms about hybrid vehicles and building lighter and more powerful car batteries.

He spent the most time promoting ethanol, the corn-based fuel additive. The president pointed out that more than 5 billion gallons of ethanol would be sold this year. In 2000, just 1.6 billion gallons were sold. Next year, 40 more ethanol refineries are expected to go on line.

He talked about "cellulosic" ethanol, a fuel made from agricultural waste products, such as wood chips and corn stalks.

Bush did not include a fundraising stop for Talent's re-election campaign.

That job was left to first lady Laura Bush, who was to make a separate visit to St. Louis that included a private fundraiser for Talent as well as a tree-planting ceremony and a stop at the Gateway Arch to commemorate Breast Cancer Awareness Month.

Bush Touts Ethanol (FWST)

By Dan Piller

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, October 13, 2006

ST. LOUIS — President Bush warned the country Thursday not to let the drop in gasoline prices divert attention from developing new forms of renewable energy, particularly corn-based ethanol.

"Gasoline prices are down, and that's good news," Bush told a conference on renewable energy co-sponsored by the U.S. Agriculture and Energy departments. "My worry is that the low prices will make us complacent about renewable energy."

Bush, who worked in the Texas oil industry before moving into politics, reiterated that the country must cut its heavy reliance on oil.

"Let me put it bluntly: We're too dependent on oil," he said. A similar declaration in his State of the Union message touched off a national focus on ethanol, now used as an environmentally friendly extender in almost half of the gasoline sold in the United States.

When Bush spoke in January, the country was reeling from gas prices that had peaked at about $3 a gallon after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita took about 30 percent of U.S. oil production out of service for months.

As recently as July 28, the average price of gasoline in Texas was $2.92 a gallon, according to AAA Texas. But large inventories and slack demand have caused prices to drop. This week's AAA Texas survey shows an average price of $2.10 a gallon in Tarrant County, $2.13 statewide and $2.25 nationwide.

The high gas prices have boosted interest in alternative and renewable energy sources. Corn-based ethanol has emerged as the leading renewable fuel for automobiles. For the first time, it was blended into gasoline sold to North Texas drivers this year.

In 2006, about 4.6 billion gallons of ethanol will be burned in U.S. automobiles, compared with 140 billion gallons of gasoline. A similar drive for soybean-based biodiesel is in the works for trucks and other diesel engines.

Several obstacles to wider ethanol use have been solved, such as the amount of energy needed to produce it. But America would likely have to import sugar cane from Brazil, for example, to radically increase ethanol production.

Bush said the government is promoting ethanol, popular not only among corn growers in the Midwest but also among environmentalists, by a 51-cents-per-gallon tax credit passed on to consumers and other tax credits for investments in ethanol-production plants. The 100 ethanol plants in the Corn Belt will be increased by about 40 within a year.

"A lot of smart money is moving into ethanol," Bush said, adding that the government is funding research into the next generation of ethanol, which could be made from sugar cane, wood chips or grasses.

DOJ_NMG_0080441

Bush spoke enthusiastically about E85, a gasoline blend that is 85 percent ethanol and is sold primarily in the upper Midwest where ethanol is popular politically. Most blends, including that of the North Texas market, are 10 percent ethanol and 90 percent gasoline.

"It doesn't take much investment to convert a car engine to be able to use E85," Bush said.

Support of E85 puts Bush mildly at odds with Big Oil. Red Cavaney, the president of the American Petroleum Institute, told the convention Wednesday that while Big Oil supports the 10 percent ethanol blend, it draws the line at E85 because of the potential for upsetting supplies and distribution.

But Bush also had reassuring words for his longtime friends in the oil industry. "I think we can drill for oil and gas in environmentally protected areas," he said. He spoke glowingly of a new oil find in deep waters of the Gulf of Mexico, announced two months ago, that could increase U.S. reserves.

Bush's speech was interrupted by applause several times by the crowd of more than 1,500 gathered in the St. Louis convention center. Most conference attendees are investors, renewable-energy advocates or representatives of agribusiness groups that stand to benefit from the emergence of renewable fuels.

One protestor, shouting, "Oil is not renewable, out of Iraq now!" was hustled from the hall as the audience applauded Bush's remarks. The president did not interrupt his speech during the incident.

The Natural Resources Defense Council, a leading group of scientists and environmental advocates, gave Bush lukewarm praise for his speech.

"The president is right to focus on the vast potential of biofuels, wind and solar energy," said Nathan Greene, a senior policy analyst with the council. "But to truly end our national oil addiction, we also need to turn to solutions already available today, like stronger fuel economy performance standards for all vehicles."

Bush: Don't Get Complacent On Energy (AP)

AP, October 13, 2006

President George W. Bush warned Americans on Thursday against becoming complacent about supporting alternative sources of energy just because gasoline prices are falling at the pump.

"I welcome the low gasoline prices," Mr. Bush said. "However, it's not going to dim my enthusiasm for making sure we diversify away from oil."

Lower gasoline prices helped bump up the president's slumping poll ratings in recent weeks, but with congressional and statehouse elections nearing in November, a sexually tainted e-mail scandal involving a Florida Republican congressman's messages to a teenage page has tarred other Republicans in the eyes of many middle-of-the-road voters.

Mr. Bush spoke at a conference en route to a fundraiser in Chicago with House Speaker Dennis Hastert to help two fellow Illinois Republicans in tough races.

The president has been backing Hastert as he fends off calls for him to resign over his handling of the congressional page scandal. Democrats claim Hastert and his staff knew of the e-mail scandal for months and did nothing about it until it was reported by ABC News.

The president on Wednesday called Hastert "very credible" and last week, a "father, teacher and coach who cares about the children of this country."

The political event in Chicago to benefit David McSweeney and Peter Roskam, two candidates for Congress, marks the first time the president has publicly appeared with Hastert since former Florida Rep. Mark Foley resigned in disgrace over sexually explicit messages he sent to teenage male pages.

Hastert insists he was not aware that the Florida congressman was sending the messages until Foley resigned two weeks ago. With less than a month to the Nov. 7 election, the White House is doing its best to prop up the speaker. White House press secretary Tony Snow plans to appear at a fundraiser with Hastert on Saturday.

Democrats need to gain 15 seats to take control of the House of Representatives and six to take power in the Senate. All 435 House seats are up for election, as are 33 of the 100 Senate seats.

In St. Louis, Mr. Bush spoke to a conference of hundreds of businessmen and women, scientists and government officials, including Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman and Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns, who are discussing ways to fast-track the commercialization of renewable energies.

Echoing his State of the Union message that America must end its addiction to foreign oil, Mr. Bush said that by providing new sources of energy to the market, the United States can decrease overall dependence on resources abroad and power the U.S. economy with clean energy produced in the United States.

Energy is a topic that transcends the top two issues in this year's election: the economy and national security.

"We get oil from some countries that don't particularly care for us," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0080442

During Mr. Bush's speech, a woman in the crowd stood up and started chanting, "Out of Iraq now" and "Our troops are not renewable." Bush did not recognize her, but continued speaking as the crowd applauded him.

Event officials pulled her out of the audience by her jacket sleeve, and she shouted louder and louder with her fist in the air as she was escorted out of the room. "What are you doing? You're killing us!" she shouted at the president, as he continued with his speech.

The high costs of oil and gas have given new momentum to the push to develop alternative fuels and alternative energy sources. The efforts are especially visible in America's heartland, where a boom in ethanol is expanding.

Six years ago, there were 54 ethanol plants in operation, Johanns says. Today, those numbers have doubled to more than 100 plants, and an additional 44 plants are under construction.

Ethanol, however, is far from a cure-all for the nation's energy problems, according to various studies. It is not as environmentally friendly as some supporters claim and would supply only 12 percent of U.S. motoring fuel — even if every acre of corn were used.

Rep. Edward J. Markey, a senior Democratic member of both the House Energy and Commerce and Resource committees, said that that while biofuels have great promise, they are only part of the solution to the problem of America's dependence on imported oil.

"Unless we mandate stronger fuel economy standards, biofuels by themselves will not be effective in helping us curb America's dependence on imported oil from the Middle East," Markey said. "Unfortunately, the president again failed to announce any new initiatives to improve motor vehicle fuel efficiency standards today."

President Renews Call For Energy Alternatives (HC)

By Julie Mason

Houston Chronicle, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON - President Bush warned on Thursday that while gasoline prices are coming down, America shouldn't get complacent about energy.

Bush's Advanced Energy Initiative, first detailed in his State of the Union address earlier this year, set a goal of replacing 75 percent of domestic oil imports from the Mideast by 2025.

The public push for new energy policies has waned as fuel prices have fallen. But even with gasoline prices around $2 a gallon, Bush said it's not the time to ease up on the search for alternatives.

"My worry is ... that a low price of gasoline will make us complacent about our future when it comes to energy, because I fully understand that energy is going to help determine whether or not this nation remains the economic leader in the world," he said in St. Louis at a government-sponsored conference on renewable energy.

Alternatives Bush supports include ethanol, a corn-based fuel additive; wind and solar generation; and hybrid vehicles.

"We envision a day in which light and powerful batteries will become available in the marketplace so that you can drive the first 40 miles on electricity, on batteries, and your car won't have to look like a golf cart," Bush said.

"That's not going to help rural Missouri or rural Texas, but it's certainly going to help those who live in the cities."

Jim Connaughton, chairman of the White House Council on Environmental Quality, told reporters on Air Force One that he drove a plug-in hybrid last week that got 156 miles to the gallon.

"All of these technologies will enable a switch to renewable fuels, initially ethanol, increasingly biodiesel, and then ultimately, consistent with the president's State of the Union initiative, cellulosic ethanol, that can be made from a wide variety of plant materials and plant waste materials," he said.

Bush also called for making tax credits for energy research permanent.

"There's a research and development tax credit that's on the books," Bush said. "The problem is, it expires every year, on a year-by-year basis, which means you've got to come back to Congress on a year-to-year basis, which also means there's unpredictability in the tax code, and that's not wise."

Democrats responded to Bush's speech by noting the former oilman's ties to the industry and calling his proposals a "token" effort.

"Despite the rhetoric, President Bush's energy policy is centered on doing what's good for his cronies in big oil rather than addressing the needs of hard-working Americans," Democratic National Committee Press Secretary Stacie Paxton said. "Why else would he have put his friends in big oil in charge of writing our nation's energy policy, a policy that has made us more dependent on foreign oil?"

The Energy Mandate (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

DOJ_NMG_0080443

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

James Carville, the legendary Clinton campaign adviser who coined the slogan, "It's the economy, stupid," knows a gut issue when he sees one. So when Mr. Carville contacted me the other day to tell me about the newest gut issue his polling was turning up for candidates in the 2006 elections, I was all ears.

"Energy independence," he said. "It's now the No. 1 national security issue. ... It's become kind of a joke with us, because no matter how we ask the question, that's what comes up."

So, for instance, the Democracy Corps, a Democratic strategy group spearheaded by Mr. Carville and the former Clinton pollster Stan Greenberg, asked the following question in an Aug. 27 survey of likely voters: "Which of the following would you say should be the two most important national security priorities for the administration and Congress over the next few years?"

Coming in No. 1, with 42 percent, was "reducing dependence on foreign oil." Coming in a distant second at 26 percent was "combating terrorism." Coming in third at 25 percent was "the war in Iraq," and tied at 21 percent were "securing our ports, nuclear plants and chemical factories" and "addressing dangerous countries like Iran and North Korea." "Strengthening America's military" drew 12 percent. Mr. Carville also noted that because their polls are of "likely voters," they have a slight Republican bias — i.e., they aren't just polling a bunch of liberal greens.

"When we lay out different plans for how to deal with Iraq, any plan that also includes energy independence tops any other plan that doesn't," said Mr. Greenberg, who added that people are not expressing this view because they are worried about price, but because they are starting to understand that our oil dependence is fueling a host of really bad national security problems. "There is frustration that leaders have not taken it up," he added. "There is a sense that the public is ahead of the leaders, and there is actually a sense of relief when anyone talks about [energy independence] with any seriousness."

Mr. Greenberg said he started noticing this during this year's re-election campaign by Ed Rendell, the governor of Pennsylvania. When his Republican challenger, Lynn Swann, first jumped into the race, public polls showed the two candidates in a dead heat. Governor Rendell eventually pulled far ahead in the polls, though, and among the key issues that helped to separate him, said Mr. Greenberg, was the governor's stressing of alternative energy, and his "PennSecurity Fuels Initiative" to lessen dependence on foreign oil and grow the state's clean energy market.

What this means for Democratic Party candidates, argues Mr. Carville, is that it's no longer enough to have "energy security" as part of a 12-step plan for American renewal. No, it needs to become a defining issue of what Democrats are all about.

It should "not be part of an expanding litany, but rather a contracting narrative," explained Mr. Carville. "It can't just be that we are for a woman's right to choose, and education and energy independence. This is the thing we need to get done above and beyond everything else." People should associate "energy security" with Democrats the way they associate "tax cuts" with Republicans, he argued. "This is not something to add to the stew — this is the stock."

The best way for a party that is often viewed as weak on national security to overcome that deficit is to be for energy independence, he noted. Indeed, nothing would be more potent for Democrats now than to capture energy security and all the issues that surround it — from improving our trade deficit by not importing more oil to improving the climate to improving U.S. competitiveness by making us leaders in alternative fuels.

So does this mean the public would accept a gasoline or B.T.U. tax? No, said Mr. Greenberg. The public wants government to impose much higher auto mileage standards on Detroit and much more stringent energy codes on buildings and appliances. People want a tough regulatory response, à la California.

Remember, Mr. Carville and Mr. Greenberg are professional campaign advisers. They get paid to get people elected — not to offer feel-good nostrums. So when they tell you that their polling and focus groups around the country show that "reducing dependence on foreign oil" is voters' top national security priority, you know that this issue has finally arrived. The party that captures it most credibly will be rewarded.

Hello? Anybody listening?

Mr. Reid's Nondisclosure (WP)

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

THE BEST CASE for Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) is that he was sloppy about financial disclosure rules in accounting for a real estate deal on which he made a $700,000 profit. The more unattractive case is that the senator's inaccurate description of the investment was an effort to disguise his partnership with a Las Vegas lawyer who's never been charged with wrongdoing but whose name has surfaced in federal investigations involving organized crime, casinos and political bribery since the 1980s. As of now, the evidence points toward sloppiness; Mr. Reid's friendship with Jay Brown isn't exactly a secret in the state. But either way, an Associated Press report about Mr. Reid's dealings doesn't cast the senator in an attractive light. Neither does his response to the AP story, which indicates a casual disregard for the importance of accurate reporting of lawmakers' financial affairs.

Mr. Reid bought undeveloped property on the outskirts of fast-growing Las Vegas for about $400,000 in 1998 -- one parcel outright and a second jointly with Mr. Brown. In 2001, Mr. Reid sold the land for the same price to a corporation he co-owned with Mr. Brown, who in the meantime was getting the land rezoned from residential to commercial use. But the senator didn't report the sale on his annual financial disclosure form. When the new company sold the land to developers in 2004, yielding $1.1 million for Mr. Reid, the senator did not accurately list the transaction or go back and fix the previous forms to reflect the new arrangement.

"Everything I did was transparent," Mr. Reid said at a news conference Wednesday, after the story broke. "Everything is fully disclosed to the ethics committee and everyone else. As I said, if there is some technical change that the ethics committee wants, I'll be happy to do that."

Mr. Reid's professions of transparency and full disclosure are transparently wrong. His investment was not reported in a manner that made clear his partnership with Mr. Brown. It's true -- under the inadequate financial disclosure rules -- that even if Mr. Reid had listed the newly formed corporation, Patrick Lane LLC, that wouldn't have by itself demonstrated Mr. Brown's involvement. Nonetheless, that Mr. Reid no longer owned the land, but instead had sold it for an interest in the Patrick Lane corporation, was not some mere "technical change," as the senator would like to brush it off. It's an essential element of financial disclosure rules, the purpose of which is to know how and with whom public officials are financially entwined.

Bush Confounded By The 'Unacceptable' (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

President Wields Word More Freely as His Frustration Rises and His Influence Ebbs

President Bush finds the world around him increasingly "unacceptable."

In speeches, statements and news conferences this year, the president has repeatedly declared a range of problems "unacceptable," including rising health costs, immigrants who live outside the law, North Korea's claimed nuclear test, genocide in Sudan and Iran's nuclear ambitions.

Bush's decision to lay down blunt new markers about the things he deems intolerable comes at an odd time, a phase of his presidency in which all manner of circumstances are not bending to his will: national security setbacks in North Korea and Iraq, a Congress that has shrugged its shoulders at his top domestic initiatives, a favorability rating mired below 40 percent.

But a survey of transcripts from Bush's public remarks over the past seven years shows the president's worsening political predicament has actually stoked, rather than diminished, his desire to proclaim what he cannot abide. Some presidential scholars and psychologists describe the trend as a signpost of Bush's rising frustration with his declining influence.

In the first nine months of this year, Bush declared more than twice as many events or outcomes "unacceptable" or "not acceptable" as he did in all of 2005, and nearly four times as many as he did in 2004. He is, in fact, at a presidential career high in denouncing events he considers intolerable. They number 37 so far this year, as opposed to five in 2003, 18 in 2002 and 14 in 2001.

Through a spokesman and then in a televised statement, he declared North Korea's claimed nuclear test "unacceptable" before and after it occurred Oct. 9. But he could also be heard on Jan. 9 lecturing students at an elementary school in Glen Burnie, Md., that their recent scores on math and reading proficiency tests were "unacceptable."

Having a president call something "unacceptable" is not the same as having him order U.S. troops into action. But foreign policy experts say the word is one of the strongest any leader can deploy, since it both broadcasts a national position and conveys an implicit threat to take action if his warnings are disregarded.

Bush's use of the term "reflects in some ways his frustration with a world that doesn't seem as amenable to his policies as he would like them to be," said Stanley A. Renshon, a political scientist at the City University of New York. Bush "has strong views; he believes in doing what is right. All of those things give an emotional force to his response" to events he often sees and describes without nuance.

Renshon, who wrote a mostly-favorable book in 2004 about Bush's psychology, said the president's declarations are in keeping with his apparent self-image as a Jeremiah, "railing against the tides" and saying what "people ought to be doing something about."

As such, charting the ebbs and flows of Bush's proclamations of "unacceptability" provides clues to trends in presidential irritations. It also demonstrates that Bush's most intense grievances -- like his attention -- have moved offshore, as evidenced this year by his eight declarations about "unacceptable" events in Iraq, and his 11 declarations about unacceptable behavior by Iran.

As a presidential candidate and in his early presidency, Bush was more apt to denounce domestic events. His assertions that school performance and achievement gaps between white and black students were unacceptable account for almost a third of his usages of that term since 2000.

Bush's targets expanded from 2003 to 2005 to include nine condemnations of "unacceptable" actions by Iraq and Iran, as well as the Social Security system and the administration's own response to the Katrina hurricane. This year, he has hurled the term "unacceptable" at actions by Iraqi insurgents and police, at supporters of a withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq, and at a U.S. law making the degrading treatment of detainees a war crime.

North Korea's planned firing of a missile was unacceptable, Bush said June 29; after Pyongyang fired several missiles July 4, Bush again labeled the action unacceptable on July 7 and July 10. He also deemed unacceptable the country's starving of its people, its use of concentration camps and its claimed nuclear test.

Using such a categorical term is not that surprising after a policy setback, according to Steven Kull, a political psychologist who directs the University of Maryland's Program on International Policy Attitudes. Some people deal with failures, Kull said, "by intensifying an authoritarian posture and insisting that their preferences are equivalent to a moral imperative."

Asked at a news conference on Wednesday whether Washington risks looking feckless in making such categorical statements without taking decisive action, Bush said: "It's very important for the American people and North Korea to understand that that statement still stands. . . . I know this sounds [like] just saying it over and over again, but it's -- rhetoric and actions are all aimed at convincing others" to join Washington's effort to impede that country's weapons ambitions.

Bush's predecessor, Bill Clinton -- often pilloried by Republicans as irresolute -- also labeled many events "unacceptable" or "not acceptable," particularly after the political tables turned against him. When Democrats controlled Congress in 1994, for example, he used those terms four times, according to transcripts of his public comments. In 1995, after his party lost control of both houses, Clinton used the terms 20 times; his annual usages thereafter fluctuated between eight and 22, but they totaled only 86 percent of Bush's usage in a comparable six-year period.

Clinton's peeves were different from Bush's, and a quarter of his uses of the "unacceptable" label after 2004 were aimed at providing leverage in his budget battles with the Republican-led Congress. Clinton also used the label in denouncing poverty, crime, discrimination against women, inadequate health care, school violence, racial disparities and the actions of medical insurance companies. Abroad, he labeled as unacceptable the behavior of Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein unacceptable on four occasions.

MoisÃ©s NaÃ-m, the editor in chief of Foreign Policy magazine, said there is a relationship between "how strident and extreme" the language of many leaders is and how limited their options are. For Bush, NaÃ-m said, "this comes at a time when the world is convinced he is weaker than ever."

Many foreigners think the United States is losing Iraq and are no longer in awe of U.S. military might, NaÃ-m said, and at home, Bush is so weak that Republican candidates are wary of appearing with him. "The world has noticed," NaÃ-m said. "What is happening is that a lot that was deemed unacceptable [by Bush] now has become normal and tolerable."

Bush's proclamations are not the only rhetorical evidence of his mounting frustrations. One of his favorite verbal tics has long been to instruct audiences bluntly to "listen" to what he is about to say, as in "Listen, America is respected" (Aug. 30) or "Listen, this economy is good" (May 24). This year, he made that request more often than he did in a comparable portion of 2005, a sign that he hasn't given up hope it might work.

Book: Bush Aides Called Evangelicals 'Nuts' (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A new book by a former White House official says President Bush's top political advisers privately ridiculed evangelical supporters as "nuts" and "goofy" while embracing them in public and using their votes to help win elections.

The former official also writes that the White House office of faith-based initiatives, which Bush promoted as a nonpolitical effort to support religious social service organizations, was told to host pre-election events designed to mobilize religious voters who would most likely favor Republican candidates.

The assertions by David Kuo, the former No. 2 official in the faith-based initiatives program, have rattled Republican strategists already struggling to convince evangelical voters to turn out this fall for the GOP.

Some conservatives lamented Thursday that the book, "Tempting Faith: An Inside Story of Political Seduction," also comes in the midst of the scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley's interest in male congressional pages, another threat to conservative turnout in competitive House and Senate races.

DOJ_NMG_0080446

The book is scheduled to hit stores Monday, but the White House responded to its assertions Thursday as excerpts began leaking out.

In the book, Kuo, who quit the White House in 2003, accuses Karl Rove's political staff of cynically hijacking the faith-based initiatives idea for electoral gain. It assails Bush for failing to live up to his promises of boosting the role of religious organizations in delivering social services.

White House strategists "knew 'the nuts' were politically invaluable, but that was the extent of their usefulness," Kuo writes, according to the cable channel MSNBC, which obtained an advance copy.

"Sadly, the political affairs folks complained most often and most loudly about how boorish many politically involved Christians were. ... National Christian leaders received hugs and smiles in person and then were dismissed behind their backs and described as 'ridiculous' and 'out of control.' "

It is unclear whether Kuo identifies any specific official as using the dismissive language.

The book says that before the 2002 elections, then-White House political director Ken Mehlman issued "marching orders" to use the faith-based initiative in 20 House and Senate races, according to MSNBC. To avoid appearing overtly political, Mehlman said his staff would arrange for congressional offices to request visits from the faith-based program officials.

Throughout the 2002 and 2004 campaigns, faith-based officials would meet with lawmakers in some places in an effort to generate publicity for them, while also hosting conferences in battleground states attracting hundreds of pastors and community activists eager to learn how to apply for federal grants.

A spokeswoman for Mehlman, who is now chairman of the Republican National Committee, said he did not recall the directives mentioned by Kuo. As political director, she said, "it was Mehlman's job to both engage outside groups and inform decision makers in the White House about support for the president's agenda."

Kuo is scheduled to appear Sunday on CBS' 60 Minutes program as part of a rollout arranged by his publisher, Simon & Schuster, which shares a corporate parent with CBS. Despite a publisher-enforced embargo, a copy of the book was purchased early at a Manhattan bookstore by a producer for MSNBC's "Countdown," a spokesman for the cable channel said. Program host Keith Olbermann began reading excerpts on his Wednesday show.

Kuo's descriptions could do political damage to a Republican Party that has staked its formula for success on motivating the conservative base.

"Here we go again," said Paul M. Weyrich, a leading religious conservative with close ties to the White House, referring to the avalanche of negative factors that he predicted would keep "embarrassed Republicans" from voting, just as the Watergate scandal did in the 1970s. "If Republicans win, it will prove God is a Republican, since it will take a miracle."

Weyrich said Kuo, while still a White House official, told him of frustrations that the faith-based program had become entangled in politics. The initiative had been a signature proposal by Bush in the 2000 campaign but lost momentum amid partisan battles on Capitol Hill and the intense focus on security following the Sept. 11 attacks.

Weyrich said that Bush and many of his aides were genuinely interested in the program. But, he added, "I don't have any illusions about Rove. I think that he advocates conservatism because he believes it's the way to win."

The White House denied Kuo's account with help Thursday from two former officials popular among the evangelical base -- former speechwriter Michael Gerson and former faith-based initiative director Jim Towey.

Gerson called Kuo's account "laughable," while Towey cited a December, 2002, e-mail from Kuo expressing positive feelings about the program's progress in promoting "compassionate conservatism."

"He doesn't seem to have been working at the same White House where I worked," Towey said. "I had marching orders from the president to keep the faith-based initiative non-political, and I did."

Still, neither Gerson nor Towey denied Kuo's assertion that politics did factor into the initiative.

"Ken Mehlman was doing his job, which was to worry about races," said Towey, who left the White House this year to become president of St. Vincent College, a Catholic school in Pennsylvania.

NSC Spokesman Leaving (WP)

Frederick Jones, the chief spokesman for the White House's National Security Council, is leaving the high-pressure post this month. Jones, a career Foreign Service officer who was named spokesman after Bush's reelection, has spent 3 1/2 years at the NSC.

Jones said that he will return to the State Department and that he plans to spend time with his wife, who is expecting a baby in January. But Jones said he also will explore other options, in case it is "time to enjoy the fruits of this robust economy."

Medicare Drug Plan Stability Disputed (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, October 13, 2006

Medicare leaders misled seniors last month when they said premiums for Medicare drug plans would remain about the same in 2007, Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., said Thursday.

Waxman says his staff's analysis shows an average 13.2% increase for next year. But Medicare officials Thursday stuck to their estimate that rates will remain about the same — so long as beneficiaries are willing, in some cases, to drop traditional Medicare and sign up for an alternative, such as an HMO.

The back-and-forth comes about a month before seniors and the disabled begin enrolling in plans for next year and provides new insight into how Medicare officials calculate drug plan premium estimates.

"The only thing everyone can agree on is seniors will need to go out and carefully reassess their options for 2007, because there are fundamental changes in the marketplace," says Dan Mendelson, president of Avalere Health, a consulting firm in Washington.

In a letter to Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt, Waxman says monthly costs for stand-alone drug plans will rise on average from $25.69 to $29.09 a month.

Rates for the lowest-cost plan in each state will rise an average of 44%, to $13.58 from $9.46. Increases will affect 77% of seniors who remain in the same plan as they chose this year, Waxman said.

By contrast, the Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services issued a press release Sept. 29 saying that the "monthly premium beneficiaries will pay in 2007 will average $24 if they stay in their current plan, about the same as in 2006."

Who's right?

It all depends on what you include in the premium calculations.

"The congressman's analysis is incomplete and misleading … measuring just one of the plan options beneficiaries can use to get their prescription drugs," says Medicare chief Mark McClellan in a written statement.

Waxman's staff looked at premiums for stand-alone drug policies only, which were offered for the first time this year.

Those plans cover about 16 million Medicare members, who get other medical care through the traditional program.

The government's estimates include premiums for Medicare Advantage plans, which offer a full range of health services, including drugs, as an alternative to traditional Medicare. Such plans cover about 7 million members. They include types of managed-care plans, which limit choices of doctors and hospitals, as well as plans that allow a wider range of choice.

Karen Ignagni, president of America's Health Insurance Plans, says seniors should look at the full range of choices.

"There's no doubt that Medicare is providing valuable benefits for seniors, and costs are far less than what was expected at the time legislation passed" creating the new drug benefit, Ignagni says.

Democrat Disputes Medicare Prescription Drug Plan Calculations (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

Rep. Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) says Medicare officials have a problem with their math.

The Bush administration said last month that beneficiaries who stay in their Medicare prescription drug plan will pay an average of $24 a month in premiums next year, the same as this year.

But according to Waxman, average prescription drug premiums in what is known as Medicare Part D will rise to $29 a month in 2007. He cited an analysis by the Democratic staff of the House Government Reform Committee, on which he is the ranking minority member.

"The department's numbers appear to be wrong, and they disguise significant increases in premiums for Medicare drug plans," Waxman wrote in a letter to Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt yesterday. "The release of erroneous information about the cost of premiums -- whether deliberate or not -- is a disservice to millions of seniors and a discredit to the department."

Mark B. McClellan, the head of the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, stood by the administration's estimate. He called Waxman's analysis "misleading" and said it might discourage the 23 million people enrolled in the Medicare drug benefit from evaluating all options.

The discrepancy arises from the different ways that the two sides calculated average premiums. The administration average is based on both stand-alone Medicare plans that cover drugs only and heavily subsidized, HMO-style "Medicare Advantage" plans that offer a broad range of health care and do not charge a separate premium for drug coverage. Waxman's staff focused on the stand-alone plans, since 90 percent of seniors enrolled in the drug benefit choose such plans.

"The congressman's analysis is inaccurate and misleading because it is selective, measuring just one of the plan options beneficiaries can use to get their prescription drugs," McClellan said in a statement.

Waxman said Medicare officials are being "unrealistic" by putting the Medicare Advantage plans on the same footing as the more popular drug-only plans.

"The only way the Administration's numbers can possibly add up is by including artificial estimates of the costs of drug coverage in Medicare managed care plans," he said in a statement. "Most seniors won't abandon traditional Medicare just to keep the costs of their drug coverage from going up, nor should they have to."

He said the assertion that premiums will remain nearly flat in 2007 was reminiscent of the administration's assurances to Congress in 2003 that the drug benefit would cost $400 billion over 10 years -- even though federal actuaries at the time were estimating the true cost as more than $500 billion.

McClellan said the estimated cost of the benefit has dropped lately as the insurance companies that offer the federally subsidized drug coverage have charged lower-than-expected premiums while competing to lure seniors to their plans.

McClellan plans today to announce improvements to the CMS Drug Plan Finder, a tool available on the Medicare Web site to help beneficiaries choose a drug plan. Open enrollment for 2007 will begin Nov. 15.

Medicare Drug Premiums Will Rise For Many (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — Two weeks after the Bush administration announced that Medicare prescription premiums would stay about the same next year, a new analysis by congressional Democrats indicates that for a majority of middle-class seniors, rates will jump 13% — well above the overall inflation rate.

In a sternly worded letter to Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt, Rep. Henry A. Waxman, D-Los Angeles, accused the administration of "deceptive advertising."

Medicare Administrator Mark B. McClellan fired back with a statement calling the analysis by Waxman's Government Reform Committee staff "inaccurate and misleading."

But several independent experts said it is true that seniors using the most popular type of Medicare prescription coverage — a stand-alone drug plan — will face significant premium increases next year unless they switch to more economical plans that often come with more restrictions. The prescription drug benefit is overseen by the government but delivered by private insurance companies that offer a variety of plans with differing features and premiums.

"If you look at the plans where most seniors are now enrolled, many are increasing premiums," said Tricia Neuman of the Kaiser Family Foundation, who oversees Medicare policy for the nonpartisan research group.

"What was the best deal last year may not be the best deal next year," said James Firman, president of the National Council on Aging.

The argument over how much seniors will pay for prescription drug insurance next year comes in the home stretch of a campaign in which Republicans and Democrats are working hard to attract the votes of older Americans. The announcement that premiums would remain essentially unchanged may have been welcome news to many seniors, but Waxman argued that Medicare officials based that claim on "three-card monte," a reference to a card game favored by con artists.

The claim that premiums would stay flat was based on the average of expected costs for all Medicare participants, including about 6 million who get coverage through managed-care plans that are heavily subsidized by the government and generally do not charge a separate monthly premium for their prescription benefits.

Waxman, however, excluded the managed-care beneficiaries and focused on the 16 million seniors with traditional, fee-for-service Medicare, who have enrolled in stand-alone drug plans. These plans offer prescriptions only, unlike the managed-care plans that also provide hospital and doctors' care. Premiums for the stand-alone plans are projected to rise significantly.

For example, monthly premiums for Humana's popular low-price plan will rise from an average of about $10 to around $15, the company confirmed — an increase of 50%.

"The dollar amounts may not be so great, but premiums are nonetheless on the rise," Neuman said.

Even with the increases, Humana still expects to have the lowest-cost plan in 38 states. "We still feel like we're the low-cost plan overall," spokesman Dick Brown said.

DOJ_NMG_0080449

Another Humana offering, the PDP Complete plan, this year covered brand-name drugs in the so-called doughnut hole, a coverage gap Congress and the administration built into the benefit to save money. Next year, that plan will not cover brand-name drugs in the doughnut hole. And monthly premiums will rise from an average of about $58 to about $80.

The Democratic analysis concluded that the average premium for all Medicare stand-alone plans would rise from $25.69 per month in 2006 to $29.09 in 2007.

A Medicare news release issued Sept. 29 said: "The monthly premium beneficiaries will pay in 2007 will average $24 if they stay in their current plan — about the same as in 2006."

The changing premiums portend a new reality for Medicare beneficiaries, said healthcare market analyst Dan Mendelson. Until now the program offered a standard government-issue benefit for all. With the expanding role for private insurers, that's not the case anymore.

"Seniors are going to have to constantly reassess their coverage relative to their own health status and relative to what choices are being offered in the marketplace," said Mendelson, president of Avalere Health, a consulting firm. "These are commercial plans that change from year to year based on their experience, and the only way for seniors to navigate the marketplace effectively is to constantly reassess their options."

For 2006, seniors had six months to pick a drug plan. But for 2007, the open enrollment period will be about six weeks, from Nov. 15 through Dec. 31. Medicare's computerized Plan Finder, which allows seniors to compare costs and coverage for plans, will have information on the 2007 offerings starting today. It is on the Internet at http://www.medicare.gov .

"Choosing a plan may not be fun, but plans are changing," Neuman said. "I think seniors will be well advised to go back to the drawing board and revisit the decision they made for 2006."

Firman, of the group on aging, said Medicare should consider releasing the premiums for stand-alone plans separately. "There is a value in more detail being provided to people," he said.

Council Debates Ways To Divvy Up '07 Pay Raise (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

The government's advisory group on federal pay yesterday backed an across-the-board 2007 salary increase of 1.7 percent for federal employees, but left open how additional funds for the raise should be split among big cities and other areas.

The annual pay raise for the government's white-collar employees has two components: a national increase for all workers, and a raise that varies by locality. In most years, the Federal Salary Council, an advisory group that includes White House appointees and union leaders, has recommended a formula for setting the locality portion of the raise.

The council's staff had prepared a proposal that would have sent more of the money available for locality pay to some big cities where federal salaries lag the most behind the private sector.

But the council pulled back from approving the proposal after a union president raised questions about it and said such a change would be premature until more data are available to compare salaries in the federal and private sectors.

Colleen M. Kelley , president of the National Treasury Employees Union, pointed out that most federal employees outside large metropolitan areas would have received a raise of less than 2 percent under the staff recommendation.

The council signed off on a compromise offered by Kelley that urged the White House to designate 1.7 percent of the 2007 pay increase as an across-the-board raise, in keeping with a 1990 pay law. The remainder of the increase, Kelley proposed, "would be split between locality areas according to administration recommendations, with each locality pay area getting some portion of the funds available for locality pay increases."

The council's work was more difficult this year because Congress has not settled on how much of a raise to provide the government's 1.8 million employees.

Spending bills before Congress would provide the civil service with a 2.7 percent raise next year. But Congress has voted for a 2.2 percent raise for the military, raising the prospect that House-Senate negotiators will lower the federal employee raise to that amount.

After Congress and the White House agree to an overall average raise, a portion is parceled out among 31 metropolitan areas and a catch-all category called the "Rest of the United States."

In 1990 Congress approved variations in federal pay, based on changes in wages for local labor markets, in hopes of closing a "pay gap" between federal and nonfederal employees. The staff paper prepared for the salary council said "it is not feasible" in 2007 to close the same proportion of the pay gap in each locality area as the law envisions. The staff proposed an alternative approach in hopes of helping employees in high-cost big cities where pay gaps are the largest.

Under the staff's recommendation, if Congress approved a 2.2 percent raise, employees in the "Rest of the United States" would get a 1.81 percent pay increase and those in the Washington area 2.64 percent. In contrast, under the traditional allocation method for a 2.2 percent increase, RUS employees would get raises of 2.03 percent and Washington area employees would receive 2.4 percent.

Federal officials have been working to improve the methodology for comparing federal jobs with those in the private sector and in state and local governments. The staff paper indicated that the revised methodology found a bigger pay gap than previously calculated. The average pay gap this year was 18.4 percent, according to the paper, up from 13.4 percent last year.

The paper suggested that the gap may have grown because of an increase in the number of supervisory jobs covered by new salary surveys, as well as other statistical adjustments. They also noted that more changes in the methodology will take place over the next three to four years, making it difficult to form judgments on how federal salaries stack up against the private sector.Talk Shows

Air Force Seeks $13 Billion To Start Replacing Tankers (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 12 — Air Force officials said Thursday that they were seeking $13 billion over the next five years to replace their aging fleet of aerial refueling aircraft, a process that will take decades and could grow into one of the service's largest procurement programs.

In a meeting with reporters, Air Force Secretary Michael W. Wynne and Gen. T. Michael Moseley, the Air Force chief of staff, said that they hoped to award a contract by next summer and that the current timetable calls for the first planes to be delivered by 2011.

General Moseley said that the Air Force intended to buy 10 to 15 planes a year, ending up with a total fleet of about 450 aircraft. Some analysts have said the cost of replacing the tankers could total more than $100 billion over the next three decades.

"It's important to get started" on replacing the fleet of 579 tankers, most of them over 40 years old and still playing a vital role in refueling fighters, bombers and other aircraft flying every day over Iraq, Afghanistan and elsewhere, General Moseley said.

Loren B. Thompson, an analyst with the Lexington Institute, a military policy research group in Virginia, said the Air Force worried that an accident involving any of the current tankers could force the entire fleet to be grounded.

"The Air Force is extremely concerned that because nobody has ever operated a fleet of jets this long, some design deficiency, like metal fatigue, will ground the fleet making it impossible for them to get places they need to go," Mr. Thompson said.

In January, the Pentagon canceled a $23 billion deal to lease 767 tankers from Boeing after the disclosure that a former Air Force procurement officer, Darleen Druyun, was found to have favored Boeing in contracts before being hired by the company.

The competition is likely to be between Boeing and a joint venture of the Northrop Grumman Corporation and the parent company of Airbus, the European Aeronautic Defense and Space Company.

"Darleen Druyun's impact has something to do with the desire to get an open acquisition process," General Moseley said. "That is absolutely fair and required."

Initially, the Air Force intends to purchase tankers derived from successful commercial airliner designs as replacements for the current KC-135, a midsize tanker built in the late 1950's and early 1960's. About 100 of the 520 KC-135's are set to be retired by 2010. The Air Force also flies larger KC-10's bought in the 1980's.

By opening the contract for competition, the Air Force is hoping to put the scandal behind it, the officials said. But it will also have to persuade Congress, which over the last two years has prohibited the Air Force from retiring any KC-135 tankers, to support replacing the tanker fleet at a time of increasing pressure on the military budget.

The Pentagon will include the request for the $13 billion to begin buying the tankers in its budget proposal for the fiscal year 2008, which will be formally presented next February.

This year, the Bush administration sought $36 million in advance financing for the tanker production, along with $204 million in research and development, but Congress provided no production funds and cut the research money to $70 million.

DOJ_NMG_0080451

Mr. Wynne said Thursday that the Air Force had elevated the tanker replacement program to its top procurement priority. The tanker program "is a little bit, if you will, less sexy than funding for fighters and bombers," he said, but it is the "underpinning of America's strategic capabilities."

'Every Reason To Be Proud' (WSJ)

By Lawrence B. Lindsey

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

The government has just closed the books on the 2006 fiscal year and released the figures for revenue collected. It has also been five years since the first of the Bush tax cuts began to help the economy and consumers' wallets, so it is a natural time to look back and evaluate their economic and budgetary effectiveness.

We now know that economic activity first began declining in the third quarter of 2000, although the data at the time didn't show it; and 2001 was a rough year, with growth moving back and forth around the zero mark. In August most American families received the first part of their tax cut -- a check, typically for $600. But this was overshadowed by 9/11. In the weeks following the attacks the economy began to gradually shut down. The stock exchanges and New York bond markets were closed, while air travel and transport stopped in an economy where over half a million business travelers flew every day and 25% of trade by value arrived and left by air. Uncertainty paralyzed the business community.

President Bush gave numerous speeches to rally the nation to return to normal; administration officials fanned out across the country to urge Americans to spend. The private sector did its part: Auto companies began zero percent financing and some companies made promotions based directly on the tax cuts. Far from being the disaster most forecasters (including me) had feared, the fourth quarter showed the biggest consumer-led surge since 1992. As business inventories were drawn down, production could expand again.

Mr. Bush followed up with an investment-oriented tax cut proposal in his 2002 State of the Union message. But by mid-year, with growth returning but only at a modest clip, we began working on a proposal to accelerate the multiyear tax cuts of 2001 to take full effect in 2003. We also began developing proposals to improve investor psychology through a long-overdue reduction in the double taxation of dividends. The final bill was enacted in May 2003.

The tax-cut program was not particularly novel or out-of-the-mainstream: It just combined some very sensible supply-side oriented reforms to make the tax code less burdensome with some much-needed demand-side relief. The focus of the early tax cuts was on families with children, people with high propensities to spend. A typical middle-class couple with two children got a minimum of $1,600 in relief -- equivalent to a 4% increase in their real take-home pay, or two years' worth of real pay raises in the 1990s.

Nor did Mr. Bush propose the tax cut by accident. He unveiled it in December 1999 in Des Moines, Iowa, at the height of the stock market bubble, when everyone was feeling a little giddy and some economists were arguing that we had repealed the business cycle. So it took great courage for him to say, "Yet I also believe in tax cuts for another practical reason: because they provide insurance against economic recession. . . . I hope for continued growth -- but it is not guaranteed. A president must work for the best case, and prepare for the worst." He was well-prepared; and as Alan Greenspan said, the tax cuts were "extraordinarily well timed from the point of view of the economy." * * *

While the good positive effects of the tax cut on the economy are relatively non-controversial, their effect on the federal budget stirs a great deal of controversy. The just-released figures on tax receipts in 2006 allow us to shed some light on this debate.

First, a look back at 2002 shows that it was the collapse of the bubble and the effects of 9/11 that were mainly responsible for the decline in tax revenue and the rise of the budget deficit -- and not the tax cuts. As a baseline for comparison, consider the economic and revenue projections the departing Clinton administration prepared as background for the FY 2002 Budget. That projection was based on continued solid growth and no tax cuts, although growth had in fact already begun to decline. As a result, the Clinton FY 2002 budget projected revenues of $2.210 trillion; but only $1.853 trillion was actually collected. This provided a FY 2002 shortfall of $357 billion, the result of both the tax cuts and the drop in economic activity.

The Joint Committee on Taxation estimated that the FY 2002 revenue loss of the first Bush tax cut was $38 billion and $51 billion from the second Bush tax cut -- $89 billion in all. This leaves $268 billion of the shortfall to be attributed to the effects of the collapse of the 1990s bubble, the attacks on 9/11, and other economic drags. Swings in economic activity, not discretionary tax changes, drive the great majority of the swings in federal revenues, and were the cause of the deficits of the early part of the decade. Since then, it has been a matter of fiscal "catch-up."

The data suggest that process of "catch-up" has been far more successful than official estimates thought possible. In August 2003 the non-partisan CBO forecast tax revenue in FY 2006 at $2.276 trillion (which excluded $53 billion of tax relief passed subsequently). That forecast included the effects of the slowdown, a return to more rapid growth, and the 2003 tax cuts.

But the data just released showed FY 2006 revenues of $2.407 trillion, $131 billion higher than CBO projected after the tax cuts were accelerated and $624 billion higher than the FY 2003 revenues. For perspective on that $131 billion of extra revenues, the total 2006 revenue loss from all of the president's tax cuts was only $193 billion.

There were two reasons for the revenue feedback. First, after the tax cuts were passed the economy expanded more rapidly than most projected at the time. Second, more taxes were collected from each dollar of GDP than expected. When an economy of a given size produces higher-than-expected revenue after a tax change, it must mean that the tax code has become a more efficient revenue generator. Lower tax rates, particularly on dividends and entrepreneurial income, provide incentives for people to give up some of their previous -- economically distorting but tax-efficient -- behavior.

This response is underscored by the distribution of receipts, which have shifted decidedly up the income scale. Although critics endlessly call the Bush measures tax cuts for the rich, the share of income taxes paid by the top 1%, 5% and 10% of taxpayers has moved up. These people were most affected by higher rates of the past, and have the greatest ability to reorient their economic behavior when rates are reduced.

While economists will argue about how to divide up the extra revenue between the demand-side and supply-side responses, the more interesting question is what would have happened without an aggressive fiscal policy response. In Japan, five years after its bubble burst, tax receipts were still 14% below their peak because the economy was so weak; in the U.S. they are 19% higher than in 2000. Evidence suggests that monetary policy, though helpful, was not the lone cause of the recovery. Consumption spending turned up sharply in the third quarter of 2003, coincident with reduced tax withholding in paychecks. Nearly every important macroeconomic variable, including the unemployment rate, started improving noticeably in the second half of 2003, the first time the full impact of the tax cuts hit the economy. Moreover, consumption spending turned up in advance of the housing boom, whereas in Australia, New Zealand and the U.K. the increase in home prices clearly led an acceleration in consumption growth.

Mr. Bush has every reason to be proud of his tax cuts. Granted, he shouldn't expect a chorus of bipartisan praise based on the numbers just released. But he should rest assured that economic historians will credit the tax cuts as having been a model of the successful application of economic theory to the real world.

Mr. Lindsey, president and CEO of the Lindsey Group, was President Bush's chief economic adviser from 2001 to 2002.

Deficit Diversions (WP)

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

AND THEN WHAT? That's the question everyone should be asking in the wake of Wednesday's announcement that the 2006 federal budget deficit came in at $247.7 billion, the lowest in four years. President Bush trumpeted the good news, saying that not only had the administration met its goal of cutting the deficit in half but that "we've done it three years ahead of schedule."

Forget the tussle over whether that's much of an achievement: Deficits tend to go down during periods of economic recovery, and cutting the deficit in half has always been something of an arbitrary target and the product of a puffed-up estimate at the outset -- the $512 billion the administration projected for 2004, at a time when the Congressional Budget Office forecast was $477 billion.

The important question, which is to say the question that the president and his congressional enablers aren't facing, is where things go from here. And the answer is, nowhere good. The trend line goes up, starting as early as next year, when the CBO projects a deficit of $286 billion. Over the long term, the outlook is bleak. Assuming that Congress makes the president's tax cuts permanent and continues to adjust the alternative minimum tax, deficits will total almost $3.5 trillion over the next decade and average $349 billion a year, according to calculations by the liberal Center on Budget and Policy Priorities. And that's the good decade: After that come the really steep costs of the retirement of the baby boomers and exploding entitlement spending.

There is no indication in either party of any willingness to come to terms with this reality. Lawmakers balked this year at any cuts to entitlement programs. The only two appropriations bills that Congress has managed to approve so far increase spending. According to the CBO, spending in the fiscal year that just ended grew by 8.7 percent, "the fastest rate of increase since 1990." A big chunk of that, about $50 billion, was one-time outlays for hurricane relief. But another worrisome factor was the rising cost of interest payments, which jumped $45 billion, or 24 percent, making it the fastest-growing category of federal spending.

Mr. Bush pledged to return to the subject of Social Security and entitlement spending after the election. "The fundamental question facing the government in Washington, D.C., is will we have the will necessary to deal with these entitlement programs, to leave behind a better budget picture, to deal with the unfunded liabilities and the mandatory programs for future generations," he said.

Nice words -- as nice as words like them sounded last year, and all the years before that. Unless Mr. Bush shifts course and gets realistic about putting both revenue and spending on the table, and unless Democrats shift course and get realistic about the fact that current promises to beneficiaries are unsustainable, it's those "future generations" that are going to pay the price for today's irresponsibility and inaction.

Faster FDA Cures (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

Whoever controls Congress next year, the Food and Drug Administration is sure to be a political battleground. The controversial Prescription Drug User Fee Act of 1992 is scheduled for reauthorization, and the conventional political wisdom holds that the FDA is too "cozy" with Big Pharma and thus overeager to rubber-stamp dangerous new drugs.

So allow us to draw attention to an important and undernoticed study, "Assessing the Safety and Efficacy of the FDA," published by the National Bureau of Economic Research. Its surprising conclusion is that the FDA does a pretty good job managing "the central speed-safety trade-off" involved in drug approvals -- and might even do well to move faster.

The authors looked at 662 drugs approved between 1979 and 2002, a period that included the passage of the Prescription Drug User Fee Act that allowed drug companies to help fund the FDA budget in exchange for faster reviews. They found that the resulting modest gains in drug review times have produced unambiguous public benefits.

In monetary terms, the authors estimate that the law improved consumer welfare by as much as $19 billion. But more importantly, they found that more rapid access to beneficial drugs saved between 180,000 and 310,000 "life-years." By contrast, assuming that every risky drug withdrawn in that period was the fault of the Prescription Drug User Fee Act produces an upper-bound estimate of only 56,000 life-years lost.

This study deserves a lot more attention than it's been getting, since the Washington debate is dominated by bad ideas about how to make FDA regulation much more onerous. In particular, a recent report from the National Academy of Science's Institute of Medicine (IOM) is being spun as evidence that the FDA is somehow "broken" and in need of fundamental reform.

We've looked at the IOM report in detail, and it's hardly as damning of the FDA as media reports suggest. For example, the report explicitly rejects the idea that high-profile drug withdrawals -- such as Vioxx -- "represent de facto failures of the drug safety regulatory system. . . This is not so." The IOM also rejects the basic idea behind legislation sponsored by Senators Chuck Grassley and Chris Dodd that the FDA should have a drug safety office separate from the office that approves drugs in the first place: "Risk and benefit cannot be considered in isolation from one another."

But despite these sensible observations, the IOM still wants more regulation. Among its recommendations are vastly increased levels of post-approval safety monitoring. That might make sense if the goal is making regulators comfortable with the idea of approving drugs more quickly. But that doesn't appear to be what the IOM and its cheering section want.

The IOM also proposes draconian restrictions on new-drug advertising and tighter conflict-of-interest standards for FDA advisory panel members. This despite the fact that the most qualified scientists and doctors have substantial sources of private income, and despite a study by the Naderite Public Citizen group that failed to find one instance of a panel recommendation that would have changed if allegedly conflicted members had been excluded.

Most fundamentally, the IOM presents little evidence that there is even a problem to remedy. By contrast, the National Bureau authors at least attempt to put some real facts on the table. They note that the absence of other attempts at hard, quantitative analysis in the great FDA debate is "somewhat paradoxical, since despite the agency's strict adherence to evidence-based evaluation of products overseen, there is less evidence on its own safety and efficacy. Put differently, no product application would pass the FDA approval process with the quality and type of evidence that currently exists for evaluating the FDA policies themselves."

The upshot of the economists' report is that the 1992 Prescription Drug User Fee Act deserves reauthorization. But the evidence also suggests Congress should probably be looking for other ways to make FDA approvals still faster. Despite the high-profile Vioxx panic, the FDA is far more likely to kill by depriving you of a drug than allowing you to take a dangerous one.

Fed Reports Resilience In Economy (NYT)

By Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

Maybe the sputtering housing market will not be that big of a drag on the economy after all.

Falling gas prices are leaving Americans with more money to spend, and inflation has become less of a threat in recent weeks, according to a report released yesterday by the Federal Reserve.

DOJ_NMG_0080454

Wall Street reveled at the news. Stock prices — already buoyed by a series of strong corporate earnings announcements from companies like McDonald's and Costco — surged even higher after the Fed's report, the beige book, came out yesterday afternoon.

The benchmark Standard & Poor's 500-stock index jumped to its highest close in more than five and a half years. The Dow Jones industrial average, which last week broke a record high that had stood since 2000, climbed past 11,900 to close fewer than 53 points short of 12,000. The Nasdaq composite gained more than a point and a half.

A separate report showing that the nation's trade deficit reached a record high in August was apparently an afterthought for investors. The Commerce Department said that on a seasonally adjusted basis, Americans imported $69.9 billion more than they exported, up 2.7 percent from a $68 billion deficit in July. That increase was in large part a result of near record petroleum prices.

While the beige book was hardly a glowing picture of the nation's economy, it did strike a generally optimistic tone. It described a "widespread cooling" in residential housing but noted that growth in commercial real estate activity was picking up some of the slack.

And there were a handful of areas where residential home sales "showed signs of resilience," the report said. Manhattan, Houston and Sioux Falls, S.D., were among these pockets of strength.

"It seems like things are still stable," said Marisa DiNatale of Moody's Economy.com. "There may be moderating growth, but it's certainly not a drastic slowdown."

Other potential problem spots in the economy — rising prices and slower consumer spending — do not appear to be much of a problem at all in many areas of the country, the report said. Consumers spent freely, taking vacations and shopping for back-to-school items. Wage growth was described as generally "modest." And there were few signs of pressure from higher prices as the cost of gasoline dropped.

Economists said falling fuel prices should be reflected in the next trade deficit report. Energy costs were the major reason for the widening trade gap in August, with the deficit in petroleum-related products accounting for nearly all of the $1.9 billion increase. The amount Americans spent on foreign-made household appliances and electronics also rose.

"The trade balance should improve significantly soon," Dimitry Fleming, an economist with ING, said in a research note. "August, however, was never going to be the starting point, with the lagged effects of higher oil prices."

The growing trade imbalance with China was another major factor in the ballooning trade deficit. The unadjusted trade deficit for August was $79 billion. Nearly a third of that, $22 billion, represented the gap in trade between the United States and China.

The numbers defied expectations. Economists who were surveyed before the numbers came out predicted that the overall deficit would fall in August, but it rose, seasonally adjusted, by $1.9 billion from July.

When the gap hit a record in July, economists said they believed that the numbers were nearing a peak. But as energy prices remained high this summer, the deficit continued to swell. Still, many economists said yesterday that they now believed that the turning point was near.

"This is probably as bad as it gets," wrote Paul Ashworth, senior United States economist with the economics research firm Capital Economics.

Yesterday, the Chinese reported their own trade numbers, which showed a surplus of $15.3 billion for September. China's trade surplus hit a record $18.8 billion in August.

While American reliance on foreign goods is showing no signs of weakening, exports also remained strong. After declining in July, exports grew in August by 2.3 percent, to $122.4 billion. But that rate of growth was not strong enough to offset the rise in imports, which reached $192.3 billion in August. That was an increase of 2.4 percent.

Peter Kretzmer, senior economist with Bank of America, said such strong import growth was a sign the economy would expand at a faster rate in the final months of the year. "We've been surprised by how strong import growth is," he said. "This strong domestic demand may be a bit of a harbinger of a strong domestic economy going into the fourth quarter."

Pressures Exist Amid Expansion, Fed Survey Says (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

Job markets are tightening across the country, but that hasn't yet produced a notable acceleration in wages, the Federal Reserve's latest survey of economic conditions has found.

The Fed's "beige book" also found sharply slowing housing activity but no sign yet that consumer spending has broadly slowed. Falling energy prices have provided some relief while not yet leading to notably lower consumer prices, it said. (Read the report1)

DOJ_NMG_0080455

"Economic activity continued to expand," according to the report, which is prepared a few weeks in advance of each policy meeting of the central bank. Four of the Fed's 12 districts reported that business activity "firmed," a couple said it "cooled" and others said growth was "moderate or mixed."

The Fed's next meeting is scheduled for Oct. 24-25. It is widely expected to leave its short-term interest-rate target at 5.25% as it waits for inflation to moderate.

The survey found labor shortages spreading beyond skilled and technical positions. The Fed's Kansas City district said most contacts "continued to report some kind of labor shortage," in some cases for entry-level workers.

Despite that, employers didn't report much pressure to raise wages. "Despite tight white-collar labor markets, only a couple of firms are budgeting for higher average pay raises in 2007 than in 2006," the Boston district reported.

Both housing and automobile sales were reported as weak across the country, with the Philadelphia district noting a growing number of small car dealerships going out of business and half of the homebuilders contacted in the Cleveland district having reduced their work forces. A real-estate agent in Washington, D.C., called that area's market "horrible."

However, other consumer spending remained firm. The manager of a chain department store in Charlotte, N.C., said sales were "going strong" as local factory employment expanded.

Companies tried, with mixed success, to pass on prior increases in raw-material prices to consumers, but there were signs the pressure had peaked.

In the Dallas district, "lower energy costs have halted the rise in selling prices and not yet resulted in price declines." In the same district, some producers of construction materials "report that some large publicly traded builders have sent letters asking for price reductions to help them achieve quarterly income projections. This has led them to become wary about doing business with these builders."

Meanwhile, Michael Moskow, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Chicago, gave an upbeat message on the economy and a warning on inflation. "Outside of housing, there do not appear to be any imbalances that would foreshadow" large pullback in spending elsewhere in the economy, he said in a speech to a real-estate group in Chicago. Inflation, he said, "has been too high" and while it should "gradually come down...there are substantial risks to that forecast." If expectations of inflation increase, the Fed should raise interest rates, he suggested.

Economy Keeps Growing, But Housing And Inflation Look Problematic (USAT)

USA Today, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — The economy grew at a mixed or moderate pace in much of the nation from late August through September, with “widespread cooling” in housing, the Federal Reserve said Thursday.

In its beige book, an anecdotal look at the economy named for the color of its cover, the Fed said wage and price pressures were mixed.

The beige book will be used for the Fed's Oct. 24-25 meeting.

The Fed expects slower growth to gradually reduce inflation. But minutes of the Fed's Sept. 20 meeting, issued Wednesday, said officials saw a “substantial risk” their forecast might not pan out. USA TODAY economics reporters Sue Kirchhoff and Barbara Hagenbaugh looked at the beige book.

1st District:

Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Vermont, most of Connecticut. Business was “somewhat mixed.” Factory costs eased but were above a year ago. Houses in Massachusetts are now on the market an average 110 days, up a month from 2005.

2nd District:

New York, northern New Jersey, Fairfield County, Conn. Business showed signs of “strengthening.” Hiring was steady to stronger. New York City tourism was robust. Housing markets in New Jersey and Upstate New York kept weakening with some falloff in home renovation.

3rd District:

Delaware, southern New Jersey, eastern Pennsylvania. Growth seems to have slowed. Manufacturing dipped, retail sales were up, though the auto sector lagged behind. Mortgage lending fell. Wages have been rising a bit faster than at the same time in 2005.

4th District:

Ohio, eastern Kentucky, western Pennsylvania, northern West Virginia. Growth was modest, with businesses worried about the slowing auto and housing sectors. Commercial builders called business strong, but worried inquiries were “beginning to taper off.” Trucking and shipping service demand softened.

5th District:

DOJ_NMG_0080456

Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, southern West Virginia, District of Columbia. Activity expanded moderately, with retailers and manufacturers doing better and housing doing worse. Labor markets were generally tight, with skilled workers tough to find.

6th District:

Alabama, Florida, Georgia, eastern Tennessee, southern Louisiana, southern Mississippi. Activity was mixed. Housing trended lower in Florida and other areas. Labor shortages caused wage pressures in some areas, and firms were seeing cost increases related to energy and raw material prices.

7th District:

Iowa, northern Indiana, northern Illinois, southern Michigan, southern Wisconsin. Consumer spending rose "modestly," with retailers calling the back-to-school season "nothing stellar." The recent fall in gas prices gave sales of non-gasoline items a small boost. Manufacturers continued to see a shortage of skilled workers.

8th District:

Arkansas, southern Illinois, southern Indiana, western Kentucky, northern Mississippi, eastern Missouri, western Tennessee. Manufacturing expanded, with several firms planning to open plants. However, the auto parts industry planned to lay off workers and cut production. Permits for new home construction posted double-digit declines in the Louisville, St. Louis and Memphis areas.

9th District:

Minnesota, Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, upper Michigan, northern Wisconsin. The job market tightened a bit. Wage increases were "moderate." Tourism was up a bit from a year ago; one official in South Dakota said the pheasant-hunting season held promise. The alternative energy industry was expanding rapidly.

10th District:

Colorado, Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, Wyoming, western Missouri, northern New Mexico. The rate of hiring outpaced layoffs, and "most contacts" reported labor shortages, particularly for skilled and specialized workers. Still, wage pressures eased a bit. Consumer spending firmed, with weakness in home furnishings.

11th District:

Texas, northern Louisiana, southern New Mexico. Imported, fuel-efficient cars outsold domestic vehicles. Although some rain fell in September, drought conditions persisted. Cotton production could be off 35% from last year. A sharp drop in natural gas prices led to industry caution.

12th District:

Alaska, Arizona, California, Hawaii, Idaho, Nevada, Oregon, Utah, Washington. Inflation "remained modest." Pay rose more rapidly for workers in short supply, such as those in health care, finance and construction, and in such regions as Idaho and Utah. The pace of home sales, construction and price growth slowed.

US Trade Deficit Hits All-time High (FT)

By Krishna Guha

Financial Times, October 13, 2006

The US trade deficit hit a record high for the second successive month in August, accentuating concerns about global imbalances and raising fresh doubts about the strength of US third quarter growth.

Economists were on Thursday revising down their estimates of growth in the quarter, which some now expect will fall below 2 per cent.

Meanwhile, the Federal Reserve issued its latest beige book, which suggested that consumer spending firmed in September and early October, but characterised growth overall as "moderate or mixed."

It said "nearly all districts reported that housing market conditions continued to soften" with rising inventors and additional incentives for buyers.

There was little anecdotal evidence to support the notion – advanced by some Fed officials - that housing activity may already be close to its trough.

The beige book reported that "the majority of districts characterised price pressures as contained."

Labour market conditions were described as "taut" with skilled workers in short supply in some areas. Some regions faced shortages of professional, scientific and technical workers, for example.

Wage growth was "generally modest".

The vast services sector "generally strengthened across districts since the last report," the Beige Book said, while manufacturing activity remained "generally strong.

The August trade deficit hit $69.9bn, equivalent to an annual rate of nearly $840bn, figures released yesterday by the Department of Commerce showed.The somewhat balanced tone is consistent with the Fed remaining on hold for an extended period as it seeks to verify that inflation is easing as expected.

Part of the increase was driven by oil prices, which continued to rise in August before falling sharply into September.

However, the volume of oil imported also rose, and imports more generally were strong.

Exports remained healthy, growing at 2.3 per cent in August against 2.4 per cent for imports, but with imports starting from a much larger base, the net effect was a widening deficit.

Haseeb Ahmed, an economist at JP Morgan, said "it was a bit of a surprise, in the sense that imports were much stronger than the market was expecting." He said this boded well for inventories, which should partly offset the drag on growth.

JP Morgan still looks to a recovery in net trade to support US growth next year.

Most economists predicted a rapid turnaround in trade in the current quarter due to lower oil and other commodity prices, which would in turn boost fourth quarter growth.

"The narrowing of the nominal trade deficit will be substantial this quarter," said Peter Kretzmer, an economist at Bank of America Securities.

However, continued strength in US consumption could slow the longer term adjustment.

U.S. Trade Gap Widened In August (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

The U.S. trade deficit jumped to a record $69.86 billion in August, powered by strong imports of consumer goods from China and the steep cost of imported oil.

The 2.7% increase from July kept the nation on track to shatter its record annual trade gap of more than $700 billion in 2005, the Commerce Department said yesterday. However, the data released yesterday offered some glimmers of hope that the trade picture might be poised to improve over the next few months.

"While the sharp rise in the August deficit is a little disconcerting, this should be the high-water mark for the deficit this year," said Brian Bethune, an economist with Global Insight, an economic forecasting firm.

Mr. Bethune said the recent decline in oil prices could reduce the nation's monthly bill for imported oil, which totaled $27.2 billion in August. That trend should begin to be reflected in the September trade numbers, setting the stage for a broader easing of the trade deficit by the end of the year, he said.

The price of imported oil has fallen to about $57 a barrel from the $66.12 average reported for August.

Outside the petroleum sector, the monthly deficit for trade in goods has been on a downward track since peaking in January. In the first eight months of the year, U.S. merchandise exports have been growing at a faster clip than imports -- 13.7% compared with 10.3%.

Ultimately, exports would have to grow at a much faster rate to make a significant dent in the overall deficit. But the underlying trend is giving some economists hope that an improvement could be on the horizon.

An expected softening in the nation's domestic demand, possibly including a decline in spending on imported consumer goods, could also help narrow the trade deficit in coming months. But for now, the American consumer's appetite for foreign-made goods -- from artwork and antiques to appliances and footwear -- appears undiminished by high energy prices and a cooling property market at home.

U.S. imports totaled $192.28 billion in August, with shipments from China accounting for a big share of the monthly increase. The surge in imports from China helped push the U.S. trade deficit with China up 12% to a record $21.96 billion for the month, three times as wide as the U.S.'s trade gap with Japan, according to Commerce Department figures.

U.S. exports for the month grew to $122.42 billion, helped by increased shipments abroad of U.S.-made capital goods and industrial supplies, among other things.

The unexpectedly high August trade deficit, which followed a revised July deficit of $68 billion, prompted many analysts to scale back their expectations of how much trade contributed to the nation's third-quarter economic growth. Paul Ashworth, a senior economist at Capital Economics, estimated the weak trade performance knocked 0.6 percentage points off GDP growth for the quarter.

"That reinforces our view that GDP growth slipped further to an annualized pace of around 2.0%, down from 2.6%" in the second quarter, he said.

Critics say the bloated U.S. trade deficit, which is fueled in large measure by foreign financial flows, is unsustainable over the long-term. If foreign investors ever decide to pull back, critics warn, the U.S. could be in for an economic shock, leading to falling stock values and higher interest rates.

U.S. Trade Gap Grew To New High In August (WP)

By Howard Schneider And Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

The U.S. trade deficit rose to a record $69.9 billion in August, driven by high oil prices, a growing trade gap with China and rising consumer demand for imported goods from antiques to appliances, the government said yesterday.

The trade deficit was 2.8 percent bigger than in July, despite strong growth in exports, led by sales of agricultural products and aircraft, the Commerce Department reported. American companies sold $122.4 billion worth of goods and services overseas in August, an increase of $2.7 billion over the previous month.

American companies and consumers bought far more from abroad, however, with imports rising to $192.3 billion. That included $20.8 billion worth of crude oil, as demand remained strong through the summer despite prices that exceeded $77 per barrel in July.

The widening trade deficit is a further drag on U.S. economic growth, which has slowed sharply this year, in part because of a downturn in the housing market.

The trade report prompted several analysts to lower their estimates of recent economic growth to an annual rate of about 1 percent in the July-through-September period, or less than half of the 2.6 percent pace of the previous three months.

Such forecasts bolstered financial-market expectations that Federal Reserve policymakers will keep interest rates steady through the end of the year as they watch how the economy evolves. They hope the economy slows just enough this year to dampen inflation without sliding into a recession.

The latest trade-deficit figure "gives the Fed further reason to keep rates on hold," Jason Schenker, an economist at Wachovia Corp., said in an analysis for clients.

Schenker was among several analysts who think the trade deficit narrowed in September and is likely to shrink further in October because of the recent declines in oil prices and a drop in gasoline demand after the summer driving season. Oil settled at $57.86 yesterday on the New York Mercantile Exchange.

"While the sharp rise in the August deficit is a little disconcerting, this should be the high-water mark for the deficit this year," wrote Brian Bethune, a U.S. economist at Global Insight, a financial forecasting and analysis firm.

Even so, the trade deficit for 2006 appears on track to set another new high, surpassing last year's record $716 billion. Through August, the country had spent $523 billion more on imports than it sold abroad.

Democratic leaders, contending that theft of American ideas overseas is one factor in the trade deficit, sent a letter to President Bush yesterday, urging him to take immediate steps to protect American intellectual property. In a statement, House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi of California argued that lax enforcement of copyrights and patents is costing the U.S. economy $250 million a year.

"The president's failed economic policies have resulted in another month of record trade deficits, once again highlighting the need for a new direction," Pelosi said. "We must pursue an aggressive trade enforcement agenda so that U.S. businesses and workers do not pay the price for countries that refuse to play by the rules."

Bush said this week that his administration understood that problem and was working on it; Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. raised the concern in recent meetings in China.

Politically, the new figure from the Commerce Department highlights the continued trade gap with China, which widened to a record $22 billion, a 12 percent increase over the month before.

The mismatch in trade between the two countries has led to pressure from the Bush administration for China to let its currency rise in value against the dollar, which would make Chinese-made goods more expensive in world markets -- and American-made goods more competitive.

The trade gap is not entirely welcome news for China. The country reported yesterday that its September trade surplus was $15.3 billion, the second highest on record, after August, and a sign that efforts to tame the country's runaway economic growth are not taking hold quickly.

The flood of money into China has increased inflation and raised concerns about the overvaluation of real estate and other assets. China's leaders fear if they do not slow economic growth to a manageable pace, they risk a financial meltdown that could lead to social unrest.

Dow's Close Puts 12,000 Within Reach (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

NEW YORK, Oct. 12 -- The Dow Jones industrial average broke through 11,900 to close at a new high Thursday, boosted by optimism over the health of corporate earnings.

DOJ_NMG_0080459

It was the fifth record close in two weeks for the Dow, which also set a record intraday high.

The Dow rose 95.57, or 0.81 percent, to 11,947.70. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 12.88, or 0.95 percent, to 1362.83. The Nasdaq composite index rose 37.91, or 1.64 percent, to 2346.18.

The Dow's advance put the 12,000 mark within close range for investors. The previous high was 11,867.17 on Tuesday. The intraday high set Thursday was 11,959.63, eclipsing an earlier trading high of 11,872.94 set on Monday.

The markets were upbeat Thursday, with investors focusing on positive news from well-known consumer brands and on economic data that indicated the economy was holding its own even as it slowed.

Oil prices, which remain near lows for the year, also boosted the mood on Wall Street. An Energy Department report said inventories were higher last week and raised doubts about whether OPEC's members would be able to soon agree on a production cut.

Investors got a look at the state of the economy with the release of the Federal Reserve's "beige book," which summarizes regional economic activity. The report found that economic growth appeared to be moderate or mixed. The findings seemed to reassure investors looking for the economy to slow at a moderate pace.

Kevin Logan, chief U.S. economist at Dresdner Kleinwort, said the book's tone was more optimistic than the one issued in August. "They didn't say there was much of an inflation problem," he said. "Investors saw this as confirmation that the Fed is on hold."Movers

Rally Puts Dow On Cusp Of 12000 (WSJ)

By Peter A. McKay

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

Not many investors seem to be heeding cautionary words about whether the Dow Jones Industrial Average can continue its recent run to fresh record highs.

Less than two weeks after the blue-chip average broke a more than six-year-old record, it is already flirting with another headline-grabbing number: a close above 12000. The Dow jumped 95.57 points yesterday, or 0.8%, to a new high of 11947.70, up 11.5% on the year. The average was led by rallies in its components Boeing, which announced strong aircraft orders, and McDonald's, which forecast strong earnings. Both companies' shares rose more than 2%.

Analysts say the rally in the Dow has been driven by an odd, delicate mix of aversion to risk and optimism regarding the economy. Nearly every day, investors and big Wall Street firms alike have welcomed low unemployment rates, forecasts of strong corporate profits and the Federal Reserve's decision, starting in early August, to hold its key interest-rate targets steady.

But many investors are so antsy about whether those conditions can last much longer that they are sticking to big-name companies they think can withstand rougher conditions, if they develop. The result has been what investing pros call a "rotation" away from smaller, more speculative companies that until earlier this year had been beating the large-cap Dow industrials.

"I don't see a lot to be gained from taking a lot of risk in the equity markets right now," said strategist Mark Keller, of A.G. Edwards & Sons.

Mr. Keller said in recent months he has been recommending that clients buy stocks in companies with large market capitalizations, like the ones in the Dow. But he adds: "Frankly, I'm surprised at how well it's worked."

The outlook for consumer spending has been a major catalyst behind the recent strength in the Dow and other major stock indicators. In particular, a pullback in energy prices has buoyed hopes that consumers can keep up their purchases of various goods and services now that they don't have to spend as much at the pump.

Crude-oil futures edged up 27 cents yesterday, to $57.86 a barrel, but have declined over the longer term amid robust supplies and easing geopolitical concerns in several oil-producing states. Oil contracts for November delivery are down about 25% from their summer highs close to $80, and are off 5.2% on the year.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index climbed 1%, or 12.88 points, to 1362.83, up 9.2% on the year but still 12% off its record close in 2000. The index's retail components were especially strong, up 1.4%, helped in part by a 7.7% jump in shares of Costco Wholesale, which announced better-than-expected profit for its fiscal fourth quarter.

The Nasdaq Composite Index gained 1.6%, or 37.91 points, to 2346.18. On the year, however, that index, which includes many small technology stocks, has lagged behind the S&P and Dow, up just 6.4%. It is still at less than half of its record.

Leo Kamp, chief investment economist at the asset-management firm TIAA-CREF recently cautioned clients that the Dow's rally may not last much longer. He conceded in an interview that it could cross 12000 in the short term, but he doesn't think the blue-chip average can make a sustained run higher until the Fed begins to ease rates, perhaps about halfway through 2007.

Economic news yesterday was mixed. The Commerce Department announced the U.S. trade deficit hit a record $69.86 billion in August. Wall Street had expected the deficit to decline.

The Fed's "beige book" report portrayed the U.S. economy growing at a modest pace, tempered by weak housing prices and auto sales.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose; bond prices were mixed. The 10-year note gained 1/32 point, or 31 cents for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.778%. The 30-year bond fell 2/32 to yield 4.910%.

The dollar weakened. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 119.40 yen, compared with 119.72. The euro rose to $1.2554, compared with 1.2524.

Wall Street Higher On Strong Earnings (FT)

By Anuj Gangahar In New York

Financial Times, October 13, 2006

US stocks rallied strongly on Thursday as the market welcomed a batch of strong earnings reports from companies including McDonald's and Harley Davidson and oil prices hit their lowest level this year early in the session.

In the previous session, stocks recovered after a brief sell-off in mid-afternoon after a plane crash in Manhattan. Subsequent reports confirmed the crash was not an act of terrorism, as had initially been feared.

Stocks were buoyed as oil prices were at their lowest this year in advance of the US government's weekly report on fuel, which was issued on Thursday morning.

McDonald's, the world's largest restaurant chain and a Dow component, said on Thursday that its preliminary third quarter profits rose to 68 cents per share, ahead of analyst estimates. The company also reported an 8.4 per cent rise in system-wide sales, better than the 7 per cent gain in revenue forecast by analysts. Its shares rose 2.38 per cent, or 98 cents, to $42.23.

PepsiCo said third quarter profit rose nearly 71 per cent, helped by strength in its international business, non-carbonated drinks and salty snacks. The beverage and snacks company also lifted its forecast for the year. In spite of this, PepsiCo shares fell 1.58 per cent to $62.85.

The S&P 500 closed up 0.95 per cent, or 12.87 points, at 1,362.82. The Nasdaq composite was up 1.64 per cent, or 371.91 points, at 2,346.18 at the close. The Dow Jones Industrial Average closed at a new record high of 11,948.26, up 0.81 per cent or 96.13 points for the day, the first time it has closed above the 11,900 barrier.

The US trade gap rose to a record level in August. US imports outstripped exports by $69.9bn in August, according to the commerce department, up from the previous record of $68bn set in July.

Alfred Goldman, of AG Edwards, said the upward movement of stocks was in spite of certain factors that may have been expected to have more of a negative impact recently. "This market has been ignoring several good excuses to go lower , such as North Korea's nuclear test," he said.

He added that the Dow was up 10 per cent in the past two and half months, saying the market should be careful of going too far too fast.

Early on Thursday, wholesale retailer Costco reported better-than-expected results and said it did not expect to restate results following a review of its stock option programme. Costco shares rose 7.65 per cent, or $3.83, to $53.90.

Harley Davidson, the motorcycle maker, said its earnings climbed 18 per cent in the most recent quarter, beating Wall Street forecasts. Its shares climbed 2.7 per cent to $64.88.

Shares in Systemax, the computer parts and hardware distributor, plunged after the company said it would delay reporting of its second quarter results because it needed more time to complete the process. Shares in the company were down 21.54 per cent, or $3.24, at $11.80.

Wal-Mart Loses Pennsylvania Suit On Rest Breaks (WSJ)

By James Covert

DOJ_NMG_0080461

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

Wal-Mart Stores Inc. knowingly violated Pennsylvania labor laws by forcing employees to work during rest breaks and off the clock, a state jury found.

The Bentonville, Ark., retailer, increasingly under fire for its labor practices, faces paying minimum damages of $62 million according to state labor statutes, and the total could easily exceed $100 million, plaintiff's lawyer Michael Donovan said in an interview. The Pennsylvania jury is slated to hear arguments on damages early today, he said.

During the six-week trial, former Wal-Mart workers testified they were pressured to skip breaks or cut them short by store managers who had been promised bonuses for cutting costs.

Wal-Mart's attorney, Neal Manne, argued that Wal-Mart had paid its employees properly and said the lead plaintiffs were part of a small group of disgruntled workers. Wal-Mart spokesman John Simley declined to comment on the verdict until the jury had ruled on damages.

The jury agreed with plaintiffs that Wal-Mart didn't show "good faith" in protecting workers' rights for rest breaks and improperly forced them to work off the clock. But it ruled in Wal-Mart's favor on a separate charge that it denied workers meal breaks.

Wal-Mart was sued by two former employees on behalf of 187,000 current and former hourly Wal-Mart workers. The lawsuit covers labor practices at Wal-Mart and Sam's Club stores in 1998 to 2001.

"Today's decision is another harsh indictment of Wal-Mart's pattern of disrespect for its workers and disregard for state law," said Andrew Grossman, executive director of Wal-Mart Watch, a union-backed critic. "For years it has been obvious that Wal-Mart is willing to cut corners when it comes to its employees."

Wal-Mart is facing similar suits around the U.S. The company still faces at least seven other major class-action lawsuits in the U.S., including a federal sex-discrimination suit filed in 2000 on behalf of 1.6 million former and current female workers.

Wal-Mart Workers Win Wage Suit (WP)

By Amy Joyce

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

Wal-Mart Stores Inc. violated Pennsylvania labor laws by forcing hourly employees to work through breaks and beyond their shifts without overtime pay, a jury decided yesterday.

Lawyers for the employees said the decision could result in $62 million or more in damages.

The lawsuit, brought by two employees on behalf of almost 187,000 current and former Wal-Mart employees, claimed that the company made workers in Pennsylvania miss more than 33 million rest breaks from 1998 to 2001. At least 57 other wage-and-hour cases have been filed across the United States against the world's largest retailer, and many of them are awaiting class-action certification, according to company filings.

"I think this proves that Wal-Mart's sweatshop mind-set persists," said Chris Kofinis, a spokesman with WakeUp Wal-Mart, a United Food and Commercial Workers Union-backed group. "There is some point where Wal-Mart will have to listen and it's got to treat its workers with respect and fairness."

Michael Donovan, a lawyer for the employees, would not comment until damages are awarded. He expects that to happen today. In court, the lawyers argued that the company denied breaks to cut labor costs and increase productivity.

"We take matters very seriously when associates say they have been mistreated in any way. However, because the jury is still in deliberation, it would not be appropriate to comment on the matter until a final decision has been made," said Sarah Clark, a spokeswoman for Wal-Mart.

Neal Manne, Wal-Mart's attorney, argued that the company properly paid its employees and that the lead plaintiffs were among a small group of disgruntled workers, according to the Philadelphia Inquirer's coverage of the trial.

Company officials said records appeared to show that workers who did not have breaks did so because they chose not to, or did not sign out, according to news reports.

The company has been trying repair its image after critics cast negative light on the company, claiming it pays poverty wages and offers few benefits.

The case is one of several class-action wage-and-hour suits against the company to go to trial. In December, a jury awarded $172 million to about 116,000 current and former Wal-Mart and Sam's Club workers in California who claimed that they were illegally denied lunch breaks. Wal-Mart is appealing the verdict.

In 2002, a federal jury in Oregon found that Wal-Mart employees were forced to work off the clock and awarded back pay to 83 workers. In 2004, Wal-Mart settled a similar lunch break case in Colorado for $50 million.

One of the pending cases, which accuses the company of paying men more than women nationally, is the largest private employer civil rights class action in history. Wal-Mart has asked an appeals court to overturn the class-action status of the case.

DOJ_NMG_0080462

The Pennsylvania case is larger than the California case in that it covers more employees and involves off-the-clock work, missed rest breaks and missed meal breaks. The jury in the six-week trial in the Court of Common Pleas in Philadelphia found in favor of Wal-Mart on the missed-meal claim.

Employees said they were pressured by managers to cut meals short and skip breaks. Two cashiers said they were locked in the store after it closed to restock merchandise.

US May Bequeath Bush A Hostile Congress (FT)

By Holly Yeager And Edward Luce

Financial Times, October 13, 2006

Republican party leaders in the US have lately been making it on to the television talk-show circuit not as guests but as jokes.

A year ago it was President George W. Bush's "Brownie, you're doing a heck of a job" praise for Michael Brown, the subsequently disgraced head of the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Variations on that Hurricane Katrina blunder kept audiences entertained for weeks.

Then, last week, America's late-night comedians got another windfall when staff of Dennis Hastert, Republican speaker of the House of Representatives, described as merely "over-friendly" the lewd e-mails sent by Mark Foley, a congressional colleague of Mr Hastert's, to teenagers who worked on Capitol Hill. Some have charged that Mr Hastert had known of this behaviour long before the story broke.

Given that at least one-third of the Republican vote comes from self-described evangelical Christians, and given Mr Hastert's dogged refusal to resign as speaker amid plummeting public confidence in his party, that choice of words could look even more inept following polling day next month.

According to the first opinion polls taken since the Foley scandal hit the front pages, the Democrats lead the Republicans by between 11 and 23 percentage points in the campaign for midterm congressional elections on November 7, a significant increase over previous weeks.

In a troubling sign for the Republicans, who have controlled the House since 1994 and the Senate since 2002, the Democrats are now ahead on all the Republicans' traditionally strong issues – most notably on national security and the "war on terror" but also on taxes and the economy. One poll even showed the Democrats leading on "moral values", one of the foundation stones of modern Republicanism.

The Democrats need to gain just 15 seats in the 435-member House to win control. Two of these seats are already in effect won, since the Republican incumbents (one of whom is Mr Foley) remain on the ballot paper but have withdrawn from the race. The Democrats also need to add six seats in the Senate, where 33 of the chamber's 100 seats are being contested.

"After looking at the news for the past 10 days or so, I have to wonder how Democrats can possibly fail in their efforts to take both the House and the Senate," says Stuart Rothenberg, editor of the Rothenberg Political Report, a Washington newsletter.

The picture in the American heartlands, where the fiercest electoral battles are being fought, suggests the Democrats are on course for victory. The latest analyses show about 40 House races in which Republicans are fighting to retain seats, while Democrats have focused their defensive efforts on fewer than a dozen races.

Most worrying for Republicans, these include seats where their incumbents have won easy re-election in the past. Among these are Tom Reynolds, leader of Republicans' House campaign effort, who is facing questions about whether he failed to act on early concerns about Mr Foley's conduct. Polls show him trailing in his upstate New York district by 15 points. Hoping to reverse that slide, his campaign released a television advertisement this week in which Mr Reynolds apologised: "Looking back, more should have been done, and for that I'm sorry."

In Pennsylvania, Curt Weldon, a 10-term congressman representing a district near Philadelphia, faces a surprisingly strong challenge, after winning re-election last time by a 19-point margin. "Six months ago, no one thought that race would be competitive," says Terry Madonna, director of the Keystone Poll at Franklin and Marshall College in Lancaster, Pennsylvania.

In Senate contests, several incumbent Republicans find themselves struggling to hold on to their seats. They include Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, a close social conservative ally of Mr Bush, as well as Conrad Burns in Montana, Mike DeWine in Ohio, Jim Talent in Missouri and George Allen in Virginia.

Many struggling Republicans have been beset by scandals over ties between some in their party and Jack Abramoff, a lobbyist who this year pleaded guilty to corruption. Sheer ineptitude has also been a problem. For example, in August Mr Allen baffled many when he described a young Indian-American Democrat, who had been trailing him with a video camera, as a "macaca", which turned out to be a genus of monkey in north Africa. In spite of Mr Allen's tortured explanations, many assumed his slur to have been racial.

Across the country the Republicans have been prone to gaffes and slip-ups. "You get the feeling that a big negative wave is about to hit the party," says Frank Luntz, a leading Republican pollster. "And there's virtually nothing they can do about it."

More significantly, the Democrats have benefited from Mr Bush's growing difficulties in Iraq, in spite of a failure by the opposition party to produce a coherent alternative either to the president's "stay the course" or to calls for an almost instant withdrawal of US forces.

But most voters appear to understand that the Democrats would have little influence anyway over the course of the war in Iraq even if they won both houses of Congress. "Our candidates can say what they want about Iraq, because the American people, more or less, believe that it hasn't added to our security, that our policy is not working, and because they recognise that no one knows exactly what to do," Bill Clinton, Mr Bush's Democratic predecessor, told the Financial Times in an interview last month.

In addition to Iraq, the Democrats have benefited from widespread voter anxiety over the economy – spanning rising healthcare and education costs, median wage stagnation and fears over the growing impact of competition from China and India. Again, the Democrats have few answers to the complexities of globalisation. But almost two-thirds of Americans tell pollsters their country is headed in the wrong direction.

Such is the Democrats' lead that even diehard Republicans expect defeat. Few would disagree with George Will, a conservative columnist, who wrote in the Washington Post: "If, after the Foley episode – a maraschino cherry atop the Democrats' delectable sundae of Republican miseries – the Democrats cannot gain 13 seats, they should go into another line of work."

Since the Democrats are notoriously bad at winning elections – and the Republicans have a well-deserved reputation for squeezing every possible vote out of their national database on polling day (see below) – a Democratic victory next month cannot be taken for granted. But should it happen, it would further complicate life for Mr Bush during his remaining two years in office.

Under normal conditions a president finds it tough to set the agenda during the last two years of his final term. Mr Bush faces the additional problem that the White House will have no candidate to field next time – since Dick Cheney, vice-president, will retire alongside Mr Bush. The 2008 contest will be the first time since 1952 that the White House has not provided a candidate.

In addition, Mr Bush has found it difficult enough to push his domestic agenda through a Republican-controlled Congress – having watched his most cherished goals, including the revamping of pensions and an overhaul of America's porous immigration system, fall by the wayside in the last 18 months.

A Democratic Congress would almost certainly block any further Bush initiatives, to deprive Republicans of legislative accomplishments in the build-up to the 2008 contest. "Regardless of who controls Congress, the wind will be out of the president's sails," says Sarah Binder, senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, a Washington think-tank.

However, the Democrats would use control of Capitol Hill to push through long-promised reforms. Nancy Pelosi, the San Francisco Democrat who is poised to become the first woman speaker of the House if her party wins, said this week she would use the first 100 hours of a Democratic majority to increase the minimum wage, reduce interest rates on student loans, expand federal funding for stem cell research and require the government to negotiate with pharmaceutical companies to lower costs for the Medicare prescription drug programme.

If the Democrats take the Senate too, they may be emboldened to tackle more difficult areas, such as reforms of education and healthcare. But Mr Bush will still possess his presidential veto, which he has used only once in his six years working with a Republican-controlled Congress.

There is also intense speculation among liberals that Democrats might even push to impeach Mr Bush for misleading the public into believing there were weapons of mass destruction in Saddam Hussein's Iraq. But any such efforts would almost certainly be stymied by the presidential ambitions of several Democratic senators, most notably Hillary Clinton. Anything that looked like vengefulness could rebound badly on her presidential ambitions.

"My hunch is that we'll be facing two more years of stalemate," says Ms Binder. In other words, the quality of American politics is still likely to generate jokes.

Party arsenals feature duelling databases

By Caroline Daniel

Saul Anuzis, chairman of the Republican party for the state of Michigan, opens his laptop over lunch. At his fingertips is a voter database. Pulling up his own file he scrolls through more than 100 pieces of information, including his support for an assisted-suicide prohibition bill, his boat licence, sports interests and Catholicism.

DOJ_NMG_0080464

His profile is part of a database called Voter Vault, which will be critical in the Republican midterm election campaign. Using basic voter information, with data analysis derived from polls of up to 50,000 voters and consumer databases, the party hopes to apply algorithms to predict how groups of people intend to vote and craft a message that appeals to them.

The technique, known as "micro-targeting" on the right and "modelling" on the left, is a sign of how far modern political campaigning has become a marketing exercise, with techniques that were traditionally used in broadcast advertisements applied to political communications. Nowadays political consultants tout "turnout scores", "clusters" and "micro-targeted messages".

In the US, generic electoral constituencies such as "soccer moms" and "Reagan Democrats" are broken down into even more forensic clusters. There are different algorithms to weigh cultural differences between West and East Texas. Strategists target finer demographic slices such as "high-income, God-respecting, terrorism-fearing Republicans" or "white women aged 35-45 with college educations, who are Catholic or Protestant and pro-life, with median incomes over $35,000 and live in $150,000-plus homes".

During congressional elections in 2002, for example, Republicans used statistical analysis successfully to target "downscale white men" in Georgia with a message invoking the Confederate flag, which led to higher than expected turnout among that group. In West Virginia in 2004, they modelled "older white women churchgoers" in traditional Democratic strongholds and encouraged them to vote Republican with an anti gay-marriage message.

The US is far from the only democracy where science has been applied to democratic elections on such an unprecedented scale. One of the originators of the art is Lynton Crosby, a poll guru versed in precision targeting from his native Australia. In the British general election last year, the Conservative party used the Voter Vault database in a campaign masterminded by Mr Crosby, though his efforts failed to prevent Labour, which had its own targeting software, from achieving a third successive poll victory.

In the US, Republicans have been at the forefront of applying such techniques, led by Karl Rove, the chief political strategist for President George W. Bush.

The Republican National Committee boasts a unified voter file, systematically updated by volunteers, which rigorously tracks progress, such as how many pieces of new data were added to the system. In Michigan the data will be used to craft 12 different messages as part of the effort to get out the vote. "If you have a better 'cookie cutter', you're going to make more cookies or votes," says Mr Anuzis.

As one Democratic consultant concedes: "The world changed in 2004. The rules used to be that if voter turnout was high, that meant a progressive win. But in 2004, we had the highest voter turnout since the civil rights era – we didn't win. Why? The Republicans found new ways to find new voters."

The Republican effort was led by necessity – Democrats have long had advantages in the more primitive "geography-based" targeting because more of their voters were in urbanised, centralised precincts, making it easier for them to organise large turnouts. But the base precincts for Republicans – where 80-90 per cent of those who voted did so for them – were typically rural, and smaller, with 100 rather than 10,000 votes.

This put a premium on winkling out individual voters likely to vote Republican in largely Democratic areas. In 2004, it was used in New Mexico to target Hispanics. Rather than a generic message, Republicans focused on the 20 per cent of Hispanics who supported Mr Bush's education policy, No Child Left Behind. Their Hispanic vote rose 12 per cent compared with 2000.

Democrats acknowledge they are several years behind. In 2004, state parties continued to operate eclectic voter files with different formats that were hard to scale to a national level. It was too complex to interrogate the data about which groups might respond to a certain message.

At the Democratic National Committee there was an effort to catch up under Terry McAuliffe, former chairman, who created a unified voter database – yet it was largely used as a fundraising not an electoral tool. "While progressives tried doing modelling in 2002, their approach was to try it nationally, which doesn't work. Put simply, a Texas Democrat and a Vermont Democrat are quite different Democrats," says one Democratic strategist.

The DNC under Howard Dean has yet to embrace scientific modelling on such a scale as the Republicans. It will run just six micro-targeting projects this year, though independent groups on the left, such as the AFL-CIO, are filling the void. They are tapping into a new for-profit voter database operated by Catalist. The company, created this year, received funding from George Soros, the billionaire financier.

Outside groups, such as Emily's List, pay Catalist to use their data for micro-targeting projects. The lessons – such as how to target voters who are most interested in the minimum wage – are then shared via America Votes, a grassroots voter-mobilisation operation that seeks to co-ordinate progressive groups in the 2006 elections and eliminate wasteful overlap in how they talk to voters.

Maggie Fox, president of America Votes, says her aim is to get progressive groups to work more closely and share electoral strategies, using micro-targeting to identify which organisations should be targeting which constituents. The group will spend $1.3m (£700,000, €1m) on micro-targeting projects in five key states, including Ohio and Michigan. “When we started doing it it was a bit like asking people to undress in public,” she says.

Yet she acknowledges the focus is on learning lessons that can be applied in 2007 and 2008, rather than making a big difference this year.

Donald Green, professor of political science at Yale University, remains sceptical of some of the claims made by advocates of micro-targeting. He agrees that it helps voter identification. “As a short cut way of identifying your supporters it is unassailable.” Yet he doubts some of the statistical inferences drawn from the data about partisanship, saying the evidence is more anecdotal than analytical.

Adrian Gray, director of strategy at the RNC, acknowledges the distinction, but says their advantage comes from having “the better message than our opponent, knowing where we send it, how many times we send it and through which medium it is sent”.

Yet in an election where macro issues such as Iraq dominate, it is hard to weigh the importance of mechanical techniques over the daily pounding from the news. “The difference between politics and the commercial marketplace is we have one day to measure success,” says Mr Gray.

GOP Redirects Funds From Faltering Races (WP)

By Dan Balz And Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

Faced with a deteriorating political climate, Republican Party officials are hoping to keep control of the House and Senate with a strategy aimed at shoring up enough endangered incumbents to preserve their majorities, while scaling back planned spending on races that now appear unwinnable.

In recent days, the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) has given back television time it had reserved in Democratic-held districts in West Virginia, South Carolina and Ohio -- apparently concluding that those races are beyond reach unless something dramatic changes the national political environment in the 25 days before the Nov. 7 election.

The Republican National Committee, which is using its substantial resources to supplement the party's Senate campaign committee, has spent virtually all of its television money in just three states -- Ohio, Missouri and Tennessee -- hoping to build a levee strong enough to save those seats and the Senate majority.

But recent events, among them the problems facing Republican Sens. George Allen in Virginia and Mike DeWine in Ohio, make that task even more difficult, GOP strategists privately concede.

Democrats, meanwhile, are juggling pleas for financial assistance from candidates in House districts once considered second-tier opportunities. The Democrats have ordered up polls in a dozen or more of these long-shot districts and now face a critical choice: whether to place bets on a few of these districts in the hope of expanding the field of competitive seats, or concentrate advertising dollars as planned on the roughly 20 to 25 districts where the odds appear most favorable.

Linda Stender has been pressing party officials to pour money into her uphill race against Rep. Mike Ferguson in New Jersey's 7th District, touting a new poll that shows her within striking distance. So far, those officials are balking.

"The challenge right now is for the DCCC to assess all the information as it is coming that show which races are competitive," Stender said. "If anything, what is toughest is there are so many seats that are competitive now."

Bill Burton, spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC), said the party will look carefully before jumping in. "We're going to be polling, and we're going to look at the political dynamics and the strength of candidacies," he said. "No decisions have been made at this point."

Democrats need to gain 15 seats next month to recapture the House. Strategists believe the goal is now attainable, because of high disapproval ratings for both the Republican-controlled Congress and for President Bush, as well as public dissatisfaction over Iraq and the fallout from the Mark Foley page scandal.

Some top Republicans privately talk about losing a minimum of 12 seats, leaving them with a barely workable majority, and as many as 25 or 30 seats. Democratic strategists see the range of potential pickups in almost identical terms.

The two House campaign committees are pouring most of their money into independent expenditure ads -- most of them negative -- on behalf of their candidates. As of early this week, Democrats had spent or reserved about $49 million in advertising time; the Republicans had spent or reserved $56 million to $60 million. In some races, there may be no more television time to buy.

A summary of advertising dollars spent to date by the candidates, the national party committees and major outside groups, produced by a media firm called TNSMI/CMAG and obtained by The Washington Post, shows that the bulk of television money has gone into 35 House districts.

DOJ_NMG_0080466

Among those where spending is heaviest are three races in Indiana, where Republican incumbents are running scared. More than $4 million had been spent there as of the beginning of the week. Other races where money has flowed freely include two districts in Connecticut -- another state where Republicans are on the defensive -- and districts in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Kentucky, New Mexico, New York and Virginia.

"We're seeing relatively safe House districts with candidates up on the air five weeks out," said Evan Tracey, chief operating officer of TNSMI/CMAG. "They would have been on two to three weeks out at the earliest in past elections. . . . No one is safe."

The two committees are closely tracking spending patterns, and at this point in the campaign there is a certain amount of gamesmanship in their public explanations of what the other side is up to.

Democrats noted gleefully that Republicans had spent money on a poll in Indiana's 3rd District, where incumbent Rep. Mark Edward Souder (R) won reelection with 69 percent of the vote in 2004 and Bush carried with 68 percent of the vote. Souder has not been on anyone's endangered list.

NRCC spokesman Carl Forti said the committee polled the district out of precaution because Souder's opponent had invested several hundred thousand dollars in advertising. Forti said the poll showed Souder in no danger.

NRCC officials noted that Democrats scaled back ad buys in Phoenix and Denver and said that meant the opposition is giving up on two House incumbents. Not so, say Democrats, who say the Republicans are misreading their movements.

This jousting will continue into the final days, but what is clear at this point is that Democrats are playing very little defense in the House and the Senate. They are spending money on a small number of seats held by Democrats, most notably Rep. Leonard L. Boswell in Iowa and Melissa L. Bean in Illinois. In the Senate, Democrats worry most about Robert Menendez of New Jersey, whose seat they can ill afford to lose.

Even Republicans in districts dominated by conservative voters are picking up high levels of unease. Colorado's 5th District, for instance, has never elected a Democrat since it was created 34 years ago. But retiring Rep. Joel Hefley (R) has refused to endorse the party's nominee, Doug Lamborn, charging him with having run a "sleazy" campaign, and a new poll by the Denver Post found him tied with Democrat Jay Fawcett with a quarter of the electorate undecided.

Republican officials said the race is not that close but acknowledged that the political environment is more difficult than expected. "Everyone in the country is seeing some disenchantment with Republicans," said Lamborn campaign manager Jon Hotaling.

The DCCC sent word to Fawcett on Wednesday that they will now invest modestly in his race. "It has been a pointed discussion all along about whether we were reading things right out here," Fawcett said. "We thought something was going on. Slowly but surely we have banged away at it, and finally Washington is noticing."

Republicans seem more concerned about one of their Colorado incumbents, Rep. Marilyn Musgrave, who appears potentially vulnerable. She required a last-minute lift from GOP officials in Washington in 2004. The NRCC is coming to her aid again against state Rep. Angie Paccione; Democrats this week scaled back plans for advertising in the district, suggesting that Musgrave's standing might be improving.

Republicans are also increasingly nervous about the seat held by Rep. David G. Reichert (R-Wash.). Darcy Burner, a former Microsoft executive, has pounded Reichert for voting with the GOP majority in Washington, hoping to capitalize on widespread frustration there. In a sign of nervousness, the NRCC recently increased its spending on television ads in the district.

Burner wants help from the DCCC. "Anytime you spend millions of dollars communicating with voters, it is going to have an impact," Burner said.

But some races require more money than others to have the same impact. In New Jersey, Stender might fall victim to the cost-benefit analysis of betting on House seats in the very expensive New York media market. With limited funds, the DCCC is likely to roll the dice on seats where television ads are cheap.

Rove Makes Good On $5 Million Pledge (AP-Y)

By David Espo

AP-Yahoo, October 13, 2006

Call it a political challenge grant — you raise $5 million, and a big benefactor will kick in another $5 million.

That's the pledge that White House political strategist Karl Rove made this summer to Rep. Tom Reynolds, the head of the House Republican campaign committee, according to several officials. The arrangement was deemed so sensitive that no public announcement was made.

Under the plan, House Republicans agreed to increase the target for their so-called "Battleground" program, in which incumbent GOP lawmakers are prodded to donate or raise money for use in races other than their own. This year's program is run by Rep. Eric Cantor (news, bio, voting record), R-Va., and the money goes to the National Republican Congressional Committee, which pays for television commercials, political mailings and other activities in the country's most competitive races.

Originally, Cantor was given a goal of $17.5 million, and met it.

The target was then raised to $22.5 million as part of an understanding that Rove would kick in $5 million on top of it, according to officials familiar with the details. The program has generated roughly $21 million in pledges so far.

The officials who described the arrangement did so on condition of anonymity, saying they were not authorized to discuss it publicly.

One official said the pledge money was to come from funds remaining after President Bush's 2004 re-election campaign, but a spokeswoman at the Republican National Committee said that was not true.

"The Bush-Cheney campaign has not made any contributions to the NRCC and has no plans to do so," said Tracey Schmitt.

Through a spokesman, Cantor issued a statement that said, "We are pleased to announce that today we have broken the battleground records for amount raised."

It was not known whether a similar arrangement exists between Rove and Senate Republicans, who lagged well behind Democrats in campaign cash heading into the final weeks of the campaign.

When Rep. Brian Bilbray won a special election last summer in place of a jailed former lawmaker, Randy (Duke) Cunningham, relieved Republicans said it was a sign that Democrats had been hyping their prospects for the fall.

Now it looks like the GOP is getting nervous again.

The party's campaign committee, which focuses its efforts on races that are competitive or may become so, recently commissioned a poll of the San Diego-area district and spent money for mass mailings. Bilbray's opponent on Nov. 7 is Francine Busby, the woman he defeated in June.

Republicans also show signs of concern over several other districts that have not generally been on either party's lists of competitive seats.

Among the lawmakers are Reps. Jean Schmidt of Ohio, Mark Souder of Indiana and John Sweeney of New York. The national Democrats are advertising in the Sweeney race, and Republicans customarily would follow suit in such a situation.

Democrats are showing unease about one of their own, Rep. Darlene Hooley (news, bio, voting record) of Oregon.

The party's campaign committee recently pitched in for an ad that accuses her opponent, Mike Erickson, of lying about her record "in a time of war." Republicans, too, are giving the race a late look. They recently paid for a poll in the district.

Democrats must gain 15 seats to win a House majority on Nov. 7

Florida Democrat Tim Mahoney is the equivalent of a politician who was hit by lightning. Two weeks ago, he was running a hopeless race. Then his opponent, Rep. Mark Foley (news, bio, voting record), quit over sexually explicit computer messages he sent to teenage male pages.

Now Mahoney has an ad running that seems like a who's who of the ethically challenged among Republicans. "Congress is a mess. Corruption. Waste. Incompetence," intones the narrator as the images of Tom DeLay, Bob Ney and Jack Abramoff scroll across the screen.

DeLay is the former majority leader who quit Congress and faces allegations of violating campaign finance laws in Texas. Ney, still in Congress, recently signed a plea agreement confessing crimes of corruption. Abramoff is the former Republican lobbyist whose plea bargain last January triggered a corruption scandal that has yet to subside.

Will The Levee Break? (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

The conventional wisdom says that the Democrats will take control of the House of Representatives next month, but only by a small margin. I've been looking at the numbers, however, and I believe this conventional wisdom is almost all wrong.

Here's what's happening: a huge Democratic storm surge is heading toward a high Republican levee. It's still possible that the surge won't overtop the levee — that is, the Democrats could fail by a small margin to take control of Congress. But if the surge does go over the top, the flooding will almost surely reach well inland — that is, if the Democrats win, they'll probably win big.

Let's talk about Congressional arithmetic.

Unless the Bush administration is keeping Osama bin Laden in a freezer somewhere, a majority of Americans will vote Democratic this year. If Congressional seats were allocated in proportion to popular votes, a Democratic House would be a done deal. But they aren't, and the way our electoral system works, combined with the way ethnic groups are distributed, still gives the Republicans some hope of holding on.

The key point is that African-Americans, who overwhelmingly vote Democratic, are highly concentrated in a few districts. This means that in close elections many Democratic votes are, as political analysts say, wasted — they simply add to huge majorities in a small number of districts, while the more widely spread Republican vote allows the G.O.P. to win by narrower margins in a larger number of districts.

My back-of-the-envelope calculations suggest that because of this "geographic gerrymander," even a substantial turnaround in total Congressional votes — say, from the three-percentage-point Republican lead in 2004 to a five-point Democratic lead this year — would leave the House narrowly in Republican hands. It looks as if the Democrats need as much as a seven-point lead in the overall vote to take control.

No wonder, then, that until a few months ago many political analysts argued that the Republicans would control the House for the foreseeable future, because only a perfect political storm could overcome the G.O.P. structural advantage.

But what's that howling sound? Every poll taken this month shows the Democrats with a double-digit lead in the generic ballot question, in which voters are asked which party they support in this election. The median Democratic lead is 14 points.

And here's the thing: because there are many districts that the G.O.P. carried by only moderately large margins in recent elections, a large Democratic surge — one only a bit bigger than that needed to take the House at all — would sweep away many Republicans holding seats normally considered safe. If the actual vote is anything like what the polls now suggest, we're talking about the Democrats holding a larger majority in the House than the Republicans have held at any point since their 1994 takeover.

So if the Democrats win, they'll probably have a substantial majority. Whether they'll be able to keep that majority is another question. But be prepared to wake up less than four weeks from now and learn that everything you've been told about American politics — liberalism is dead, whoever controls the South controls Washington, only Republicans know "the way to win" — is wrong. (Are we seeing the birth of a new New Deal coalition, in which the solid Northeast takes the place of the solid South?)

The storm may yet weaken. The Iowa Electronic Markets, in which people bet real money on election outcomes, still give Republicans a roughly 40 percent chance of keeping control of both houses of Congress. If that happens, will it mean that Republican control is permanent after all?

No. Bear in mind that the G.O.P. isn't in trouble because of a string of bad luck. The problems that have caused Americans to turn on the party, from the disaster in Iraq to the botched response to Katrina, from the failed attempt to privatize Social Security to the sudden realization by many voters that the self-proclaimed champions of moral values are hypocrites, are deeply rooted in the whole nature of Republican governance. So even if this surge doesn't overtop the levee, there will be another surge soon.

But the best guess is that the permanent Republican majority will end in a little over three weeks.

'The Empire State Strikes Back' (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

NEW YORK -- What is happening to the Republican Party in New York state is the national GOP's nightmare. The once-thriving political organization of Nelson Rockefeller, Al D'Amato and George Pataki is a shambles.

And the way the Republican coalition has broken up should have national Republicans scurrying for a new game plan.

For many Americans, "New York" evokes the liberal salons of Manhattan. But Manhattan is a small piece of the Empire State. Political change has been driven by the populous suburbs of Long Island and Westchester and Rockland counties, and by the vast stretches of Upstate New York that are far closer in spirit to the Midwest than to the Upper West Side or the Silk Stocking District.

The Republican collapse here has been driven by two streams of defectors: suburban moderates and Upstaters.

As a result, the entire Democratic ticket, led by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Eliot Spitzer, the party's candidate for governor, is expected by just about everyone to sweep the state. As many as five Upstate Republican congressional seats -- they would constitute a third of the 15 seats that Democrats need to win the House -- are in jeopardy.

"It's 'The Empire State Strikes Back,' " says Democrat Dan Maffei, a former congressional aide who is running a surprisingly strong race against Rep. Jim Walsh, the Republican incumbent, in a district that stretches from Syracuse to the Rochester area.

Maffei sees the immediate trend toward Democrats powered by frustration with President Bush and the Iraq war. But it is also rooted in long-term factors: the economic troubles of many Upstate communities, the area's "libertarian" leanings on cultural issues and the homelessness felt by many moderate Republicans in the face of a national party increasingly dominated by conservatives.

"Bush Republicanism," Maffei says, "is not for them."

D'Amato, the voluble Republican who served 18 years in the U.S. Senate until he was defeated in 1998 by Charles Schumer, sees demographic change -- the increasing number of Hispanic and African American voters -- as augmenting the Democrats' advantage in party registration. Hispanics, of course, are also a growing part of the electorate in other key states, some of them traditionally Republican.

But he adds that "there is something broader than the Republicans falling on hard times, which they are." He notes that in New York, "after the tenure of a strong governor," the party that long held power often sees its organization fall apart. This happened to Republicans after Rockefeller's long run and to Democrats after Pataki defeated Mario Cuomo in 1994. With Pataki retiring, said Assemblyman Pete Grannis, a Manhattan Democrat, it's the Republicans' "time in the skillet."

State Sen. Kemp Hannon, a Long Island Republican who has spent nearly three decades in the legislature, also worries that the coalition of "Reagan Democrats" that D'Amato helped build -- "they were Irish, Italian and Polish Democrats and some Jews" -- is a thing of the past. "I believe that Bush has destroyed that whole thing," Hannon says. "It's not here any longer in the Northeast." And the parts of Upstate New York "not moving ahead economically whatsoever . . . feel it a great deal."

Adds D'Amato: "It's very similar to an Ohio kind of thing," meaning that vulnerable New York Republicans are in much the same spot as their endangered congressional colleagues in former industrial powerhouse regions to their west.

Bill de Blasio, who managed Hillary Clinton's 2000 Senate campaign and is now a New York City Council member from Brooklyn, sees the pincer movement against Republicans from the suburbs and Upstate as similar to what's happening in other parts of the country.

"The two trends are quite universal," de Blasio says. "There's a growing body of suburbanites who are increasingly concerned about the rightward drift of the Republican Party, and voters very worried about what's happening to real wages." Paul Tokasz, the retiring Democratic majority leader in the state Assembly -- he hails from Cheektowaga, just outside Buffalo -- says the same suburban movement away from the Republicans that is so visible in the New York City area is happening in metropolitan areas across the state.

D'Amato, normally a happy Republican warrior, is in a blue mood about November. "You have a foreign policy which is groping and a domestic [Mark] Foley scandal, so you have a lot of disaffected people, and I think it's going to result not only in the Democrats taking over the House, but also with substantial numbers."

As New York goes, so goes the nation?

In Key Races, Democrats Look At Rivals' Personal Lives (WP)

By Jim Vandehei

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

In the wake of the Mark Foley page scandal, Democrats are targeting the personal lives of Republicans in numerous key House races as part of a campaign to capitalize on voter disgust with the messy personal lives and alleged character defects among elected officials.

Although Democrats' internal polling shows that the Foley scandal is resonating deeply only in half a dozen races, party operatives are calculating that GOP candidates are now unusually vulnerable to personal attacks, several candidates and strategists said.

In New Jersey, Democratic candidate Linda Stender this week sent voters a two-page brochure accusing Rep. Mike Ferguson (R) of improperly preying on young women in a fashionable D.C. nightclub. Stender, who is shown by polls to be within striking distance of Ferguson, said the Foley affair "opened the door to talk about the ethical challenge of my opponent." Ferguson has denied the allegations, and a spokeswoman last night called the attacks "pathetic and desperate."

Democratic candidate Chris Carney is running an ad accusing Rep. Don Sherwood (R-Pa.) of "repeatedly choking" and "attempting to strangle" a young mistress. Foley and Sherwood share "the arrogance of power," said Carney. "They're willing to cover up these types of things to retain power."

Sherwood has apologized for the affair but said in a television ad that the "allegation of abuse was never true."

Democratic candidate Kirsten Gillibrand is calling on GOP Rep. John E. Sweeney in Upstate New York to explain a drunken driving arrest 30 years ago and a more recent car accident. "Your decision to release any and all records related to your arrests and other incidents with law enforcement will send an important signal about your willingness to come clean with voters," Gillibrand said in a letter to Sweeney this week.

DOJ_NMG_0080470

The Sweeney campaign has said that the details of both incidents are out in public and that the congressman has nothing to hide. The lawmaker fired back yesterday by calling on Gillibrand to release her tax records, suggesting that she has her own secrets.

"It is attack and distract," said Maureen Donovan, a spokeswoman for Sweeney.

All three races highlight a much broader Democratic campaign to politicize the Foley page scandal over the final four weeks of the campaign, Democratic candidates and strategists say.

Top Democratic officials believe "that anybody who had a personal vulnerability before this is totally [at risk] with the spotlight on scandal," said a Democratic aide familiar with the party's plan to take advantage of the Foley affair. "Frankly, it is a tough environment out there if you have a problem with the bottle or the zipper."

Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC), said the effectiveness of the charges "often depends on what the person is accused of having done and their reputation and standing in the community -- national climate has nothing to do with it."

Former Republican National Committee chairman Ed Gillespie said Democrats are dangerously close "to overreaching" in their attacks, risking a political backlash like the one that damaged Republicans after they pushed for the impeachment of President Bill Clinton over the Monica S. Lewinsky scandal in 1998. Democratic operatives said they are aware of this possibility but are calculating that, as long as the attacks are at the local level, they will not backfire.

Republicans and Democrats alike said personal attacks are especially potent in districts that were not as competitive before the public's renewed focus on controversy and alleged coverups. Both sides are reporting high voter interest in the unfolding revelations that Foley repeatedly preyed on young male pages while in Congress and that GOP leaders were aware of concerns about the lawmaker's behavior and allegedly did little to stop it.

So far, there is general agreement that about half a dozen GOP candidates are suffering as a direct result of the controversy. Topping that list are NRCC Chairman Thomas M. Reynolds (R-N.Y.), who was told of Foley's questionable behavior and said he reported it to his superiors, and Sherwood, whose former mistress, in a lawsuit, accused him of choking her.

Many Republicans also said it will be virtually impossible for the newly designated Republican candidate in Foley's district to win, because Foley's name remains on the ballot.

The most common Democratic attacks have been the sort used against Republicans such as Rep. Deborah Pryce (Ohio), a member of the House GOP leadership team who has said she knew nothing of the allegations against her friend and colleague Foley. Nonetheless, Democrats are criticizing her for not catching warning signs and for being part of a team that they say averted its gaze from Foley's problems.

A big part of the Democratic strategy in Pryce's district and elsewhere is to suppress turnout among Christian conservatives, a pillar of the GOP coalition.

But there have also been attempts to take advantage of the Foley episode to highlight corruption issues more broadly.

For the Ohio seat to be vacated by indicted Rep. Robert W. Ney (R), the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) is blanketing the district with mail saying GOP candidate Joy Padgett, a state senator, is too "dirty" to clean up Congress. "You can't clean up Congress if you are covered in mud," the mailings say, drawing links between Padgett and Ney. The DCCC is also running television ads questioning her personal business dealings. The offensive coincides with Ney's expected guilty plea on Friday in the money-for-favors scandal involving convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Top targets are Republican incumbents who have been bruised by the Abramoff scandal. In California, for instance, Democrats are assailing Rep. John T. Doolittle for supporting "forced abortions and sex slavery" in the Northern Mariana Islands, which were represented by Abramoff. Democrat Charlie Brown said the attack is fair because Doolittle has refused to return contributions from supporters of the government there.

In most cases, these attacks are akin to a "Hail Mary" football pass because the chances of success are so low. An example is in Nevada, where Democrats are trying to oust GOP Rep. Jon Porter from a seat that would be very hard to flip under normal circumstances. Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) -- facing his own controversy over a big profit on a land deal -- has twice raised questions about Porter's divorce. The Democratic candidate in that race, Tessa Hafen, is a former Reid aide.

Cheney Touts Ryun, Bush Record During Visit To Kansas (KCS)

By John Hanna

The Kansas City Star, October 13, 2006

TOPEKA, Kan. - Telling fellow Republicans that tax cuts and a vigorous war on terrorism are at stake in this year's election, Vice President Dick Cheney came here Thursday to help raise money and boost Rep. Jim Ryun's re-election campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0080471

Cheney touched on themes he has used in speeches in other states, suggesting that a Democratic-controlled Congress would allow tax cuts championed by President Bush to lapse and would adopt a "strategy of resignation and defeatism" abroad.

"In all the decisions that will come in the next two years, it's going to matter a great deal which party has the majority on the floor and the gavel in committee," Cheney said. "The stakes in this campaign are high."

Democrats argued Cheney's visit shows Republicans are worried that Ryun, who's seeking a sixth term representing Kansas' 2nd District, might lose to Democratic challenger Nancy Boyda.

Ryun's campaign said the event, held in the ballroom of Topeka's biggest conference center, raised $209,000, with nearly 300 contributors paying $100 each to attend the speech and an additional $1,000 to have their pictures taken with Cheney. Some arrived two hours early.

"I don't think there's any part of America that's better represented in Washington than the 2nd District of Kansas," Cheney said. "He's also one of the most thoroughly respected members in the House."

The vice president also mentioned GOP challenger Chuck Ahner in the 3rd District and Republican gubernatorial candidate Jim Barnett.

Cheney's visit comes as his fellow Republicans are worried about holding onto their House majority. Earlier this month, Cheney made fundraising appearances in Florida and Wyoming to help GOP incumbents in those states.

Boyda said Cheney's visit demonstrates how Ryun has "gone Washington."

"I personally think it's going to do him more harm than good,' Boyda said during an interview. "Jim Ryun's biggest mistake is that he thinks most Kansans are as disconnected as he is, and that's what is going to get him out of office."

But Mike Gaughan, the state Democratic Party's executive director, said Ryun "is depending on his Washington cronies to give his campaign a boost."

Ryun said such a suggestion is wrong because Cheney's visit has been planned since August.

"It gives us the opportunity to make sure our message is out there so people understand the clear choices that will take place on Nov. 7," Ryun said after the event.

For fellow Republicans, Cheney painted a stark picture of what Democratic victories would mean, listing liberals such as Massachusetts Sen. Ted Kennedy as leaders of committees. Ryun's only close race to date was his first one in 1996, and Kansas Republicans used a similar argument to prevent too many defections.

"It's almost like they're saying, 'We understand why you're thinking of voting against us, but the result is going to be worse than you can imagine,'" said Bob Beatty, a Washburn University political scientist. "It's almost an acknowledgment that, 'Things haven't been going as well under our party as we'd hoped.'"

Kansas always has been friendlier-than-average territory for Bush. Two years ago, he captured 62 percent of the Sunflower State's vote in winning re-election.

Earlier this year, Ryun seemed likely to win re-election without much trouble in the 2nd District, which covers the eastern third of the state, except for the state's portion of the Kansas City metropolitan area.

The district leans GOP, and Ryun still enjoys a reservoir of admiration from his days as an Olympic runner. Also, Boyda captured only 41 percent of the vote in 2004, even with major help from the national Democratic Party.

But Boyda has said her internal polling shows the race is close, and even some Republicans acknowledge her pitch - exemplified by her "Had enough?" slogan - appears to be resonating with voters upset with Congress.

However, Cheney warned his audience that if Democrats controlled Congress, families would pay higher taxes.

"The marriage penalty will be back. The death tax will come back to life," Cheney said. "The child credit will also drop down from $1,000 to $500 per child."

Boyda called such statements "hollow rhetoric."

"Democrats would not only keep, they would expand middle class tax cuts. They would expand tax relief for independent and small businesses," she said. "The Bush tax cuts for the wealthy have to be repealed."

Cheney also said the United States is safer, adding that Bush warned Americans that the fight against terrorism would require patience and determination. He noted Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman's loss in his Democratic primary this year and suggested leaders such as Chairman Howard Dean are trying to purge the party.

"What these Democrats are pushing now is the very kind of retreat that has been tried and has failed in the past," Cheney said. "It would be reckless and inconsistent with our values. It would betray our friends and only heighten the danger to the United States."

Boyda said she hopes nonpartisan recommendations for ending the war in Iraq will come from former Secretary of State James A. Baker III.

"With the military stretched thin, the American people are not feeling safer," Boyda said. "This administration and Jim Ryun need some adult supervision."

GOP Focuses On Taxes Again (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, October 13, 2006

President Bush and Republican Senate and House candidates are talking more about taxes in speeches, debates and TV spots after polls showed it is the Republican Party's best issue in a tough midterm election season.

"One of the most important issues on the ballot this November is taxes," Mr. Bush said this week in stumping in Georgia for former Rep. Mac Collins, seeking to unseat Rep. Jim Marshall, the incumbent Democrat. "There is a fundamental difference between the Republican and Democratic parties on this important issue."

After being off the campaign radar for months, the tax issue is now turning up in races from Virginia to Minnesota, with a little recent help from Democrats.

Republicans grinned from ear to ear last month when the ranking Democrat on the House Ways and Means Committee, New York Rep. Charles B. Rangel, just about guaranteed tax increases if his party takes over the House after Nov. 7. Asked whether Democrats would consider raising taxes across the whole spectrum of income, Mr. Rangel said, "No question about it."

Some Republicans say Mr. Rangel and his party will soon regret those words.

"Republican tax cuts have removed lots of low-income Americans from the tax rolls, so is Charlie Rangel telling those low-income folks if he and the Democrats take over, they'll put those folks back on the tax rolls?" said American Conservative Union Chairman David A. Keene. "So is he saying his supposed constituency will get to pay taxes again?"

Republican candidates are now asking the same question:

·In a new TV spot, Republican Sen. George Allen, facing an unexpectedly difficult re-election bid in Virginia, says his Democratic challenger, James H. Webb Jr., a former secretary of the Navy, will "bring back the death tax, the marriage penalty tax and cut your child tax credit from $1,000 to $500."

·In Iowa, state Senate President Jeff Lamberti, the Republican seeking to unseat Democratic Rep. Leonard L. Boswell, has hit the incumbent hard with the "new" weapon, saying the five-term congressman supports higher taxes.

·In Minnesota, Rep. Mark Kennedy -- a Republican running for the seat being vacated by retiring Democratic Sen. Mark Dayton -- in a debate this week accused his Democratic opponent, Amy Klobuchar, of supporting "job-killing" tax increases and said that Republicans "helped create 6 million new jobs ... because of the tax relief we passed."

The Democrats are countering with their traditional argument that only the rich benefit from Republicans' tax-cutting policies.

"I don't think taxes are working any better than the war on terror for Republicans, unless you are talking to people in the top 1 percent of income," said Karen Finney, spokeswoman for Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean. "The vast majority of Americans know the Bush economy isn't working for them, so in talking about the economy, most voters are concerned about jobs, wages and rising costs."

Since Mr. Rangel's pledge last month that Democrats would consider across-the-board tax increases, the New York Democrat -- who would become chairman of the key tax-writing committee if Democrats win a House majority on Election Day -- has hedged, shifting his emphasis to making the rich pay more taxes.

Mr. Rangel's remarks, however, have helped focus attention on taxes -- long a signature issue for the Republican Party, but one that Republican pollsters say wasn't polling well until recently.

The comeback of the tax issue is timely for Republicans, who have found their advantage slipping on other key issues. Newsweek magazine reported earlier this month that for the first time since 2001 its poll "shows that more Americans trust the Democrats than the GOP on moral values and the war on terror."

In several competitive congressional races, Republican campaigns have shifted away from a strong emphasis on national security and have begun hammering Democrats as the party of higher taxes -- as Mr. Bush did this week in Georgia.

"Next month, our nation has to make a choice: Do we keep taxes low so you can keep our economy growing? Or do we let the Democrats in Washington raise taxes and hurt the growth of the economy?" the president said while campaigning for Mr. Collins.

"The decision you make in the voting booth will have a direct impact on your bottom line," Mr. Bush told Georgia Republicans.

Republicans say the threat of Democrats taking over Congress has helped boost the issue.

"The tax issue wasn't working for us before because the economy was good, Bush and the Republican Congress had already slashed taxes, and people were focused on other things," Mr. Keene said. "Now, with only weeks before the election, people are being told this election is not about putting money in their pockets through tax cuts but about Democrats taking money out of people's pockets by raising taxes if they get to run the show."

DOJ_NMG_0080473

Making taxes a personal issue is the key, one senior Republican adviser said.

"Candidates using the issue successfully are personalizing it, saying for example that there are 42 million middle-class families with children, and if Bush tax cuts are allowed to expire or are repealed, each such taxpayer stands to lose 2,000 bucks out of his pocket," he said.

In New Orleans, Cheney Collects Campaign Cash, Praises Levee Work (AP)

The Associated Press, October 13, 2006

NEW ORLEANS (AP) — During his first trip to this city in more than a year, Vice President Dick Cheney attended a Republican fundraiser after getting briefed on efforts to protect New Orleans from future floods.

Cheney's stopover in New Orleans was also criticized by Democrats, who released a news release questioning the vice president's decision to not spend time in areas flooded by Katrina.

Cheney was shuttled into New Orleans in a motorcade and met privately with Donald Powell, the administration's recovery czar for the battered Gulf Coast, U.S. Sen. David Vitter, R-Metairie, and Brig. Gen. Robert Crear, commander of the Mississippi Valley division of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers.

Cheney briefly spoke to reporters after the closed-door meeting. He took no questions.

The vice president acknowledged that there are still some unfilled gaps in flood protection system, but he said overall he was "tremendously impressed."

"We've got a lot of work to do yet, but it looks like the levees are back to pre-Katrina levels, and in some cases, better than that," Cheney said. "Clearly, that's one of the most important parts of recovery process, which is altogether fitting given that this was the worst natural disaster in American history."

In the late afternoon, Cheney headlined a Republican National Committee fundraiser at the World Trade Center. The RNC said the event was expected to raise $180,000 in campaign cash.

The Democratic National Committee issued a news release calling Cheney's meeting with officials window-dressing for the fundraising junket.

Powell, speaking on Cheney's behalf, called that charge "unfortunate."

"I think he spent his time very wisely" focusing on flood control and economic issues," he said.

Earlier Thursday, Cheney visited Topeka, Kan., to help raise money and boost Rep. Jim Ryun's re-election campaign.

Cheney touched on themes he has used in speeches in other states, suggesting that a Democratic-controlled Congress would allow tax cuts championed by President Bush to lapse and would adopt a "strategy of resignation and defeatism" abroad.

Democrats argued that Cheney's visit shows Republicans are worried about Ryun, who's seeking a sixth term representing Kansas' 2nd District, losing to Democratic challenger Nancy Boyda.

Ryun's campaign said the event, held in the ballroom of Topeka's biggest conference center, raised $209,000, with nearly 300 contributors paying $100 each to attend the speech and an additional $1,000 to have their pictures taken with Cheney. They munched on snacks and drank iced tea, some arriving two hours early.

"I don't think there's any part of America that's better represented in Washington than the 2nd District of Kansas," Cheney said.

The vice president also mentioned GOP challenger Chuck Ahner in the 3rd District and Republican gubernatorial candidate Jim Barnett.

Cheney's visit comes as his fellow Republicans are worried about holding onto its House majority. Earlier this month, Cheney made fundraising appearances in Florida and Wyoming to help GOP incumbents in those states.

Earlier this year, Ryun seemed likely to win re-election without much trouble in the 2nd District. But Boyda has said her internal polling shows the race is close.

Laura Bush Lends A Hand To Sen. Talent (STL)

By Jo Mannies

STLToday.com (St. Louis), October 13, 2006

Besides planting a tree in Forest Park and flipping a pink light on at the Arch, Laura Bush also had a political role to fill while in town Thursday.

Her task: to help energize the region's Republican base about U.S. Sen. Jim Talent's bid for re-election Nov. 7.

She had plenty of help. Also in the region Thursday was her husband, President George W. Bush, and Republican National Committee chairman Ken Mehlman.

Although many of their events were nonpolitical, the appearance of all three in the same state on the same day is a rare occurrence that underscored Missouri's political importance this fall, said David Robertson, a political science professor at the University of Missouri at St. Louis. "Missouri has become a 'firewall' state for Republicans as they do everything they can to avoid losing the U.S. Senate," Robertson said.

DOJ_NMG_0080474

A loss of six Senate seats nationwide would put the Democrats in control. And at the moment, more than that number around the country are considered in play in next month's elections. They include Talent's neck-and-neck contest with his Democratic rival, state Auditor Claire McCaskill.

Mehlman called "firewall" too strong of a term to describe Missouri's significance to the GOP. "Missouri is important to both parties," said Mehlman in a telephone interview from Union, Mo., where he headlined the last of five get-out-the-vote events Thursday for Republican activists.

Laura Bush was the chief attraction Thursday afternoon at a fundraising event for Talent in west St. Louis County that collected $300,000 for his campaign. "She is a very gracious lady," Talent said afterwards, as he told reporters how much he appreciated her campaign help.

Talent joined Bush at her two nonpolitical events open to the press.

Her first stop Thursday afternoon was at Forest Park, where she led a ceremonial planting of the first of 50 million trees that the Enterprise Rent-A-Car Foundation has promised to national forests.

Among those joining her at the World's Fair Pavilion was Andrew Taylor, chairman of Enterprise Rent-A-Car. Bush, Taylor and others donned garden gloves to plant four white pine seedlings in a shiny galvanized washtub. The seedlings are destined for permanent soil elsewhere.

"Trees are essential to our lives and our planet," Bush said. "They eliminate harmful carbon dioxide and create the oxygen we breathe."

The foundation promised to underwrite the planting of the trees through a pledge of $50 million over the next 50 years to the National Arbor Day Foundation.

The event at the Arch grounds promoted the importance of breast cancer treatment and research by bathing the monument in pink. It was the third year in a row for the ceremony, which marks Breast Cancer Awareness Month. Talent persuaded Congress in 2004 to pass a law allowing the illumination. The event was sponsored by Federated Department Stores Inc., which owns Macy's.

For Talent and Bush, the Arch-lighting event had personal significance. The senator's mother died of breast cancer; Bush's mother is a breast-cancer survivor.

"I urge everyone here to live their life to the fullest," she said.

Talk About Your Wildest Dreams

DMX gave his now-infamous interview to Sister 2 Sister magazine with his wife, Tashera, sitting by his side. Bet he'll bring his lawyer next time.

A Maryland woman whose child was fathered by the rapper sued him yesterday in Prince George's County Circuit Court for his claim in the interview that she had "raped" him in his sleep. Monique Wayne , 25, is seeking $6 million for defamation, false statements and "unreasonable publicity" to her private life, according to a copy of the suit provided by her lawyers.

"Miss Wayne's been completely ostracized," said attorney Stephanie Moran . "She's had to answer questions from friends and family members. You have reporters as far away as Ireland commenting on this." A rep for the 35-year-old rapper (born Earl Simmons) said last night that he would have to confer with lawyers before commenting.

DMX did not cite Wayne by name in his Q&A with Jamie Foster Brown , but Wayne's 2004 paternity suit -- which Moran said resulted in a $5,000-a-month support agreement -- had been widely reported. Wayne's suit alleges that the conception of her son, now 2, was hardly the passed-out one-night stand DMX described. She says they met in August 2003 at D.C.'s Dream (now Love) nightclub, then spent the night at Hotel Helix, followed by a day together shopping, playing pool and eating crabs at Hains Point. She claims DMX went on to invite her to parties and concerts as recently as this past summer.

"Then DMX turns around and accuses her of being a rapist," said Moran. "That's a serious allegation."

Bucks for Barbra: The Deal Is On

Barbra Streisand ' s reps were taken aback last week when we told them about the offer her concert tour promoter had made to well-heeled fans -- a personal meeting with the diva in exchange for a $50,000 contribution to her charitable foundation. First they insisted the e-mailed offer had to be a hoax -- "not her style," said one -- then expressed pique that no one had cleared the idea with Babs.

DOJ_NMG_0080475

But as Streisand heads to D.C., all is apparently forgiven. A rep for promoter Michael Cohl said that the plan is fully on track, and that the first meeting package has been sold in conjunction with tonight's Verizon Center show. But no, they wouldn't identify the generous fan who thinks a chat with Barbra is worth the cost of a new Benz. Any clue? mailto:reliablesource@%20washpost.com .

UPDATE

· Jennifer Aniston , who never acknowledged she was dating Vince Vaughn , now says they haven't broken up, reports People. While taping the Oprah Winfrey show Wednesday, Aniston confirmed that the two are "still on" but not engaged. How can they not break up if they're not dating? Just asking.

· It's official: Madonna and husband Guy Ritchie filed adoption papers for a 1-year-old boy in Malawi yesterday and got interim approval by a local judge, which allows them to take the child out of the country. "Madonna promised me that as the child grows she will bring him back to visit," the boy's father told the Associated Press.

St. Louis Arch Lights Up Pretty in Pink

Laura Bush was in St. Louis last night to see the city's landmark 630-foot arch lit up in pink for Breast Cancer Awareness Month -- the brainchild of cosmetics executive Evelyn Lauder, who also invented the pink-ribbon symbol. The National Park Service originally turned down the request two years ago, so Sen. Jim Talent (R-Mo.) successfully pushed legislation making an annual exception. Lauder attended the first lighting last year but missed this year's ceremony -- she's in Washington today, where top businesswomen will honor her philanthropic work for breast cancer research.

HEY, ISN'T THAT . . . ?

When Terror Strikes, Liberals And The Right Vote Further Apart (WSJ)

By Sharon Begley

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

On the weekend before Election Day 2004, al-Jazeera broadcast a videotape in which Osama bin Laden, addressing the U.S., boasted about the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and tore into the Bush administration. Four days later, the president won re-election.

Three days before the March 2004 elections in Spain, terrorists bombed commuter trains, killing 191 people. The ruling party, which had strongly supported the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, went down to defeat.

Two cases in which terrorism was front and center in voters' minds. Two different outcomes. In Spain, the attack sparked a growing fury at incumbents for not keeping them safe. In the U.S., voters in greater number embraced candidates they perceived as stronger on national security.

A growing number of studies offer clues as to how terrorism and other deadly events affect people's voting decisions. The latest research shows that because such violent political acts are brutal reminders of death, they make conservatives, but not liberals, more hostile toward those perceived as different, and more supportive of extreme military policies, according to a study in April in Personality and Social Psychology Bulletin.

For 20 years, researchers have been exploring how people manage the fear engendered by intimations of mortality. Reminded of the inevitability of their own death (which happens to a lesser degree by merely walking past a funeral parlor), people try to quench or at least manage the resulting "existential terror" in several ways. They become more certain of their worldview or faith. They conform more closely to the norms of their society. They show greater reverence for symbols of their society, such as flags and crucifixes.

All of these make people feel more secure and, crucially, a part of something larger -- something that will outlive them.

Building up your own worldview requires disparaging (even unconsciously) that of others. If beliefs that contradict yours have any worth, then by definition they call into question the absolute validity of your own. The result is stronger feelings of hostility toward those with different values and beliefs.

This "worldview defense," says psychology researcher Sheldon Solomon of Skidmore College, "reduces the terror that reminders of your own death bring." These results have been replicated in some 300 lab experiments, including in cultures with very different ideas about an afterlife.

Which brings us back to the effect on voters of a terrorist attack and its brutal reminders of mortality. Although some voters would feel betrayed by incumbents who failed to protect them, researchers say, these days that trend would more likely be swamped by a surge toward candidates perceived as hawks on national security.

"We feel that unconscious thoughts about death do influence people's voting decisions, especially for folks who are not strongly committed to a candidate," says Prof. Solomon, expressing a consensus of those who have studied terrorism and voting behavior.

The link between thoughts of death and actual behavior shows up not only in labs but in the real world, too. After 9/11, Americans sprouted flag lapel pins. Patriotism and approval of the president soared. Tolerance for dissent plummeted. ("All Americans...need to watch what they say," warned a White House spokesman.)

Even what seem to be exceptions support the rule that reminders of death cause people to hunker down in their own worldview. New Yorkers living or working near Ground Zero are regularly reminded of death, yet tend to be liberal, opposed to the Iraq war and critical of President Bush. Why don't intimations of mortality push them toward nationalistic fervor?

"Reminders of death do make New Yorkers cling to their worldview more strongly," says psychology researcher Tom Pyszczynski of the University of Colorado, Colorado Springs. "If that worldview has to do with tolerance and peace and prosocial beliefs, then those positions strengthen."

Prof. Solomon and Prof. Pyszczynski and colleagues explain this conservative/liberal divide in the Bulletin study by suggesting that extreme militarism violates liberals' core beliefs. Since thoughts of death make people more committed to their worldview, hawks, but not doves, would increase their support for military action in the wake of a terrorist attack.

"A worldview that has your nation engaged in a heroic battle against evil seems to be especially effective at soothing fears of your own death," says Prof. Solomon. "That makes leaders who talk about fighting a righteous battle more appealing."

Needless to say, voters weigh many factors before they pull the lever. The bin Laden tape did not produce a Bush landslide, so horrific reminders of death just before Election Day have only so much power.

"Not every vote in 2004 was based on thoughts of death, but these reminders can make a big difference," says Prof. Solomon. "There is nothing like a terrorist attack to bring thoughts of your own death to the fore. My gut tells me there would be a significant movement toward candidates who describe the U.S. as engaged in a righteous fight against an evil worldview."

Clinton Says Right Wing Has Hurt U.S., Predicts Win By Democrats (LVS)

By Kathleen Hennessey

Las Vegas Sun, October 13, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) - The nation has been "jammed into an ideological corner" by conservative Republicans and is primed for a power shift in the November elections, former President Bill Clinton said Thursday.

"This is an election unlike any other I have ever participated in," Clinton told Democratic supporters at a fundraiser in Las Vegas. "For six years this country has been totally dominated - not by the Republican Party, this is not fair to the Republican Party - by a narrow sliver of the Republican Party, its more right-wing and its most ideological element."

"When the chips are down, this country has been jammed to the right, jammed into an ideological corner, alienated from its allies, and we're in a lot of trouble," he said.

Clinton addressed a group of about 50 top-level donors to the Jack Carter for Senate campaign. Carter, the son of former President Jimmy Carter, is running to unseat Republican Sen. John Ensign.

Clinton also attended a fundraiser for Democratic congressional candidates Jill Derby and Tessa Hafen at which the minimum contribution was $3,000.

He appeared onstage with Hafen, Derby, Carter and Rep. Shelley Berkley, D-Nev., but did not take questions from the media or comment on recent criticism of his administration's policy on nuclear nonproliferation in North Korea.

The former president largely stuck to politics.

"The Democratic Party has become the liberal and conservative party in America. If you want to be fiscally conservative, you've got to be for us. If you want to conserve natural resources, you've got to be for us," he said. "If you want a change of course in Iraq ... you've got to be for us."

Clinton also attacked Republican tax cuts, describing a repeal of the estate tax as the GOP's top legislative priority.

"They may think I should be able to give Chelsea every nickel, but I don't," Clinton said.

Tucker Bounds, spokesman for the Republican National Committee, returned the criticism.

"It's going to take more than a Bill Clinton stopover to change the minds of the majority of Nevadans," he said.

"Republicans have solid candidates on the ballot that are going to keep taxes low and continue to fight terrorism," Bounds said. He said the party had not fallen out of step with voters.

DOJ_NMG_0080477

"Keeping taxes low and the economy healthy is not a fringe belief. It is a popular belief in Nevada and a popular belief in most every other state."

Clinton did not mention Rep. Jon Porter, Hafen's opponent, or Nevada Secretary of State Dean Heller, Derby's opponent, by name. He dismissed Ensign as "a sort of a likable fellow" with "good relations with most of the powers-that-be here in the state," perhaps a reference to Ensign's working relationship with Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

Clinton, who recently made fundraising stops for Democrats in Minnesota and New Jersey, also said he was embarrassed by the recent immigration debate.

He noted that Mexico had become one of the U.S.'s top 10 creditors.

"These people are our bankers," Clinton said. "Doesn't it embarrass you that these poor people are trying to sneak over the Rio Grande River to find a living in this country and we want to stop that? But we're only too happy to turn around and say, 'Don't spend your own money on those poor illegal immigrants to give them an education and get a job in Mexico. Loan it to us.'"

Santorum, Casey Clash In Debate (CCT)

By Jennifer C. Yates And Kimberly Hefling

The Contra Costa Times, October 13, 2006

PITTSBURGH - Sen. Rick Santorum and Democrat Bob Casey bickered about everything from Santorum's residency to immigration in a contentious debate Thursday that was their first in Pennsylvania.

"Don't be a desperate campaigner," Casey, the state treasurer, told Santorum.

Santorum, R-Pa., accused Casey of relying on the name of his father, the late Gov. Robert P. Casey, and not offering plans of his own.

"I don't know how you can say so many words and say nothing," said Santorum, a two-term incumbent who is the No. 3 Senate Republican. "It's just talking point after talking point."

Santorum, who has trailed Casey in polls for months in one of the nation's most competitive Senate races, closed with an impassioned speech in which he said he has worked hard and been rewarded by Pennsylvanians and his Republican colleagues with a leadership position

"I'm a passionate guy. I'm tough, I'm a fighter. But you know what? I'm an Italian kid from a steel town. What do you expect from me? I'm a guy who had to grow up having to scratch and claw," Santorum said. "I wasn't born into a family that had a great name. My dad's an immigrant to this country. I've worked hard, just like you do in western Pennsylvania to fight for the things you believe in."

Casey closed with a promise to bring health insurance to more children and protect workers from unfair trade deals.

"We need change. We need to move in a brand-new direction," he said.

The debate started on a contentious note with a question to Santorum about his decision to keep a home in a Washington suburb in Virginia where he primarily lives with his wife and six kids. Questions have been raised throughout the campaign about Santorum's use of tax dollars from Pennsylvania to fund his children's cyberschool education.

"I'm a senator from Pennsylvania. My residence is in Pennsylvania. That's where I pay my taxes, that's where my driver's license is. We have a three bedroom home. My kids and I slept there last night," Santorum said.

Santorum then turned to Casey and accused him of not showing up for work in his position as the state treasurer, and repeatedly asked him to look into the camera and tell voters how many times he has shown up.

Casey did not. He repeatedly told Santorum to "pay the money back" that had been used to fund the cyberschool education.

"This wouldn't be an issue in this campaign if he were straight with the voters, not only with the people of Penn Hills, but the voters all over the state," Casey said.

Casey, asked if he was relying on his father's name to get elected, cited his work as state auditor and treasurer, saying he had been fiscally responsible and cracked down on waste and fraud. He said it was hard when he lost the Democratic gubernatorial primary in 2002, but he said he entered the Senate race because he thought he could contribute.

"If this race comes down to whose working harder and who does their job better, mine as state treasurer, his as a U.S. senator, I'll win that battle. I'm not worried about that at all because I get results and I've been fighting battles for the people of this state for a decade," Casey said.

The two argued over whether Casey supports "amnesty" for illegal immigrants because Casey has said he would reluctantly support a Senate bill - which Santorum opposed - that would allow illegal immigrants to earn citizenship after meeting certain requirements. Santorum has said the bill would give illegal immigrants a free ride.

As they have before, Casey accused Santorum of supporting a plan that would privatize Social Security and Santorum accused Casey of not understanding the problem or offering a plan to help.

DOJ_NMG_0080478

During the debate, Casey worked to portray Santorum as a partisan Republican and ally to President Bush who has acted in the interests of corporate America. What Santorum has done, he said, is "talk and talk and talk."

Santorum touted a record working with Democrats on issues such as curtailing dog-breeding operations dubbed "puppy mills" by opponents and obtaining money for autism research. He attempted to challenge Casey's credibility by asking Casey to name facts, such as the name of the former president of Iran, which Casey did not name when asked.

"I provide the solutions," Santorum said. "He's only describing problems."

The two, both clad in black suits and dark red ties, stood next to each other behind podiums. At one point, Santorum told Casey to "quit lying to the people, Bob." Casey later said to Santorum, "I've got a point to make, stop talking." They even interrupted moderator Ken Rice at times.

"Gentleman, please, please, please, you're just killing our time keeper and you're just trashing your own rules," Rice said after one exchange.

The debate in a KDKA-TV studio was sponsored by the station and the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette. It was the second debate between the two and comes less than a month before the Nov. 7 general election.

Their first debate, taped in Washington and aired Sept. 3 on NBC's "Meet the Press," focused primarily on the war in Iraq.

The two are expected to debate twice on Monday in Philadelphia.

The Gloves Come Off (HPN)

By Brett Lieberman

Harrisburg Patriot-News (PA), October 13, 2006

PITTSBURGH - U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum and his Democratic challenger, Robert P. Casey Jr., pointed fingers and exchanged barbs and charges of hypocrisy during a tense debate yesterday that showed how personal the Senate election has become.

The accusations and fireworks lasted throughout, when Santorum was questioned about perceptions that he's been dishonest about where he lives, to the end, when he accused Casey of being lazy and trying to coast into office on his famous name.

In between, moderator Ken Rice of KDKA-TV, which hosted the forum, struggled, mostly unsuccessfully, to maintain order.

"Gentlemen, we have to move on," Rice said at one point. "You're killing the time keeper and trashing your own rules."

Bitter exchanges came over issues such as Santorum's residency and the candidates' negative ads, but the debate degenerated when they talked about immigration reform, U.S. policies toward Iraq and Iran and how to stop the spread of nuclear weapons.

"You don't understand the issues," Santorum told Casey after the Democrat faulted the Bush administration's handling of Iran and North Korea.

Casey said "all options need to be on the table," including using the military to deal with North Korea. The White House has squandered opportunities for a solution and has alienated allies, he said.

Santorum complained of "Monday morning quarterbacking" of foreign-policy decisions by Bush critics.

Santorum also faced scrutiny from his challenger and panelists for his divisive reputation and on issues such as whether the Bush administration's decision to invade Iraq has made Iran stronger and limited U.S. options to combat terrorism.

Santorum said he is unfairly cast as a polarizing figure and portrayed himself as a straight-talking hard worker who delivers for Pennsylvania and works across party lines.

"I look people in the eye and tell them what I believe. ... I don't not answer questions. ... I'm passionate about things, as opposed to someone who just wants to ride it out and use their name and not say anything," he said.

Santorum recited a litany of his efforts, from legislation to close puppy mills, fund autism and Lyme disease research, fighting to save western Pennsylvania military bases, keep the Pirates and Penguins sports teams in Pittsburgh, and protecting farmland.

Casey faced more scrutiny of his positions and record from Santorum and the KDKA and Pittsburgh Post-Gazette panelists yesterday than he did in a debate with Santorum on NBC's "Meet the Press" last month.

But Casey, who has been criticized for his low-key style, showed a more aggressive side as he repeatedly challenged Santorum to "answer the question."

He accused Santorum of trying to piggyback on immigration reform after failing to take a tough stand on the issue during 12 years in the Senate.

Santorum, who continues to trail Casey in polls, closed the debate with a plea to voters, especially those in western Pennsylvania, where his approval is lowest.

DOJ_NMG_0080479

"As you can see from this debate, I'm a passionate guy," Santorum said. "I'm tough, I'm a fighter. But you know what? I'm an Italian kid from a steel town. What do you expect from me?

"I wasn't born into a family that had a great name. My dad's an immigrant to this country. I've worked hard, just like you do in western Pennsylvania to fight for the things you believe in," he said.

Santorum has been criticized for living with his wife and six children most of the year in Leesburg, Va., while claiming a three-bedroom home in the western Pennsylvania town of Penn Hills as their residence.

"I'm a senator from Pennsylvania. My residence is in Pennsylvania. That's where I pay my taxes, that's where my driver's license is," he said.

Santorum defended the Virginia home, noting that the Senate is in session 35 to 40 weeks a year and voters "sent me to go to Washington to fight hard, to show up for work, which is something that my opponent doesn't do."

Casey, invoking U.S. Sen. Arlen Specter's comments last month that the Senate's three-day work week ought to be extended, said Congress has more recesses than most schools.

Santorum asked Casey how much time he spends in the treasurer's office.

"Look in the camera, Mr. Casey," Santorum said. "Look in the camera and tell the people how much time you spend in the office. This is a legitimate question.

"Now I want you to look in the camera and tell people how many full days of work you spent at the treasurer's office last month," he said.

"Don't be a desperate campaigner," Casey shot back.

Santorum And Casey Trade Barbs (PT)

By Mike Wereschagin

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review Debate, October 13, 2006

In a feisty debate that spun out of the moderator's control almost from the start, U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum accused Democratic challenger Bob Casey of skipping work and offering no solutions to the nation's dilemmas, while Casey denounced Santorum for being beholden to oil companies and for not recognizing the country has problems.

The taped one-hour debate, broadcast at 7 p.m. on KDKA Channel 2, began with Santorum saying he has paid more than $100,000 in taxes on his Penn Hills home since he took office, making that home -- and not his larger house in Virginia -- his primary residence.

Santorum, who has trailed Casey in the polls for more than a year and only has a few weeks to rebound, attacked Casey's work ethic.

"How many days were you in the treasurer's office 9-to-5 last month?" Santorum, almost yelling, asked Casey. "I want you to look in the camera and tell people how many 9-to-5 days you spent in the Treasurer's office last month."

"Rick, don't be a desperate campaigner," Casey replied evenly. He didn't answer Santorum's question, and instead shot back with an accusation about taxpayer dollars paid for the Santorum children's education at a cyber charter school while they lived in Virginia. "You ripped the taxpayers off $55,000."

Santorum responded with a rapid-fire litany of the amounts of local and state taxes he paid in Penn Hills over the years, while Casey, talking at the same time, said slowly, "Pay the money back."

Moderator and KDKA anchor Ken Rice admonished the candidates to stick to the agreed time limits. It didn't work. The two continued talking over each other, pointing fingers and leaning toward the others' podium throughout the debate. Even afterward, each candidate met with reporters to take a few parting shots at his opponent.

During the debate, which began at 1:30 p.m. in KDKA's Downtown studios, Casey criticized the Bush administration and Santorum for what he said is a fixation on Iraq that has allowed Iran and North Korea to advance their nuclear weapons programs. He also challenged Santorum to close a loophole, which he said allows Halliburton, a defense contractor once run by Vice President Dick Cheney, to do business with Iran.

"What you see again is my opponent not providing any answer to the question. What he's done is describe the problem, complained about the administration," Santorum said. "I authored the Iran Freedom and Support Act, which the administration opposed. You're right. I disagree with the administration and have on the Iran policy."

Turning to Casey, he said, "I disagreed with them inviting (to the White House) the former president of Iran -- you know his name, I'm sure. The former president of Iran?"

Casey didn't. Speaking to reporters after the debate, Casey admitted he couldn't remember the former Iranian president's name -- Mohammad Khatami -- and added, "There are some names I don't know. I don't know the lobbyist from Exxon that gave (Santorum) tons of money."

DOJ_NMG_0080480

The candidates traded barbs on outsourcing, with Casey saying Pennsylvania lost 180,000 manufacturing jobs on Santorum's watch, and Santorum criticizing Casey for investing millions of taxpayer dollars in companies that have shipped jobs overseas.

On immigration, Santorum charged that Casey supports amnesty for millions of illegal immigrants. Casey shot back that the proposal he supports is not considered amnesty by Republican Sens. Arlen Specter, of Philadelphia, and John McCain, of Arizona.

Casey and Santorum are expected to debate twice more next week in Philadelphia.

Santorum, Casey Go Toe-to-toe In Debate (PPG)

By Bill Toland

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, October 13, 2006

The two candidates interrupted each other, talked over each other, ignored time limits, ignored the moderator and generally stopped just short of playground name-calling and shin-kicking. To say that KDKA moderator Ken Rice lost control of yesterday's debate between U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum and state Treasurer Bob Casey would be fallacious, because it suggests that he ever had control to begin with.

In short: bad manners.

But great political theater.

In this debate, sponsored jointly by KDKA and the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, the issues took a back seat to the candidates' sparring and demeanor. Mr. Santorum, a Republican, frequently challenged his Democratic foe to "look in the camera" and tell Pennsylvania the truth. After many of Mr. Casey's responses to panelists' queries, Mr. Santorum rolled his eyes and said: "You will not get this man to answer the question."

Mr. Casey, meanwhile, repeatedly alluded to the incumbent's poor poll numbers.

"Hey Rick, I know things are tough," he said. "Don't be a desperate campaigner."

And that was just the first 10 minutes. Over the course of the hour, the candidates battled on the Iraq war, border security and amnesty for undocumented immigrants, Social Security, pay raises and other issues.

Rare was the question that elicited a few minutes of civility. The close-quarters sparring undoubtedly added color to the affair, but the candidates appeared less statesmanlike than either Gov. Ed Rendell or challenger Lynn Swann, who debated each other in Pittsburgh last week.

Off the bat, Mr. Rice asked Mr. Santorum a question that has dogged him for months -- why did he allow Penn Hills School District to foot the bill for his children to attend a Pennsylvania online cyber school, when he and his family primarily live in Virginia? (A public school district, by state law, must pick up the tab for students living within the district and attending an Internet-based school.)

"I've paid $100,000 in state and local taxes," Mr. Santorum said, implying that he's entitled to the same benefits that other Pennsylvania taxpayers get, even if his children lay their heads to rest in a different state.

"This issue is as much about hypocrisy as it is about residency," Mr. Casey said, referring to Mr. Santorum's 16-year-old attack on former U.S. Rep. Doug Walgren, whom Mr. Santorum pilloried for living in Virginia instead of Pennsylvania. Both candidates were evasive to varying degrees, but Mr. Casey more so. That was partly because, at least twice, Mr. Santorum asked questions designed to trip him up -- first, he wanted to know if Mr. Casey remembered the name of former Iranian president Mohammad Khatami; second, he asked Mr. Casey if he knew precisely what percentage of the Pennsylvania Public School Employees' Retirement System's assets is invested in companies that are notorious for outsourcing jobs (he said the answer was 25 percent).

Mr. Santorum, as a result, appeared to have a better grasp of the issues, at least those ones that were raised yesterday. Mr. Casey often relied on familiar talking points, reminding viewers that Mr. Santorum votes with President Bush about 98 percent of the time, and that Mr. Santorum wanted to "privatize" Social Security by allowing younger workers to invest part of their Social Security payroll taxes into stocks.

"I don't know how you can say so many words and say nothing," Mr. Santorum said, mocking the catchphrases that are familiar not only to Mr. Casey but to all political challengers. "Brand new direction. Different course. It's just, you know, talking point after talking point."

But Mr. Santorum had his talking points, too. Several times, he said Mr. Casey doesn't take his job as state treasurer seriously, viewing it as a stepping stone to higher office. He also said Mr. Casey is coasting on his father's name, referring to the late Robert P. Casey, former governor of Pennsylvania.

If he seemed more informed at times, Mr. Santorum also seemed far more agitated, gesturing aggressively and trampling Mr. Casey's remarks more often than Mr. Casey returned the favor. He opened the debate wearing a smile, but quickly the smile became a frustrated scowl. Mr. Casey appeared more bemused than he did frustrated, except for a moment near the end of the debate, when he mustered his best teacher voice and cut off Mr. Santorum:

"Stop talking Rick, I've got a point to make."

Mr. Santorum seemed surprised, but recovered nicely: "It would be the first one today."

On Iraq, the candidates debated the merits of the recently publicized National Intelligence Estimate, which suggested that the invasion of Iraq is "shaping a new generation of terrorist leaders and operatives." Mr. Santorum was asked if the Iraq invasion made the Middle East more dangerous than before.

"Compared to what? Compared to had we done nothing? That's a classic Monday morning quarterback," Mr. Santorum said. The coupled U.S. invasions of Iraq and Afghanistan have helped, in his assessment, in reducing the global terror threat posed by al-Qaida and the version of Islam that breeds radical Sunnis.

"We haven't been attacked in five years," he said, speaking of the American homeland and not the 2,800 American troops who have died since the invasion.

"I think the National Intelligence Estimate tells a good part of the story," Mr. Casey replied. "That said very clearly that the war in Iraq has made it much tougher to take on the war against terrorism around the world. There's no question about that. Sen. Santorum just said that because of what happened in Iraq, we reduced the threat of terrorism -- that's not the truth. The National Intelligence Estimate contradicts what he just said."

The candidates' Iraq responses soon wandered into a parsing of the differences among special forces, special operations forces, and the U.S. Army Special Forces, informally known as the Green Berets. Mr. Rice, the moderator, had heard enough. "You're killing our timekeeper," he said, "and you're just trashing your own rules."

In his closing statement, Mr. Santorum dialed down the bullying while acknowledging it at the same time.

"You can see from this debate -- I'm a passionate guy," he said. "I'm tough. I'm a fighter. But you know what? I'm an Italian kid from a steel town. What do you expect from me? ... I wasn't born into a family that had a great name."

He also touted his role in funding local VA hospitals, and keeping the Air Force Reserve's 911th Military Airlift Wing open in Pittsburgh, when it had been facing closure.

Mr. Casey wrapped up by acknowledging that this is "a very, very important Senate race for the country," something echoed by Democrats and Republicans across the United States, as well as political observers who view Pennsylvania's premier race as a bellwether for the nation.

"We can stay on the road that we've been on the last couple of years, the road of deficit and debt ... There's a very clear choice in this campaign."

Campaign Revised In Tennessee (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, October 13, 2006

Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker, the Republican candidate to replace retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, has retooled his campaign in an effort to regain his lead over Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., Tennessee Democrat.

"We've made a number of enhancements to the campaign," said Corker campaign spokesman Todd Womack. "They are more about addition than subtraction ... adjustments to ensure that we win this election, and we will."

The new campaign chairman is Tom Ingram, a longtime political insider in the state who serves as chief of staff to Sen. Lamar Alexander, Tennessee Republican.

Mr. Corker also has hired a new media consultant, former EMI Records executive Fred Davis. The campaign has moved its headquarters from Chattanooga to Nashville, the state capital.

Democrats need to win six seats on Nov. 7 to reclaim their majority in the Senate, and see hope in Republican-leaning Tennessee.

The party seized on the Corker campaign shake-up.

"Corker is in disarray, shaking things up and hiring Hollywood media types instead of explaining things like why he's for staying the course in Iraq one day and against it the next," said Phil Singer, spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

Mr. Ford yesterday received another boost: the endorsement of Frank Cagle, a leading conservative political analyst and editor of Knoxville Magazine.

The Republican National Committee and the National Republican Senatorial Committee are working to counter Mr. Ford's momentum by infusing Mr. Corker's campaign with new ads.

RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman will lead rallies in Murfreesboro and Franklin with Mr. Corker and Rep. Marsha Blackburn, Tennessee Republican.

DOJ_NMG_0080482

Polls heavily favored Mr. Corker over the summer before trending for Mr. Ford. The latest polls show the candidates in a dead heat.

Two weeks ago, when Ben Mitchell was Mr. Corker's campaign chairman, he told The Washington Times that the campaign was comfortable with where it stood and noted that Mr. Ford "has yet to show above 45 percent in his own polling."

Things have changed since then.

The DSCC released a poll of 800 likely voters Tuesday showing Mr. Ford leading Mr. Corker by seven points, 51 percent to 44 percent, with a margin of error of 3.3 percentage points.

Hamilton Beattie & Staff conducted the poll for the DSCC from Oct. 2 to 4, during the height of the frenzy surrounding disgraced former Rep. Mark Foley, Florida Republican.

Polls conducted during that time showed a national trend against Republicans, which might have affected Mr. Corker.

A Survey USA poll of 537 likely voters for WBIR-TV Knoxville shows Mr. Corker leading with 48 percent and Mr. Ford with 46 percent, with a margin of error of four percentage points. The poll was conducted Saturday through Tuesday and released Wednesday. It still revealed a virtual dead heat in the race and more than 45 percent support for Mr. Ford.

Steele Takes A Head-On Jab At His Party (WP)

By Ann E. Marimow

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

Maryland Senate candidate Michael S. Steele, who often avoids mentioning his political affiliation in the overwhelmingly Democratic state, took one of his most direct swipes at his party in a new commercial yesterday while continuing to fault Democrats.

In the ad, Steele criticizes Republicans for creating an education policy "that teaches to a test," a reference to President Bush's No Child Left Behind law, and Democrats for putting "bureaucracy ahead of our kids."

"Some Republicans forget folks still climbing that ladder," he says, and Democrats "just raise their taxes."

Meanwhile, Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin is trying to use the lieutenant governor's own words to pin Steele to the unpopular president. In the Democratic candidate's latest 30-second spot, the announcer says, "Steele wants you to believe he'll follow his own convictions. The truth?" The screen then flashes to Steele onstage at the 2004 Republican National Convention declaring: "The standard-bearer of these convictions is George W. Bush."

Steele, the former chairman of the state Republican Party, has played down his party ties throughout the campaign. He has pledged to be a "bridge of steel" between Republicans and Democrats and has pointed out problems with Bush's signature education policy. His criticism of the president and his party became public in July after he acknowledged sharing it privately with reporters.

The ad marks some of his most direct public comments about the GOP. Like Steele, the state's last Republican senator, Charles McC. Mathias Jr., avoided talking about his party or listing it in his literature.

"What's unusual is that Steele has taken the next step," said John N. Bambacus, who teaches politics at Frostburg State University and managed Mathias's campaign in 1980.

Steele can afford to openly criticize his party, Bambacus said, because the GOP base has "nowhere else to go."

Dan Ronayne, a spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee, said many candidates are expressing dissatisfaction with official Washington.

Sen. Lincoln D. Chafee (R-R.I.) took a similar approach in one ad, saying, "I believe that neither Republicans nor Democrats are always right. I angered Republicans when I voted against the war in Iraq and Democrats when I voted for legal reform."

To Ronayne, Steele's critique is not surprising. "Michael Steele is an independent voice, and he speaks his mind," he said. "He's pointing out problems he sees in Washington on both sides."

As is independent candidate Kevin Zeese, who has the backing of the Green, Libertarian and Populist parties. He has tried to tap into voter dissatisfaction by offering himself as an alternative to the candidates from the two major parties.

With Republicans on the defensive nationally, Cardin has repeatedly tried to link Steele to Bush, noting his support for the Iraq war and for the president's veto of a bill to expand federal funding for embryonic stem cell research.

Cardin spokesman Oren Shur accused Steele of trying to "re-create himself" through the ad, saying, "Michael Steele is in lock step with the Bush agenda."

Steele spokesman Doug Heye, noting that he counted more than 100 references to Bush by Cardin during the candidates' debate this month, shot back, "This race is not about George Bush."

Inside Politics (WT)

DOJ_NMG_0080483

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, October 13, 2006

Burying the news

"Why is it that none of the major television networks or newspapers have managed to pay attention to the biggest real scandal of the 2006 campaign season, Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid's real estate shenanigans?" Jed Babbin asks at www.realclearpolitics.com.

"According to [Wednesday's] AP report, Reid pocketed a $1.1 million windfall on the sale of some Las Vegas property he didn't own at the time of the sale. This makes Hillary Clinton's futures trading venture look like amateur hour. And it's time for conservatives to act because the biggest scandal is that the media are burying the story," Mr. Babbin said.

"According to the AP report, the deal was put together by Reid's longtime friend Jay Brown, '... a former casino lawyer whose name surfaced in a major political bribery trial this summer and in other prior organized crime investigations.' Apparently Brown structured the deal so that Reid could transfer his ownership interest to Brown without disclosing it to the public. And here's the kicker: Reid didn't disclose the sale on his financial disclosure forms filed with the Senate.

"Not to make too big a deal of this, but falsifying that report — as Reid apparently did — is a federal crime. Under Title 18 US Code Section 1001, it's a false official statement. For which Reid could be sent to jail. If you're looking for this on tonight's network news or on the front page of tomorrow's New York Times (next to the newest revival of the Foley minutiae) you won't find it. There's ample time for Mark Foley, the discredited generals' revolt, and even the comprehensively discredited Lancet report on civilian casualties in Iraq. But cover a real scandal, with real misconduct that's punishable under federal criminal law?"

Never mind

A black leader who had accused Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman of lying about his civil rights record said yesterday that he accepted Mr. Lieberman's word that he marched with 1960s-era activists against segregation.

"It is true that he marched with Dr. King, but I believe Dr. King would be disappointed in his record as a senator over the past 18 years," said Henry E. Parker, a former state treasurer, in a statement released by the campaign of Mr. Lieberman's rival, Ned Lamont.

"I accept the fact that Sen. Lieberman provided documentation that he participated in the civil rights movement in the '60s," Mr. Parker added.

Earlier, the Connecticut Federation of Black Democratic Clubs, which includes 20 clubs, endorsed Mr. Lamont, a Democrat, and questioned whether Mr. Lieberman, who holds his seat as a Democrat but is running for re-election as an independent, had marched for civil rights. Mr. Lamont attended the event, the Associated Press reports.

Mr. Lieberman's campaign responded by producing a 1963 college newspaper clip that cites Mr. Lieberman's reporting from Jackson, Miss., about the arrests of civil rights workers. Mr. Lieberman was chairman of the Yale Daily News.

"Was I there?" Mr. Lieberman said Wednesday. "You bet I was there."

Test of leadership

"In one deadly moment, North Korea has succeeded in doing what no amount of backtracking by House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert or his beleaguered Republicans could do: It has changed the subject of the national debate. With nuclear weapons in the hands of the most deranged regime in the world, e-mails to pages will have to fade from the forefront of the public's attention," Dick Morris writes in the Hill newspaper.

"Will Bush be able to deal with the North Korean crisis? This is truly the moment for a test of his leadership," Mr. Morris said.

"In August 2004, according to [an] article in the liberal New Yorker, 'a clandestine summit meeting took place at the Aspen Institute, in Colorado's Rocky Mountains. The participants, all Democrats, were sworn to secrecy' and included five billionaires who 'shared a common goal: to use their fortunes to engineer the defeat of President George W. Bush in the 2004 election.' The wealthiest of these 'hard-core partisans' was George Soros, who had been a 'leading crusader for campaign-finance reform,' " Edward Whelan writes in National Review Online at www.nationalreview.com.

"Soros, through his Open Society Institute, provides support for the Aspen Institute, which runs various activities in support of its stated mission of '[fostering] enlightened leadership and open-minded dialogue.' Among these activities are its 'Justice and Society Seminars,' which often have federal judges as participants. The Aspen Institute has waived the steep seminar fee (currently up to $6,950) for participating federal judges, and also has covered their expenses for travel, lodging, and meals," said Mr. Whelan, president of the Ethics and Public Policy Center.

"Soros has also been a major funder of the Community Rights Counsel, a left-wing 'public interest law firm.' In addition to its activist litigation efforts, the Community Rights Counsel has been the most vocal opponent of educational seminars for judges operated by anyone other than federal bureaucrats or bar associations. Soros's left hand apparently knows what his other left hand is doing: The Community Rights Counsel has not criticized the Aspen Institute's seminars for judges. Instead, one of its primary targets has been the academic programs in economics, philosophy, and history offered by the George Mason University Law and Economics Center."

Five key races

The U.S. Immigration Reform Political Action Committee yesterday endorsed six Republicans and two Democrats for re-election to the Senate, as well as 10 challengers and two candidates running for open Senate seats.

The group's communications director, Phil Kent, singled out five Senate endorsements as especially critical because of the sharp differences among candidates on giving amnesty, Social Security and in-state tuition to illegal aliens.

The group backed Sen. Rick Santorum, Pennsylvania Republican, over Democrat Bob Casey Jr.; Maryland Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, a Republican, over Democratic Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin; Tom Kean Jr., New Jersey Republican, over Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez; Sen. Jim Talent, Missouri Republican, over Democrat Claire McCaskill; and Jan Ting, Delaware Republican, over Democratic Sen. Thomas R. Carper.

Nobel finalist?

Anti-war activist Cindy Sheehan says she is a finalist for the Nobel Peace Prize.

Mrs. Sheehan made the announcement Wednesday night in an Austin, Texas, bookstore while autographing copies of her new book, "Peace Mom," local ABC affiliate KVUE-TV reported. The station's Web site provided no further details.

Richmond Times-Dispatch Warner, October 12, 2006

"While politically this appears to be the right time for me to take the plunge -- at this point, I want to have a real life." Former Gov. Mark R. Warner's decision not to run for president in 2008 scrambles politics in Virginia and beyond.

Warner's unexpected announcement yesterday could lead to a realignment of the Democratic presidential field, forcing moderates and Southerners to look elsewhere for an alternative to U.S. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, now considered the front-runner for the nomination.

It also could complicate Virginia politics. The popular Warner has made no secret of his interest in another term as governor. Should he seek the nomination in 2009, that could crowd a field that includes at least two prospects, both of whom badly lag behind Warner in name recognition and fund-raising ability.

House Democratic Caucus Chairman Brian J. Moran of Alexandria, who along with state Sen. R. Creigh Deeds of Bath is weighing a run for governor, said of Warner, "He'd be a wonderful governor if he chose to do that again."

Warner's decision, said Washington political analyst Stuart Rothenburg, "creates something of a vacuum" at the national level. Rothenburg said U.S. Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana could get a boost; so might the party's vice presidential nominee in 2004, former U.S. Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, as well as Govs. Bill Richardson of New Mexico and Tom Vilsack of Iowa.

Clinton, campaigning in Syracuse, N.Y., for a second Senate term, told The Associated Press she respects Warner's decision. She described it as "intensely personal," adding, "I hope we haven't seen the last of him in Democratic politics and on the national scene."

An enthusiastic all-but-official candidate for the White House since leaving Richmond nine months ago, Warner signaled that he also might consider the vice presidential nomination -- if offered -- or a U.S. Senate bid two years hence.

"It does not mean I'm not going to run for public office again," said Warner, who informed his staff of his decision at a 9 a.m. meeting yesterday but told some his closest allies in confidence earlier in the week.

Warner, a 51-year-old high-tech multimillionaire viewed by some handicappers as the Democrats' best chance for attracting Republican-leaning voters in the suburbs and the countryside, said his decision is personal, not political -- that he wants to spend more time with his wife, Lisa Collis, and their three daughters, one of whom is nearing college age.

"If I'm not ready to put everything on the back burner, everything else -- family, friends, any other interest of mine -- then you shouldn't take this next step," Warner, who left the governorship with a 70 percent approval rating, said at a hastily organized news conference at The Jefferson Hotel.

He said he finalized his decision during a Columbus Day weekend trip to his parents' home in Connecticut.

Though he described politics as a "body-contact sport," Warner said he was not withdrawing out of fear of heightened scrutiny of his private life, his marriage and vast business interests. Nor was he swayed, Warner said, by punishing news coverage of another Virginia presidential prospect, U.S. Sen. George Allen, amid continuing claims the Republican is insensitive to race and ethnicity issues.

DOJ_NMG_0080485

Warner, seated at the head of a long table in a private dining room crowded with reporters, aides and supporters, insisted his decision and its timing were driven by concern for family and friends -- that he wanted to prevent further disruption of their lives.

"That's not the way I hope I treat people," said Warner.

Elected governor in 2001 on a pledge of bipartisanship, Warner suffered significant setbacks in the Republican-controlled General Assembly before winning over moderate GOP lawmakers in 2004 for a $1.4 billion tax increase for schools, police and social services.

The feat, while widely supported by Virginians, also solidified Warner's image as a common-sense centrist who could pull votes in regions long off-limits to national Democrats -- the South, Midwest and West.

However, Warner was reminded of the continuing muscle of his party's liberal core in August, when U.S. Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut lost a primary in large part because of his support of President Bush's Iraq policy. That development apparently forced Warner to step up his criticism of President Bush's Iraq policy.

Warner laced through his remarks yesterday occasional digs at Bush, depicting him as more interested in political polarization than practical solutions to such issues as terrorism, Iraq and energy.

Ray Buckley, vice chairman of the New Hampshire Democratic Party, said he believed Warner could have won the state's first-in-the-nation primary, which in 1992 revived the candidacy of another moderate Southern governor, Bill Clinton of Arkansas.

"Right from the beginning, he had a strong and early buzz," Buckley said of Warner. "He was able to maintain a steady, positive buzz, which is phenomenal."

Forgoing a challenge this year to Allen for the Senate, Warner launched a political action committee, ForwardTogether, that was widely seen as a first step toward a national candidacy. The PAC raised $9 million, of which more than $7 million was steered to state and federal Democratic candidates who share Warner's agenda.

ForwardTogether will remain in business, though Warner conceded its fundraising power will fade with his retreat from presidential politics.

Warner traveled extensively, visiting five countries and 28 states. His active schedule generated considerable media attention, including cover stories in Newsweek and The New York Times Magazine as well as national television and radio.

Following his news conference yesterday, Warner departed for Iowa, site of the first presidential caucuses. Next week, he visits California.

"It has been an extraordinary nine months," said Warner. "This is the right decision." But Warner later acknowledged that, given his emphasis on family considerations in bowing out for 2008, "I understand that folks in the political world will question it."

Warner said the exploratory phase of his presumed candidacy had been so disruptive that he was spending only one or two nights a week at home. Also, Warner said, he managed to attend only half of one game of his daughters' many soccer, tennis and field-hockey matches.

"This was my decision -- this was not Lisa and the girls asking me not to run," said Warner.

Warner Rules Out Run For White House In 2008 (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny And David Stout

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 12 — Former Gov. Mark Warner of Virginia, who has been traveling across the country for more than a year exploring a bid for the White House, said today that, after “a lot of reflection, prayer and soul-searching,” he had decided not to seek the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008.

“I have decided not to run for president,” Mr. Warner said in a statement, issued at a Richmond news conference, that immediately set off a scramble among other Democrats with presidential aspirations. He said his decision was based on family considerations, but he pointedly did not rule out another try for public office later on.

A centrist Democrat who has embraced some positions more commonly associated with Republicans, Mr. Warner has been widely regarded as an attractive presidential candidate, one who might run stronger in the South and other Republican regions than other Democrats. (For example, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, the 2004 Democratic nominee, did not carry any of the 11 states of the old Confederacy.)

Mr. Warner said the decision, which he described as one of the most difficult of his life, crystallized in the past several days.

“This past weekend, my family and I went to Connecticut to celebrate my dad’s 81st birthday, and then we took my oldest daughter, Madison, to start looking at colleges,” Mr. Warner said. “I know these moments are never going to come again. This weekend made clear what I’d been thinking about for many weeks — that while politically this appears to be the right time for me to take the plunge, at this point I want to have a real life.”

Mr. Warner reached his final decision in the last 48 hours, according to two Democratic officials close to his political operation. He began alerting some of his top contributors on Wednesday evening and disclosed the news during a hastily-convened meeting with his staff today.

Mr. Warner, who finished his single term as Virginia governor in January, has spent the majority of his time since leaving office traveling to New Hampshire, Iowa and other key states in the presidential nomination process. His political action committee, Forward Together, was assembling the framework for a full-blown presidential campaign to be formed after the midterm elections. Mr. Warner had assembled a staff of 35 and raised close to $10 million.

"Everywhere I've traveled, I found hope that we could turn this country around," Mr. Warner said today. "That Americans are looking for leaders who at this moment of enormous challenge for our country can actually bring us together and get things done."

Mr. Warner said he was convinced that, regardless of the "depths of dismay" that he senses over the policies of President Bush, rank-and-file Democrats are energized as the elections approach. He said he would continue to work for James Webb, who is trying to unseat Senator George Allen of Virginia, the Republican incumbent.

As for the decision to remove himself from presidential politics, at least for the time being, one Democratic official friendly to Mr. Warner said: "He realized how hard this was going to be. He's a great general election candidate, but he thought he would have difficulty winning the primary."

Mr. Warner, 51, was seen as one of the leading alternatives to Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York. More than a half-dozen other Democrats are seriously considering jumping into the race, and Mr. Warner's decision touched off quick responses from top Democratic prospects and contributors. Senator Evan Bayh, a centrist from Indiana, cancelled a day of fund-raising in California to begin telephone calls in hopes of rounding up some of Mr. Warner's supporters and contributors.

Other Democrats who are regarded as likely candidates in 2008 include Senator Kerry; his running mate, former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina; Senators Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, Christopher Dodd of Connecticut and Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin, and Govs. Tom Vilsack of Iowa and Bill Richardson of New Mexico. Democrats speculated today that Mr. Warner's sudden departure could put new pressure on others who have so far resisted entering the race for 2008, in particular Senator Barack Obama of Illinois and former Vice President Al Gore.

The decision by Mr. Warner, party officials said, does not remove him from the short list for vice presidential running mates, regardless of who wins the Democratic presidential nomination. Nor, given his youth, does it rule out a future presidential run, although he indicated more interest today in perhaps running for the Senate or for governor again. In Virginia, the governor cannot serve consecutive terms, but there is nothing to prevent an ex-governor from running again.

Mr. Warner emphasized that he was not forgoing a White House bid because of pessimism about his chances. "I can say with complete conviction that, 15 months out from the first nomination contests, I feel we would have had as good a shot to be successful as any potential candidate in the field," he said in Richmond.

In an interview later, he acknowledged that the wide-open state of the race was tempting. "It's hard to figure out another time when there would be as good an opportunity as now," he said.

"My decision does not in any way diminish my desire to be active in getting our country fixed," Mr. Warner said. "It doesn't mean that I won't run for public office again."

Mr. Warner first ran for office in 1996, losing to Senator John W. Warner, the Republican incumbent. (The two are not related.) Should Mr. Warner opt to run for the Senate, he might try for the seat now held by Mr. Warner, who will turn 80 in February and whose term (his fifth) is up in 2008.

In his 2001 campaign for governor, Mr. Warner opposed new gun-control laws and managed to persuade the National Rifle Association to remain neutral — in effect, a victory for a Democratic candidate, according to The Almanac of American Politics. He also called himself a "fiscal conservative" and pledged not to raise taxes. He stuck to that no-tax increase pledge until about halfway through his term, when the state's fiscal realities compelled him to go along with some increases.

Mr. Warner has displayed the kind of entrepreneurial spirit that many Republicans revere. In the early years of the cell-phone industry, he assembled investor groups and packaged their cell-phone license applications in return for fees and ownership stakes. By 2001, his net worth was estimated at $200 million, according to the almanac.

Former Virginia Governor Won't Run For President In '08 (WVEC)

AP Warner, No '08 Bid, October 13, 2006

Former Gov. Mark R. Warner has decided not to run for president in 2008, saying he wanted "a real life" and feared the impact of a drawn-out campaign on his family.

"This is the right time for me in my life to have a life for a little while," Warner told reporters at a downtown Richmond hotel.

DOJ_NMG_0080487

The Democrat, 51, would not rule out running for the Senate or seeking the governorship again; the state bars incumbents from seeking re-election. He also left open the possibility of a future presidential bid, but conceded: "Things will probably never be as aligned as they are right now."

Warner said he arrived at his decision over several weeks. He said neither his wife, Lisa Collis, nor his daughters, ages 12, 15 and 16, discouraged him from running. In a written statement, he said he made the decision after celebrating his father's 81st birthday and taking his oldest daughter on a college tour.

"I know these moments are never going to come again," Warner said. "This weekend made clear what I'd been thinking about for many weeks — that while politically this appears to be the right time for me to take the plunge, at this point I want to have a real life.

"And while the chance may never come again, I shouldn't move forward unless I'm willing to put everything else in my life on the back burner," he said.

Since Warner left the governor's office in January, he has busily toured key states in the Democratic nomination process, including New Hampshire and Iowa. His political action committee, Alexandria-based Forward Together, has raised money for Warner's exploratory effort and for other Democratic candidates in this year's midterm elections.

"This is not a choice that was made based on whether I would win or lose," Warner said in his statement. "I can say with complete conviction that 15 months out from the first nomination contests, I feel we would have had as good a shot to be successful as any potential candidate in the field."

Warner leaves a crowded field of possible Democratic candidates.

Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York is widely considered the front-runner for the nomination. Others considering or positioning themselves for a run include Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, the 2004 Democratic nominee; former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, the vice presidential nominee two years ago; Sens. Evan Bayh of Indiana, Joe Biden of Delaware, Christopher Dodd of Connecticut, Russ Feingold of Wisconsin, Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson.

"He's obviously been thinking about it quite hard and concluded, as he said in his statement, that this wasn't the right time for him and his family," Clinton said while campaigning in Syracuse, N.Y. "He's been a tremendous public servant, and I hope we haven't seen the last of him in Democratic politics and on the national scene."

Warner, a centrist who had won in a Republican-leaning state, was seen as a viable Democratic alternative to Clinton. Just last week, Warner traveled to Florida, a critical battleground state, to raise money and help other Democrats. He talked about how his ability to work with Republicans could appeal to Democratic primary voters.

"We have to really get it right and getting it right will require big enough change that it can't be a Democrat-only answer or a Republican-only answer." Warner said. "I think people ... even though they are hardcore Democratic activists, get that."

During his tenure as governor, Warner's approval rating was in the mid-70s in a state that hasn't supported a Democratic presidential nominee since 1964. His lieutenant governor, Timothy M. Kaine, rode that popularity last year to replace Warner, who left because of the state's one-term limit.

Kaine, who learned of Warner's decision late Wednesday night, said he knew Warner had serious, personal reservations about running.

"I wasn't completely surprised ... when he told me. We had talked a little bit over a couple of months, and I knew he was very legitimately wrestling with that question and hadn't resolved it in his own mind," Kaine told reporters Thursday afternoon.

Warner could be considered for a vice presidential spot. Another possibility would be Sen. John Warner's seat in 2008. The five-term senator — no relation — is 79.

Mark Warner was elected governor in 2001, defeating Republican Attorney General Mark Earley. The former state Democratic Party chairman, who made a fortune in the infancy of the cellular telephone industry, had never held elected public office.

After a difficult start with a Republican-controlled General Assembly, Warner in 2004 brokered a compromise between Democrats, moderate senators and 17 House Republicans to pass a budget-balancing $1.4 billion tax increase. The tax increase was widely regarded as the signature initiative of his four-tear term.

Warner then returned to private business.

Warner Won't Make 2008 Run For President (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

RICHMOND, Oct. 12 -- Former Virginia governor Mark R. Warner unexpectedly announced Thursday that he will not seek the Democratic nomination for president in 2008, citing the personal toll a run for the White House would have on his family.

DOJ_NMG_0080488

Before Thursday, all signs pointed to a Warner candidacy. His repeated trips to Iowa, New Hampshire and other states with early primaries were largely successful, as voters greeted him with interest. He had raised $9 million for his political action committee. And he was positioning himself as a moderate alternative to another potential candidate, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

But Warner said Thursday that he had decided in the past few days that a presidential campaign would interfere with his family life even as his eldest daughter is starting to look at colleges. He said he did not want to put his "real life" on hold for the next two years.

"This moment in life is not the right time for me," Warner, 51, told reporters at the Jefferson Hotel in Richmond. "When and where, I don't know right now. But I guarantee you'll see me. I'm not going away from being involved in how we get our government fixed."

Warner, a millionaire and a founder of Nextel (now Sprint Nextel), insisted that he was not running away from scandal. "Politics is a body contact sport at this point," Warner said. "But, no, that was not [a consideration]. I understand folks in the political world will question it."

Warner's announcement stunned a growing cadre of political consultants, donors and volunteers in Virginia and elsewhere who were convinced that he would soon reveal plans to compete for the Democratic nomination. Not long ago, it appeared that Virginia could have a presidential candidate from each major party. Now, Warner is out, and Sen. George Allen (R) is in a close reelection campaign, and questions of racial insensitivity may have damaged his presidential aspirations, according to many GOP analysts.

Warner, who has been grappling with the decision for weeks, said he made up his mind during a Columbus Day weekend with his wife, three daughters and 81-year-old father in Connecticut. But the timing -- Warner made another trip to Iowa on Thursday -- left everyone in his political orbit struggling to understand.

Advisers who were in his kitchen cabinet when he was governor were shocked by the decision during a conference call Wednesday night; they had been told initially that Warner wanted to discuss "strategy." Several of his staff at Forward Together, the political action committee that was being fashioned into a full-blown presidential campaign, burst into tears when he told them at 9 a.m. Thursday. Word of Warner's plans soon leaked out.

"Everyone's devastated," said John Graham, his chief operative in New Jersey. "Why would a person pull out this fast? Is there something we don't know? Maybe he's not ready emotionally. All I ever said to him was, 'You're running, right?' And he said, 'Yes, I am.' "

Virginia Republicans, too, said they were surprised. But the decision prompted a bit of quiet celebration among GOP leaders who had watched Warner capitalize on his state tenure to run for national office.

"I've never really understood where the substance was," said Del. M. Kirkland Cox (R-Colonial Heights), who battled Warner's successful 2004 plan to raise taxes to pay for a growing government. "He's a guy whose only real legacy was raising taxes."

Warner rejected the idea that he was afraid he would lose to Clinton or one of the other as-yet-unannounced Democrats who could contest the nomination.

"Things will probably never be as aligned as they are right now," said Warner, who left office in January. "I bring a real desire to learn. I think I bring a tremendous curiosity. I think I bring a willingness to acknowledge when I'm wrong. Those three traits alone make me different from [President Bush]. Whether I had the experience and preparation to take on this challenge and then this job, I feel absolutely confident."

But that confidence -- a trait that some called unshakeable during Warner's four years in Virginia's executive mansion -- was apparently not enough.

Warner said his wife, Lisa Collis, and daughters, Eliza, 12, Gillian, 15, and Madison, 16, were ready to support a White House run. But he said that his wife was never enthusiastic and that his children were "excited" when he made his final decision.

"Lisa went from negative to neutral," Warner said of his wife's attitude in the past year. "They would have been supportive. They did not ask me not to pursue this."

A Democratic nominee could still ask Warner to run for vice president. That happened to Walter F. Mondale, who dropped out of the 1976 contest and ended up as Jimmy Carter's vice president.

Warner could also run for his old job again. Virginia law does not allow sitting governors to run for reelection, but it does allow them to seek the office again after a four-year hiatus. Warner, who left office with record-high approval ratings, has said repeatedly that he might want the job back someday.

Warner's statement that he will consider elective office in the future also shook up Virginia politics even as the state is watching another battle between Allen and Democrat James Webb.

DOJ_NMG_0080489

Democrats who have been taking the first steps toward running for the U.S. Senate in 2008 or the governorship in 2009 now have to contend with the possibility that Warner will want one of those two jobs.

"There is a potential gorilla in the race," said former lieutenant governor Donald S. Beyer (D), who served for a year as finance chief of a possible presidential bid by Warner.

Beyer, the owner of a chain of car dealerships in Northern Virginia, jokingly offered Warner a job as a mechanic if he needed one. But Beyer, a longtime friend, sounded weary and exasperated.

"All of us who were deeply and emotionally invested in him are very disappointed," Beyer said. "There's nobody in the United States better positioned to be president. But I think we all very much respected his desire to have a real life."

Warner's year-long dalliance with a run for the presidency has had its ups and downs.

Warner has been highly successful at fundraising, tapping into the venture capital community, in which he made his fortune, and topping most of the other Democratic hopefuls except Clinton. That ability helped propel him to the top of many lists of White House contenders in 2008.

His political action committee raised more than $9 million and distributed $7 million to candidates for federal and state office. It also paid for 67 trips to 28 states and five countries. His frequent trips to Iowa and New Hampshire were stirring curiosity among voters.

"We all believe that he was in a strong, strong position to be a very lead contender in winning the primary," said Ray Buckley, vice chair of the New Hampshire Democratic Party. "Often, somebody's hot one month, and then it's somebody else. For Warner to now have that buzz for 12 months was phenomenal."

But there have been difficulties as well. The New York Times Magazine put a tight, unflattering picture of Warner's face on the cover, prompting snickers. And national polls have consistently listed him as the choice of 1 or 2 percent of voters, indicating how far Warner would have to go to build recognition.

And despite Warner's belief that his brand of politics would appeal to the entire Democratic Party, pundits said his biggest challenge would be selling a moderate, bipartisan message to Democratic primary voters, especially at a time when Democrats are hungry to topple the party that will have been in power for eight years.

"I think he concluded that he couldn't win the Iowa caucuses," said one Democrat who declined to be named because he is supporting another Democratic presidential contender. "He wasn't getting any traction out there."

Geoff Garin, Warner's pollster, disputed that opinion. He said research and polling suggested that Democrats of all stripes were receptive to Warner's message.

"Every single political consideration would have had him running. There was an almost magical marriage here between the man and the moment," Garin said. "Even among those who dislike Bush the most, they want a candidate who is about hope for the future rather than just voicing their anger."

Why Did Mark Warner Quit? (TIME)

By James Carney

Time, October 13, 2006

Whenever a politician delivers an emotional speech announcing his withdrawal from the field of politics, and then cites as his reason a desire to spend more time with his family, it's a safe bet he's lying. Men who have spent years sacrificing family on the altar of ambition don't suddenly wake up one morning and decide they've had their priorities all wrong. The truth is usually elsewhere, and elsewhere is often a less than savory place.

But not always. When Mark Warner dropped out of the 2008 presidential race Thursday, the former Virginia governor shocked a lot of people, beginning with the many Democratic professionals and activists who fervently believed he would make both a strong candidate and a good president. "It's definitely a blow," says Jim Jordan, a Democratic operative who had signed on to help Warner's run for the White House. For Jordan, and others like him in both Washington and places like Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina, Warner's credentials as a popular former Democratic governor of a Republican state—and, prior to that, a hugely successful venture capitalist—made him the Democratic Party's best hope to capture independent and swing voters in a 2008 general election.

In the competition to be the un-Hillary, Warner had risen to the top. He was doing everything right as he positioned himself to run for the presidency— raising buckets of money for other Democrats, schmoozing activists in key primary states, winning lots of positive reviews in the press. Although the prospect of competing with Senator Clinton for the nomination is daunting for any Democratic candidate, Warner had firmly established himself as a top tier alternative. If anyone was in a position to topple Hillary, or to benefit if she chose not to run, it was Warner.

And yet he says he woke up Monday morning and decided he had his priorities all wrong. After a weekend that included celebrating his father's 81st birthday and touring colleges with the eldest of his three daughters, Warner began telling close staffers and supporters that he planned to drop out. "I know these moments are never going to come again," Warner said today. "This weekend made clear what I'd been thinking about for many weeks—that while politically this appears to be the right time for me to take the plunge—at this point, I want to have a real life."

Perhaps there's a hidden truth that belies Warner's simple explanation a skeleton in a closet that was about to get the kind of rummaging that only a presidential campaign can bring. But the known evidence suggests he is being honest. Those close to him say that even though his wife and daughters were willing to support a presidential run, he felt guilty about missing so much of his children's lives for the sake of pursuing political office. A fiercely ambitious man, he discovered something he didn't expect when he asked himself how badly he wanted the ultimate prize: ambivalence.

Warner Bows Out Of White House Bid, Leaving Crowded Field Of Democrats (BG/AP)

By Liz Sidoti

The Boston Globe, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON --Mark Warner's decision Thursday to bow out of the early presidential race leaves a field still crowded with Democrats competing to be the most attractive alternative to front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Fifteen months before the first vote is cast in a presidential primary, the departure of the centrist Democrat and former Virginia governor alters the dynamics of a race still taking shape. The lineup for 2008, however, remains largely the same -- Clinton and about a dozen others.

"It's good for Hillary. Anytime a serious contender drops out that helps the front-runner," said Steve Elmendorf, the deputy campaign manager for Democrat John Kerry's 2004 presidential campaign. "Warner would have been, perhaps, the strongest, or certainly one of the strongest candidates, to become the anti-Hillary. This also will help somebody who's looking at that role."

Like several other Democrats, Warner maneuvered to become Clinton's strongest challenger and used his Forward Together committee to lay the groundwork for a presidential run after leaving the governor's office in January because of Virginia's one-term limit.

"I respect his decision. It's such an intensely personal decision," Clinton said in Syracuse, N.Y., during a campaign appearance for her 2006 Senate re-election race. "He's been a tremendous public servant, and I hope we haven't seen the last of him in Democratic politics and on the national scene."

Other rivals also offered similar praise. Warner's exit could help some distinguish themselves from the pack.

The field of centrist Democrats from Republican-held states has winnowed to Sen. Evan Bayh, a former Indiana governor, and Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack. Former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, the Democrats' vice presidential candidate in 2004, now is the only Southerner left in the field.

Edwards, Vilsack and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson could be more attractive to voters looking for a candidate who works outside of Washington.

Others expected to run include Kerry, D-Mass., and Democratic Sens. Joe Biden of Delaware, Russ Feingold of Wisconsin, and Christopher Dodd of Connecticut.

It's also possible that Warner's exit could encourage more Democrats to jump into the mix, such as first-term Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill. His appearance in Iowa at an annual Democratic gathering last month stoked talk of a presidential run.

For much of the year, Warner has traveled the country to raise money for and campaign with the party's candidates in this fall's congressional election while determining whether to enter the race to succeed President Bush in 2008.

"This has been a remarkable journey and I've got no regrets at all," Warner said in Des Moines, Iowa. He attended a fundraiser for state legislative candidates just hours after announcing he would not run for president.

Considered a serious contender, Warner leaves behind what he called "a very strong field." He said he would endorse whoever gets the nomination and would not rule out endorsing a candidate before then.

"I will support them," Warner said. "At some point I may weigh in and get involved with one of these candidates. But that's a decision made far down the line for me."

The 51-year-old Southerner was well-received in visits to early primary states of Iowa and New Hampshire by Democrats hungry for a fresh face. A centrist Democrat, Warner had proven he could win in a Republican-leaning state. Also appealing to supporters was his skills as a campaigner, his ability to raise millions of dollars -- $9 million as of Aug. 31 -- and his leadership experience in both the private and public sectors.

"He fit the description of new blood, new energy," said Donna Brazile, who ran Democrat Al Gore's 2000 presidential campaign.

In the end, Warner exited the race even before he had officially entered it, fearing the impact of a full-blown campaign on his wife, Lisa Collis, and his daughters, age 12, 15 and 16. He made his final decision, he said, after taking a few days off to celebrate his father's 81st birthday and tour colleges with his eldest daughter.

DOJ_NMG_0080491

"At this point, I want to have a real life," Warner said in a statement.

The Democrat could be considered for a vice presidential slot and would not rule out running for the Senate or seeking the governorship again, which is permitted under state law. He also left open the possibility of a future presidential bid but acknowledged to reporters in Virginia: "Things will probably never be as aligned as they are right now."

Bill Carrick, a Democratic strategist in California, said every candidate will now say my chances are better because there's one less serious contender.

"I also can't help but note that this is the second presidential candidate from Virginia to be eliminated this year -- one voluntarily, one involuntarily," Carrick said.

That was a reference to Republican Sen. George Allen. His presidential chances have all but disappeared as he fights to keep his political career alive after several missteps in his Senate re-election race.

Warner Will Not Run For President In '08 (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni And Seth McLaughlin

The Washington Times, October 13, 2006

Former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner yesterday stunned state and national Democrats when he announced he will not run for president in 2008 so he can spend more time with his family.

The one-time rising star of the Democratic Party had been exploring a White House bid since before he left office in January, making frequent visits to Iowa and New Hampshire and giving generously to national candidates.

Mr. Warner said "weeks of contemplation, soul-searching and an awful lot of prayer" convinced him the pressures of a national campaign weren't fair to his family -- wife Lisa Collis and daughters -- 12, 15 and 16. But he didn't rule out seeking the vice presidency two years from now, or running for governor again.

"While politically this is the right time, it's not the right time in my life," said Mr. Warner, 51. "I want to have a real life because these moments with my family won't come again."

"It came down to the fact that if I wasn't ready to put everything else in my life -- my family, my friends, any other interests -- on the back burner, then I shouldn't do this," he said.

The loss of a centrist Democrat from a southern state when former first lady Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton is the presumed 2008 front-runner throws a wrench into the presidential primary contest.

Bloggers and party activists worried the remaining contenders don't have a resume as impressive as Mr. Warner's that could beat Mrs. Clinton, a New York Democrat many call polarizing.

"All Democrats are jockeying for a single position -- to be the alternative to Hillary -- and Warner was the moderate alternative,"said Robert D. Holsworth, dean of the College of Humanities and Sciences at Virginia Commonwealth University. "This helps Hillary because it takes away a contender who was successful in the money race."

Known for his toothy grin and hands-on style, Mr. Warner had been telling his friends for months he still hadn't made a decision about 2008, despite his fundraising and organized campaign.

During a visit with his 81-year-old father in Connecticut last weekend, Mr. Warner toured colleges with his oldest daughter, and realized it was time to announce he won't embark on a presidential campaign.

Yesterday, Mr. Warner lamented that toward the end of his daughters' soccer, field hockey and tennis seasons, he has seen "half of one game." He has spent the year traveling the country, with 86 events in 25 states.

Mr. Warner's political action committee, Forward Together, raised $9 million this year, more than any other federal PAC. He gave $7.3 million this year to candidates nationwide.

Mr. Warner said yesterday he has "complete conviction" he "would have had as good a shot to be successful as any potential candidate in the field."

The blogs exploded with the news, and some pondered whether Mr. Warner had cut a deal with Mrs. Clinton to become her running mate. Others wondered if there was a scandal brewing, a theory Mr. Warner quickly squashed.

Mr. Warner wasn't shy about his interest in the U.S. Senate seat held by Republican Sen. John W. Warner, who is likely to retire in 2008. "I have a lot of public service left in me; what form that takes, time will tell," he said.

Mr. Warner, who left the governor's office with a nearly 80 percent popularity rating, also could decide to run for the state's top office again in 2009. Virginia law bars chief executives from seeking consecutive terms.

Mr. Warner's 2001 election in a heavily Republican state gave national Democrats hope in the South, wooing rural voters with a bluegrass campaign tune and a NASCAR sponsorship.

Despite pushing a $1.38 billion tax package through Virginia's Republican-controlled legislature in 2004, Mr. Warner's popularity skyrocketed. That year, he was considered as a vice-presidential contender.

DOJ_NMG_0080492

He further bolstered his credentials when he helped his lieutenant governor, Democrat Timothy M. Kaine, win the governor's race last fall. At the end of last year, Mr. Warner officially began work on his PAC at a gala in Tysons Corner.

Yesterday's announcement shocked some of his confidants and staff, several of whom were visibly shaken at the PAC's headquarters in Old Town Alexandria. The PAC will continue through the Nov. 7 elections, sources said.

Mr. Warner also kept plans to campaign for a Democratic candidate in Iowa, and next week will campaign in Virginia with James H. Webb Jr., the Democratic nominee for U.S. Senate.

Delegate Brian J. Moran said he was disappointed with the decision because Mr. Warner had an attractive record. "He would have made a great president," the Alexandria Democrat said.

A former telecommunications executive and millionaire, Mr. Warner ran a campaign known for innovation. When a cell phone interrupted his campaign speeches he would smile and say, "You hear an annoying ring, I hear ka-ching, ka-ching."

He often brought crowds to their feet with his talk of centrist politics and the importance of global competitiveness. He also was known to unwind with a martini after campaign events, rolling up his sleeves and talking strategy.

Warner's Exit A Boon For Clinton '08 Rivals (NSDY)

By Glenn Thrush

Long Island Newsday, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner had been touted to be the moderate "anti-Hillary" candidate in the 2008 Democratic presidential mix, but now his stunning exit has created an opening for another would-be Clinton-slayer: John Edwards.

After raising $9 million and assembling a campaign team, Warner called it all off in Richmond Thursday, telling reporters he needed to spend more time with his family. "While politically this appears to be the right time for me to take the plunge, at this point I want to have a real life," he said.

On its surface, Warner's departure helps Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, who won't have to face an indefatigably upbeat Red-state centrist millionaire who isn't nearly as polarizing as the former first lady.

But his exit may be an even bigger boon to 2004 vice presidential candidate John Edwards, even though the former North Carolina senator is more liberal than Warner.

Edwards was the big winner when the Democratic National Committee voted to squeeze the Nevada caucuses into the January 2008 primary calendar between the Iowa caucuses and the New Hampshire primary. The former North Carolina senator, who is running strongly in early Iowa polls, has the inside track on Las Vegas hotel and food service union endorsements, giving him a chance in Nevada despite Clinton's juggernaut fundraising operation.

"Mark Warner's departure confirms John Edwards as the most credible candidate to challenge Sen. Clinton," said Leo Hindery, a top New York City donor who backed Edwards in 2004. "The combination of his strength in the early primaries, plus Mark Warner stepping aside really changes things."

Another beneficiary of Warner's decision is Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, a moderate whose views are closer to Warner's. "Bayh is the best positioned to inherit the Warner support because he's the closest thing to a centrist in the field," said Larry Sabato, a politics professor at the University of Virginia who follows Warner's career closely. "Edwards isn't a moderate. He's been running on poverty and left-wing issues."

But the big winner in 2008 just might be Mark Warner himself. By pulling out of a race he might have lost anyway, Warner is positioning himself as the perfect vice presidential pick, regardless who wins the Democratic nomination.

"He was always a better vice presidential candidate anyway. ... He's a bridgehead to the South," said University of Maryland political science professor Ronald Walters, a former Democratic operative. "He can give them some hope of winning Virginia, which no one else could do."

Democrat Mark Warner To Skip '08 White House Race (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — Former Virginia governor Mark Warner's surprise decision Thursday to skip the 2008 presidential race opened opportunities for several Democratic prospects angling for the same red-state niche.

Warner, who has three daughters ages 12 to 16, said family considerations drove his decision. The time for a presidential run seemed right politically, he said in a letter to supporters, but “at this point, I want to have a real life.”

By his own account, Warner made 67 trips to 28 states and five foreign countries as he explored the race. He headlined 86 events in 25 states to help his party and its candidates and raised or contributed $7.3 million for 2006 campaigns. He repeatedly visited Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina, states that lead off the nominating process. He even rated a cover story in The New York Times' Sunday magazine.

Kathy Sullivan, chairwoman of the Democratic Party in New Hampshire, said “there was a lot of interest” in Warner because he had been a successful, centrist governor in a conservative state and was perceived as electable nationally.

She said his exit probably would help Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, a moderate ex-governor, “more than anybody.” Former North Carolina senator John Edwards, the party's 2004 vice presidential nominee, could also benefit, Sullivan said. Like Virginia, their states usually back Republicans for president.

Bayh was on the phone Thursday courting Warner supporters, spokesman Dan Pfeiffer said. The pre-eminence of New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, the strongest Democratic prospect as measured in polls and fundraising, was a formidable challenge for Warner and remains one for Bayh and the rest of the field.

Warner said his decision “doesn't mean that I won't run for public office again.” He could end up as the 2008 vice presidential nominee. Other options include a Senate run in 2008, when GOP Sen. John Warner's term ends, or another bid for governor in 2009. Mark Warner had high ratings when he left office in January, but under state law could not run for a second consecutive term.

Gov. Tim Kaine, who served as Warner's lieutenant governor and has known him since law school 25 years ago, said Warner expressed his concerns about the demands of a national campaign on “Good Friday in Richmond and we've talked about it since. I knew he was wrestling with this.”

Warner said he spent last weekend celebrating his father's 81st birthday and taking his oldest daughter to look at colleges. “I know these moments are never going to come again,” he said.

Democrats Work To Fill Ideological, Electoral Void (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

Former Virginia governor Mark R. Warner's decision to bow out of the 2008 Democratic presidential race yesterday left the remaining candidates scrambling to fill the ideological and electoral void left by the candidate long considered a leading alternative to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential bid.

The most obvious Democrat to benefit from Warner's surprise announcement, in the view of many party strategists, is Sen. Evan Bayh (Ind.). He cleared his schedule yesterday to make phone calls to donors and party activists who had tentatively signed on with Warner for 2008 and are now free agents.

Warner's anticipated campaign was to be built around the notion that in an age of polarized politics, many voters are eager for a leader focused on reaching across partisan barriers for solutions to big problems. The former technology executive talked often about his experience in Virginia; he had won a state where Republicans had easily won the governorship in the previous two elections and went on to persuade the GOP-controlled legislature to pass a tax increase he called necessary to the financial solvency of the commonwealth.

That rÃ©sumÃ© -- coupled with his personal wealth -- had elevated him as a preferred choice among many Democrats who believe that Clinton (N.Y.) will not be electable in 2008.

"This is disheartening information to Hillary-alternative Democrats," said Thomas F. Schaller, a professor of political science at the University of Maryland at Baltimore County.

Some party strategists suggested that the greatest opportunity for a Democrat seeking to be the anti-Clinton alternative will -- unlike Warner's canceled candidacy -- emerge on the ideological left.

"I just don't think there is any oxygen in this race for the space that Warner was looking to occupy -- that being the moderate, establishment, electable, successful, business-entrepreneur-turned-one-term governor," said Chris Lehane, an experienced Democratic operative.

Clinton has carefully hewed to the ideological center in her six-year Senate career, building a record of working across party barriers. Her positioning is not without risk, however, as exemplified by the resentment toward her among many activists in the party's liberal wing because of her 2002 vote supporting the Iraq war and her unwillingness to set a date for withdrawal of troops.

"The bulk of the people running are going to run to the left of her, not the center," said Douglas Sosnik, a former Clinton White House aide and a personal adviser to Warner.

If Warner's decision shifts the 2008 center of gravity leftward, the candidate best positioned to capitalize on the change may be former senator John Edwards (N.C.), the Democratic vice presidential nominee in 2004. Since leaving the Senate at the end of that year, Edwards has apologized for his 2002 vote authorizing President Bush to use force in Iraq and he has called for the immediate withdrawal of U.S. forces. He has also courted organized labor, which remains a key Democratic constituency in nomination contests.

Other names touted as potential liberal alternatives include Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.), who recently made his first visit to Iowa, and former vice president Al Gore.

Many within Warner's own inner circle, however, believe that his message of centrist politics leaves a void for someone with a similar philosophy.

"People responded to his leadership style. This was a different way to think about leadership," said Monica Dixon, the head of Warner's Forward Together PAC and one of his leading campaign strategists.

On paper, Bayh most closely resembles Warner in both ideological profile and governing style. Both are former governors of Republican-leaning states who have spent much of their time in office working with members of the rival party to provide solutions.

In nearly every speech, Bayh emphasizes that he was twice elected governor of Indiana before being elected -- and reelected to the Senate. The not-so-subtle message of those speeches is that Bayh represents his party's best chance of being competitive in Republican-leaning states.

Seeking to quickly capitalize on Warner's decision, Bayh spent the day reaching out to jilted Warner backers -- making the argument that his campaign is a natural landing spot for them. In a statement released yesterday Bayh praised Warner as "an exceptional public servant, a great leader, and an influential voice in the Democratic Party."

Outgoing Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson are also positioning themselves as moderates in the 2008 field. They gain some residual benefit from a Warner-less field, said party strategists not aligned with either candidate.

"Primary voters are all handicappers," said Matt Bennett, co-founder of Third Way, a group of moderate Democrats. "They try to pick the guy who can win."

2008 Race Just Got Hazier For Democrats (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — In a surprise decision that reconfigures the race for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination, former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner announced Thursday that he would not run, saying he was unwilling to put his family second to a presidential campaign.

Warner, a centrist Democrat from a Republican-leaning Southern state, was considered by many Democratic strategists to be the strongest potential rival to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), the early front-runner for the nomination.

His decision opens the field for other candidates hoping to present themselves as centrists, including Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.), Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson.

"The great dynamic in this race is: Who are the one or two others in the pack who can break out and challenge Sen. Clinton?" said Simon Rosenberg, founder of the New Democrat Network, an organization that promotes progressive candidates.

"This benefits all the people who are going to be challenging Hillary."

Warner's stature among Democrats was based less on his nationwide visibility — he polled in the single digits — but more on the centrist record he built as governor.

He left office earlier this year with high approval ratings from Democrats and Republicans.

"The idea [is] that the way that Democrats win the White House is to nominate somebody who has won election in a red state," said Jennifer Duffy, a political analyst at the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. "He had a very successful term. He had a lot to brag about."

Warner dismissed speculation that his decision was based on any liabilities he would have had as a candidate.

"I can say with complete conviction, 15 months out from the first nominating process, I think I would have as good a shot as any of the potential candidates in the field," he told reporters in Richmond, Va.

Instead, Warner, 51, said that after four years of putting his personal life on hold as governor, he wanted to spend more time with his three teenage daughters.

"While politically this appears to be the right time for me to take the plunge, at this point I want to have a real life," Warner said. "And while the chance may never come again, I shouldn't move forward unless I'm willing to put everything else in my life on the back burner."

The announcement surprised many Democrats because Warner had been working assiduously since he left office to build a campaign war chest and political organization.

He had raised more than $9 million and made repeated trips to Iowa and New Hampshire, whose nominating contests are crucial for presidential runs.

DOJ_NMG_0080495

Traditionally, the presidential election cycle does not begin until after the midterm election, which is Nov. 7 this year.

Unofficially, Democrats and Republicans have been working at least since the 2004 election to get ready for the 2008 race, when the presidency will be up for grabs.

Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, Massachusetts Sen. John F. Kerry and Wisconsin Sen. Russell D. Feingold are promoting themselves as more liberal alternatives to Clinton.

Also laying the groundwork for presidential runs are Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut. And some party activists are hoping that former Vice President Al Gore and Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois decide to make a run for the White House.

Some Democratic strategists worry about Clinton as a candidate, in part because her time as first lady made her a polarizing figure. That has focused attention on less well-known Democrats, particularly the moderates.

"The center of the race is now less crowded," said a senior advisor to one of the other Democratic contenders, who spoke on condition of anonymity while discussing campaign strategy. "We have opportunities today that we did not have yesterday."

Notably, Warner did not rule out running again for public office and indicated he would be willing to consider running for vice president, senator or even governor again. Warner had been barred from seeking reelection because Virginia does not allow its governors to hold consecutive terms.

"Listen," he said, "when and where, I don't know right now, but I can guarantee you'll see I'm not going away from being involved in how we get our country fixed."

Warner, who was always devoted to politics, made a fortune as a pioneer in the cellphone industry before he became a venture capitalist.

He has used his money to bankroll his campaigns, including a failed 1996 challenge to Sen. John Warner (R-Va.) and his successful run for governor in 2001.

Friends and colleagues have said that he went into business in large part to finance his political career, and most think it's not over.

"This is a formidable competitor choosing to walk off the field. And it's disappointing to people who were working for him," said Kenneth Baer, who had been working as a speechwriter and advisor to Warner. "But he's 51 years old. There's a lot of time."

Poll: McCain, Hillary Clinton Popular Choices For President (NSDY)

Newsday, October 12, 2006

DURHAM, N.H. -- A poll released Thursday indicates that John McCain and Hillary Clinton are the early front-runners in New Hampshire for their parties' nomination for president in 2008.

A total of 515 likely voters were asked about 20 potential presidential candidates in the latest Granite State Poll conducted by the University of New Hampshire Survey Center for WMUR-TV.

The largest group of New Hampshire Republicans is supporting McCain, with 32 percent. Former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani is next with 19 percent, followed by Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, with 15 percent. Ten percent said they would vote for Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. Two percent favor some other candidate and 14 percent are undecided.

Among the less popular potential candidates are Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, Virginia Sen. George Allen, Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum and New York Gov. George Pataki.

Among Democrats, Clinton was the favorite, with 30 percent choosing her. John Edwards is next with 16 percent, and Al Gore is at 10 percent. Sen. John Kerry is the choice of 9 percent of Democrats.

Among the less popular choices are Delaware Sen. Joe Biden, retired Gen. Wesley Clark, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, and former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner, who announced Thursday that he doesn't plan to run. Four percent prefer some other candidate and 17 percent are undecided.

"It's the first time since 1952 that there's not been an incumbent president or vice president on the ticket, so that means it's wide open," said Andy Smith of the UNH Survey Center.

Those polled also were asked which candidates they liked the least. Among potential Democratic candidates, Hillary Clinton was the least liked by 35 percent of all of the likely voters in both parties, followed by Kerry, Gore, Clark and Edwards. Jeb Bush was least liked by all likely primary voters, followed by McCain, Romney, Rice and Tennessee Sen. Bill Frist.

Democrats said their least liked candidate was Kerry, followed by Gore and then Clinton. Even though they'd vote for him, Republicans said the least popular potential candidate was McCain, followed by Bush, Romney and Pataki.

"What we're seeing right now is name recognition and overall popularity of these candidates based on name recognition," Smith said.

DOJ_NMG_0080496

When asked about candidates in the other party, 54 percent of Republicans said their least favorite candidate was Clinton, and 33 percent of Democrats called Bush the most unpopular potential candidate.

Included in the poll were 205 likely Democratic voters in 2008, and 206 likely Republican voters. The sampling margin of error was plus or minus 6.8 percentage points for both groups; it was plus or minus 4.3 percentage points for the total. The poll was conducted by phone between Sept. 15 and Sept. 24.

Mass. Governor Hires Jeb Bush Aide For '08 Bid (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — With the Republican Party's conservatives lacking a favorite candidate for the 2008 presidential race, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney has hired a strategist who might help him win their favor.

Sally Bradshaw, a longtime political advisor and confidante to Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, confirmed Thursday that she has signed on as a consultant to Romney's political action committee.

Known in Florida circles as Jeb Bush's equivalent to President Bush's Karl Rove, Bradshaw will advise the Romney campaign on navigating the complicated political contours of the most populous battleground state. But more important in the context of what is likely to be a competitive GOP primary, Bradshaw's presence helps Romney shore up his credentials with conservatives who view the Florida governor as one of their favorite Republicans.

Jeb Bush, despite his brother's sagging popularity, is admired by social conservatives for his support of private school vouchers and his involvement in the Terri Schiavo right-to-die case.

In his quest to win support from increasingly important evangelical voters, Romney, a Mormon who was elected in one of the nation's most liberal states, has disavowed statements supporting abortion rights

Bradshaw's decision to work for Romney also confirms that the Florida governor, who is prevented by term limits from seeking reelection, is not planning his own White House bid for 2008.

"It should be no surprise that I am not running for president," Bush wrote in an e-mail late Thursday. "After all, that is what I have told you and others in the press for a long time."

Bradshaw said Thursday that Bush encouraged her to consider working for Romney, who will appear with the governor next week in Florida at several campaign events.

Bradshaw's Florida connections could also prove useful for Romney if that state's GOP-led Legislature proceeds with plans to move up the date of the state's presidential primary. The new House speaker is pushing a bill that would schedule the election immediately after New Hampshire's first-in-the-nation primary.

Other major GOP candidates have sought advice from Jeb Bush, including Arizona Sen. John McCain, who flew to Tallahassee late last year for a private meeting.

Bush said Thursday that he is not supporting any candidates, but said Romney would be "formidable" if he runs.

Nevada Feeling Political Glow Of '08 Spotlight (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

LAS VEGAS — No longer is it, "Um, Dina who?"

The name of the Democratic candidate for governor here, Dina Titus, is tattooed on the brain of most every Democrat who wants to be president, because of Nevada's newly vaunted position in the 2008 election calendar.

Since Democrats moved the caucus here smack between the Iowa caucus, the first contest of the year, and the New Hampshire primary, Ms. Titus has worked the fund-raising circuit with Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico and Senators Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin and John Kerry of Massachusetts and former Senator John Edwards of North Carolina. Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Evan Bayh of Indiana and Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa are on their way.

"They raise money for me, and I get them face time," said Ms. Titus, a little-known state lawmaker who has leveraged the attention into a suddenly competitive race against Representative Jim Gibbons, the Republican candidate for governor.

The decision this summer to move the Nevada caucus has infuriated Democratic officials from Iowa and New Hampshire, accustomed to being the electoral prom queens of the primary season, who have been criticizing Nevada's low turnout in elections and questioning the state's ability to pull off the complex process of a high-profile caucus.

The jokes about strippers in the union halls and caucusing over the craps tables are presumably being written now.

"I met folks from Nevada before," said Gordon R. Fischer, the immediate past chairman of the Iowa Democratic Party. "It seems like a nice group of people. But I don't think you can overestimate the amount of work that goes into this. I think it is bad, with all due respect. I think it is bad for the Democratic Party and bad for the country."

DOJ_NMG_0080497

Nevadans, not surprisingly, reject this idea.

"We're not talking about figuring out the DNA strand here," said Jon Ralston, Nevada's most respected and widely quoted political reporter, who said he had already identified the state's biggest winner: "Me!"

How Nevada changes the calculation for Democratic contenders is a matter of debate within incipient campaigns, a sort of election wild card. And even as they zip off to the state to appear at fund-raisers, most potential candidates do not want to discuss the issue, partly out of fear of alienating New Hampshire.

Interview requests to the offices of the Democrats were greeted with initial cheer, but the responses became mostly frosty when the subject of the Nevada caucus surfaced.

Senator Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut was an exception.

"There is a healthy quality to this because you're going to have to be more places," Mr. Dodd said in a telephone interview. "It is true I would not be normally going to Nevada this time of year. It changes the amount of time I spend in the state. I think the country benefits from that."

Smarting from losses in the West in 2004 and looking to gain momentum among Hispanic, exurban, union and other Western voters, the party has calculated that Nevada is the perfect swing-state entree into the 2008 campaign. It also bumped up South Carolina's primary.

For Nevada Democrats, the January caucus will seal their state's importance in national politics.

They point to Las Vegas, the nation's fastest-growing big city, the booming number of Hispanic residents and the local issues that differ from those in other states to underscore why their time has come.

Still, Nevada is not entirely ready to answer questions about logistics.

"I haven't even thought of that," said D. Taylor, secretary of the Culinary Workers Union of Nevada, which lobbied to move up the caucus. "Right now we're focused on a minimum wage bill that comes up in November."

Although Nevada has held a presidential caucus for 40 years, the scope of this event will be well beyond any of those. In 2004, 9,000 people came out to caucus here; 125,000 caucused in Iowa that year.

In previous caucuses, Nevada has set up one location in each of its 17 counties; in 2008, party officials are aiming for 1,000 sites statewide. The Nevada Democratic Party anticipates spending $1 million to train people and publicize the race. "Obviously the process isn't easy," said Kirsten Searer, the state party spokeswoman.

And how, Iowa caucus veterans say.

"It absolutely takes a tremendous amount of money, knowledge and organization to pull off a caucus," Mr. Fischer said. "We have nearly 2,000 precincts in the state of Iowa, and I compared it to planning 2,000 weddings that all go off at the same time."

Unlike primaries, caucuses have myriad built-in impediments to their own success. The first is simply getting people to show up, because going to a caucus takes more time and energy. Precinct captains, some of whom in Iowa have been playing their role for decades, must be trained. Coordinating the reporting of results, perhaps the key component, can be turbid.

"You have to go with your neighbors and publicly declare your support of a candidate, and that can take a couple hours or more to complete," Mr. Fischer explained. "You need a public meeting place, you need to get packets of information to all the precinct captains, who need to be trained in caucus procedures — there is math involved.

"Then, the hardest thing of all is reporting results. There have to be layers of security to make sure they are reporting accurately and timely. You can't have some that report right away and others that wait until 3 a.m."

Unlike the well-trodden coffee shops in Iowa and New Hampshire where candidates awkwardly tossing pancakes are as essential to winter as snowplows and mincemeat pies, Nevada is still puzzling out its pit stops.

Bagel Mania in downtown Las Vegas, a favored spot among power brokers, is in the running. But is it a good place to spot likely Democratic voters? "Absolutely not," said Evan Garfinkel, the restaurant's assistant manager, noting the clientele's conservative leanings. But Mr. Garfinkel anticipates serving the candidates scores of corned beef sandwiches nonetheless.

Nevada officials see their caucus as a chance to showcase issues — growth and water use in particular — that have often been ignored in primaries.

"So much a part of life in the Southwest are overcrowded schools, sitting in traffic, a lack of fire stations and libraries," said Ms. Titus, the candidate for governor, in an interview here. With Hispanics now making up 10 percent of all voters, immigration issues are also expected to be important.

New Hampshire is less than enthused with Nevada's new status. Its officials argue that Nevada's low turnout — its 2004 primary, the state's contest for nonpresidential races, attracted 29 percent of registered voters — and the fact that Nevadans are unschooled in big caucuses are reasons enough to try moving up New Hampshire's date. The Democratic National Committee said it would punish any candidates who participate in a state that violates the official schedule by denying them delegates.

Here is the recent editorial take of one New Hampshire newspaper, The Portsmouth Herald: "What makes more sense — to have a racially diverse population that is not engaged in the political process or to have a predominantly white population that is politically involved and active?" The choice of Nevada, the editorial said, stemmed from "maneuvering by Nevada Senator Harry Reid and the influence of big Las Vegas gambling money on the process."

But national party officials remain confident in their choice.

"Nevada had all those magic things in terms of being a Western state, having a large Hispanic population, a large Asian population and a labor population," said Stacie Paxton, a Democratic National Committee spokeswoman. "We will work with officials from the state party to make sure they are ready to have a successful caucus."

Meanwhile, Democratic attention remains fixed on Ms. Titus. A professor at the University of Nevada and the minority leader in the State Senate, she is battling for the governor's office against Mr. Gibbons, a congressman with deep pockets, longstanding ties to the gambling industry and a lead in the polls.

The attention from national candidates has raised Ms. Titus's profile, garnered free publicity and energized her base. And as Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware tells it, Nevada's caucus rivals are no worse for it.

"I plan on going back out to campaign for Democratic candidates the last couple weeks in October," said Mr. Biden, who has already made one trip to Nevada. "I don't think Iowa or New Hampshire should feel threatened by it."

Arnold Swaps Agendas For Political Resurgence (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, October 13, 2006

LOS ANGELES — Last year, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger looked very much like the Republican he is: He waded into confrontations with the Democratic Legislature and unions of public employees. He proposed caps on state spending and eliminating legislators' long-lasting power to design their districts.

This year, Schwarzenegger has all but become a Democrat. Reversing course after his popularity rating sank to 37%, he joined Democrats in placing proposals on the Nov. 7 ballot to borrow a record $37.3 billion for highways, schools and levees. And he signed a law that made California the first state to try to reduce global warming by forcing industries to cut "greenhouse gas" emissions.

"Last year, he took every one of his moves out of the Republican playbook," says Fabian Núñez, Democratic speaker of the state Assembly. "It was an unsuccessful attempt to make a Democratic state a Republican state. Now he has surrounded himself with people who have encouraged him to wrap himself around the Democratic flag, and it has worked."

Judging from lopsided polling figures, Schwarzenegger is cruising toward election to a second term next month with the panache he exudes at the handlebars of his Harley-Davidson.

Schwarzenegger, elected in 2003 to replace recalled Democrat Gray Davis, holds a 17-point lead in statewide polls over state Treasurer Phil Angelides, 53, the Democratic challenger. The former Hollywood action star had a job-approval rating of 56% in a Los Angeles Times Poll published Oct. 1.

"You rarely see in politics anybody come up from where the governor was," says Mark Baldassare, polling director of the Public Policy Institute of California. "It's a lot easier for voters to lose faith than to regain faith in their leaders."

This year's self-reversal exemplifies the central political mystery of Arnold Schwarzenegger: continual change that has kept voters and politicians guessing whether the Austrian-born, self-made megamillionaire is at heart a Republican, a Democrat or a combination of the two.

In 2004, Schwarzenegger made a last-minute campaign stop with President Bush in crucial Ohio, where the governor runs an annual bodybuilding exposition. This year, he stays out of photo range of Bush, ducking the president's fundraising trips to California.

"I've worked with the governor for three years now, and I still don't know what his values are," says political foe Barbara Kerr, president of the 340,000-member California Teachers Association, who led the successful campaign against the governor's 2005 ballot propositions. "It's very confusing. We just don't know who we're going to see next."

As a Republican in a heavily Democratic state, Schwarzenegger, 59, has clearly abandoned the hard-edged conservatism of 2005. He's managed to re-establish the moderate image that catapulted him to Sacramento after his surprise announcement of candidacy on The Tonight Show, with Jay Leno, in 2003.

He appeared with Leno again Wednesday and joked that political ads linking him to Bush are as silly as "linking me to an Oscar." The Angelides campaign asked NBC for equal time.

Schwarzenegger originally ran as a business-oriented Republican who could make Sacramento's deficit-plagued government work. Yet he favored abortion rights, gay rights, gun control and expanded environmental protection — issues not embraced by more conservative Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0080499

Barely more than half his appointments to state jobs have been Republicans. Half of his judicial appointments are Democrats or independents.

Within a few months of taking office, however, the governor yawed from bipartisan deficit-cutting agreements to ridiculing the Democrats who control the Legislature as “girlie men” and bashing unions of teachers and nurses.

This year, he again has reached out to top Democrats. Together, they chalked up a slate of legislative successes that Schwarzenegger touts in his campaign.

“Who can you trust to do the right thing?” Angelides said Saturday in the only televised debate with the governor. “For three years, Arnold Schwarzenegger was very consistent. Only in the last 60 days, as he sought to save his own job, has he tried to move to the middle.”

Squaring his epic shoulders against dramatic backdrops — a Malibu beach, the San Francisco skyline — the governor has signed legislation committing California to reduce emissions of carbon monoxide and other greenhouse gases 25% by 2020; raising the state minimum wage from $6.75 to $8 an hour and pressuring drugmakers to lower prices of prescription medicines for families earning less than $60,000 a year.

“As people watched him work with opposite numbers in the Legislature, people say, ‘Yeah, this is the guy we voted for in the recall. The governor of last year wasn't that guy,' ” says Matthew Dowd, the governor's chief campaign strategist.

Jack Pitney, a government professor at Claremont McKenna College in Claremont, Calif., says: “The classic question in politics is: What have you done for me lately? And Schwarzenegger has done quite a lot lately.”

Some of the twists and turns that make Schwarzenegger so hard to pinpoint:

·In the special election he called last November, voters defeated a proposal that would have made it tougher for teachers, police, nurses and firefighters to use union dues for political contributions. Also rejected were measures to give the governor more say over spending, to strip legislators of power to map their districts and to fire teachers more easily.

Unions spent $100 million and humbled Schwarzenegger, defeating all his initiatives. The unions are still so angry that they are airing TV ads against his re-election.

The special election was unpopular not only because Schwarzenegger wanted the measures passed, but also because of the expense of holding a fourth election in just over two years.

The defeat on last year's ballot measures deprived Schwarzenegger of the club he had held over legislators' heads: the threat to go directly to the people if the Legislature didn't do his bidding. “In 2005 he decided he was so popular that he could go off on his own and could get things passed by the ballot initiative,” Baldassare says. “He didn't need the Legislature. Now he does.”

Schwarzenegger has expressed contrition since that November night. “The people sent a message loud and clear,” he said in the debate with Angelides. “And that message was, ‘Don't come to us for every little thing. Go to the legislators. You guys work it out.' ”

·Within days of the November debacle, Schwarzenegger purged his staff. He started by replacing a Republican chief of staff with Susan Kennedy, a Democrat and former aide to Davis. The move enraged conservative GOP activists.

Núñez says the governor made the staff changes on the advice of his wife, Maria Shriver, a Democrat of the Kennedy family dynasty.

“She's obviously a very, very important adviser for the governor,” Dowd says. “She's as smart as anyone. She has a network of people she talks to. She provides advice, suggestions.”

·Schwarzenegger named more Democrats to his Cabinet and hired Republican strategists from Bush's 2004 campaign, including Dowd and campaign manager Steve Schmidt. The odd team of pragmatists meshes well, Dowd says.

·An improving economy pushed a $7.5 billion windfall into the treasury, enabling Schwarzenegger to restore $3 billion he'd cut from school funding in previous years. A budget deficit of $16.5 billion when he took office is down to $3.5 billion, he said in the debate.

·Schwarzenegger has raised $41.3 million this year for his campaign, nearly doubling Angelides' $23.2 million. The governor's fundraising from oil, tobacco, real estate and other industries has given Angelides ammunition to charge that the governor has violated a recall-campaign pledge to end the influence of “special interests.”

·After he abruptly switched to embracing a Democratic agenda he had battled for three years, the California Chamber of Commerce, a longtime business ally, opposed Schwarzenegger over the global warming law. The chamber has endorsed his re-election, anyway.

While Schwarzenegger schmoozed with Democrats, he ignored the Legislature's Republican minority this year. “While we were disappointed, there were no real surprises,” Senate Republican leader Dick Ackerman says. “When he ran in the recall election, we knew he was going to be a moderate Republican.”

Núñez and other Democrats say they are ambivalent about handing Schwarzenegger accomplishments that have blocked Angelides' headway on minimum wage and other issues. Democrats had little choice but to help the governor: The Legislature's approval ratings were even lower than Schwarzenegger's.

"Do I go out and stall any effort to advance my own agenda, which is very self-defeating?" Núñez says. "The governor has been able to benefit from that cooperation. But it is a political year. We also want a Democrat elected governor. And it puts us in sort of a quagmire."

Angelides' commercials replay Schwarzenegger with Bush in Ohio to rouse the Democratic base. These days, though, Schwarzenegger's positions oppose Bush on global warming, stem-cell research and other issues.

All of this inconsistency opens Schwarzenegger to charges that he's a flip-flopper. Schwarzenegger's shifts haven't hurt him so far. "One does have to remember at all times that he is an actor," says Kerr of the teachers union. "And people have short memories. He did apologize and appear very sincere. He is a very good actor."

Attempts to link Schwarzenegger with Bush haven't registered in Angelides' polling, says Bill Carrick, Angelides' senior campaign strategist. So Schwarzenegger's zigzagging record is getting more attention from the trailing Democratic candidate.

During the debate, the polished Schwarzenegger attempted to disarm the policy-wonk Angelides with jokes and gentle jabs.

Granted one chance to ask Angelides a question, Schwarzenegger playfully asked the Democrat what his funniest moment was in the campaign.

"Every day is just a hoot — I can't tell you how much fun," Angelides said.

Though some Republican activists are miffed at Schwarzenegger, "conservatives will come out" on Election Day, Ackerman says. "He's stayed true to his pledge of no new taxes."

Schwarzenegger has been so hard to pigeonhole that he provokes a wide range of guesses about what a second term would look like. On the campaign trail, he offers few clues.

Sherry Bebitch Jeffe, a University of Southern California public policy analyst, theorizes that Schwarzenegger will "move to the left because he's more comfortable there.

He feels far more comfortable as an activist liberal than with the conservative part of his party's base."

Ackerman takes an opposite view. He expects Schwarzenegger to again challenge Democrats over legislative reapportionment, cutting public-employee pension costs and winning more budget-cutting power for governors.

Dowd says Schwarzenegger will hew to the bipartisan approach of 2006.

If he wins, Schwarzenegger is apt to start 2007 with his former movie-star appeal restored with Californians. The Los Angeles Times Poll showed that 60% of likely voters have a favorable impression of him.

"They want to like him, because he's fun," Pitney says. "It's fun to have him as governor, fun to tell people you have Arnold Schwarzenegger as your governor. It's something you can brag about to people in other states."

Not Right, 'Tonight' (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 13, 2006

AMONG THE LATE-NIGHT PROMOS you aren't likely ever to hear, add this one: "Coming up on 'The Tonight Show With Jay Leno,' Jay chats up Heidi Klum, Robin Williams and Phil Angelides!"

Not many weeknight couch potatoes would be lured to their TV sets by the prospect of California's Democratic gubernatorial candidate trading quips with Leno about his humble Sacramento upbringing or his plan to raise the income ceilings on Cal Grants, which is why his invitation to appear on the program hasn't so far materialized. Yet it's also why Leno and NBC should have known better than to invite Angelides' more telegenic Republican rival for the governor's office, Arnold Schwarzenegger, on the show just four weeks before the election.

Angelides cried foul after Schwarzenegger's appearance Wednesday night, claiming that NBC is violating the equal-time provision of the Communications Act by not giving him the same consideration as his opponent. He doesn't have much of a legal argument. News interview shows are exempt from the provision, and Leno often interviews important public figures, so his program almost certainly qualifies.

Illegal or not, Schwarzenegger's appearance was clearly inappropriate. Leno at one point asked his friend the governor about the attack ads from Angelides that have sought to tie Schwarzenegger to President Bush, who is deeply unpopular in California. "To link me to George Bush is like linking me to an Oscar," Schwarzenegger replied.

It was the most entertaining line of the night, but it also blew away any pretense that this wasn't a campaign appearance. It's hard to imagine Leno asking just one presidential candidate on his show in the weeks before an election and ignoring the other, and the same should apply to the state race.

DOJ_NMG_0080501

Booking guests on shows like Leno's is all about timing; celebrities appear when they want to promote their newest movie or album, not necessarily when Leno's schedulers want them. The problem is, Schwarzenegger still acts like a movie star rather than a public official, and NBC still treats him that way.

There's no reason he couldn't have been booked after the election rather than before. But just as he made the TV circuit when he wanted to promote his latest "Terminator" movie, now he's doing it to promote himself as governor. Yet different rules apply.

The airwaves are granted to broadcasters for free, with the understanding that they are a public trust. Using them to boost favored candidates for office violates that trust, even if it doesn't violate the law.

Long List Of Laws Headed To Voters (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — Voters next month will decide the most citizen-sponsored referendums in a non-presidential election in nearly 100 years, as groups step up efforts to shape policy by putting measures directly to popular vote.

Eighteen states will decide 76 ballot initiatives in November, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures. That's exceeded only by 87 such measures in 1914 — when initiatives were popular as part of the Progressive movement that fought moneyed special interests, the conference says.

There were also 87 ballot measures in 1996, which was a presidential election year.

"We're seeing initiatives go more and more into battleground states," said University of Florida political scientist Daniel Smith, a leading expert on initiatives. "Groups want to use them to mobilize their supporters."

Ohio has four initiatives, including a labor-backed proposal to raise the minimum wage, which sponsors hope will help Democrats in close races for governor, Senate and two House seats. In Missouri, an initiative to allow stem cell research could influence a tight Senate race.

"A lot of regional and national groups have become very adept at using the initiative process, and they have deep pockets so they can operate campaigns in a number of states," said Jennie Bowser, a policy analyst for the legislatures conference.

Initiatives increase voter turnout, particularly in non-presidential election years, and can sway other contests by drawing attention to how candidates stand on the initiative questions, Smith said. His study last year showed that a referendum to bar same-sex marriage in Ohio in 2004 helped President Bush carry that state and win a second term.

This year, "progressives are taking a page out of the right-wing playbook" by putting questions on ballots in Ohio, Colorado and four other key states to raise the minimum wage, said Kristina Wilfore, executive director of the liberal Ballot Initiative Strategy Center.

Unions are sponsoring those initiatives, even though few members earn minimum wage, to help pro-labor Democrats, AFL-CIO President John Sweeney said.

Citizens in 24 states can use initiatives to enact new laws by gathering signatures to put questions on a ballot. Since the 1970s, many initiatives have curtailed taxes, imposed term limits and restricted campaign fundraising.

Next month, voters in 33 states also will decide 121 additional ballot measures sponsored by legislatures. Those often involve less-contentious matters such a borrowing money, but they also cover topics such as same-sex marriage.

The 76 ballot initiatives do not include five "citizen vetoes" in which voters are being asked to repeal laws, such as South Dakota's near-total ban on abortion.

Other measures on ballots Nov. 7 would limit public smoking, restrict taxes and increase school spending.

Those issues don't motivate voters the way minimum wage and same-sex marriage can because they have "no clear partisan or ideological dimension," said Stephen Nicholson, a political scientist at the University of California, Merced. "The critical thing is to choose an issue where you're certain support is going to be strong and stay strong."

Ex-President Ford Has Medical Tests (AP-Y)

AP-Yahoo, October 13, 2006

Gerald Ford, the nation's oldest living former president, was in a hospital Thursday and undergoing medical tests, his office said.

Ford, 93, was doing well at Eisenhower Medical Center, spokeswoman Penny Circle said in a statement. She did not disclose the nature of the tests.

The former president has been hospitalized repeatedly this year.

DOJ_NMG_0080502

He underwent heart procedures in August at the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn., then returned to his home in Rancho Mirage. He received an implantable cardiac pacemaker to regulate his heartbeat and underwent angioplasty, with stents in two of his coronary arteries to increase blood flow.

In July, Ford was admitted to Colorado's Vail Valley Medical Center for a few days because of shortness of breath. In January, he was hospitalized for 12 days in Rancho Mirage to treat pneumonia.

Five years ago, Ford suffered two small strokes and spent about a week in a hospital.

Ford, a Michigan Republican, was House minority leader when President Nixon chose him to replace Spiro Agnew, who resigned, as vice president in 1973. Ford became president on Aug. 9, 1974, when Nixon resigned amid the Watergate scandal.

U.N. Nears Action On N. Korea (LAT)

By Maggie Farley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 13, 2006

A deal on a draft sanctions resolution specifies that it cannot lead to military action, allaying Russian and Chinese concerns.

UNITED NATIONS — The Security Council edged closer to agreement Thursday on a draft sanctions resolution designed to strangle North Korea's missile and nuclear programs and their funding in response to the country's announced nuclear test.

After a flurry of high-level negotiations in Washington, Beijing and Moscow, diplomats at the United Nations worked out a compromise specifying that the resolution could not be used as a basis for military action.

The new draft was sent to capitals for consideration in time for a possible vote today or Saturday.

The resolution also calls for an embargo on conventional weapons, a ban on luxury goods, a prohibition against materials related to North Korea's missile and nuclear programs and a freeze on financial activities that support them, as well as a travel ban for senior North Korean officials. It would also allow the interception and inspection of suspected nuclear and missile materials going to and from North Korea.

Russia and China, sensitive to the prospect of intrusive activity so close to their borders, are concerned about whether proposed inspections of all North Korean cargo would be legal. The neighbors, which as permanent members of the Security Council hold veto power, had balked at an earlier draft circulated by the United States on Thursday. The new measure says the inspections should be "cooperative."

The U.S. added the provision against military action after a special envoy from China met with President Bush, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and national security advisor Stephen Hadley at the White House. The envoy, Tang Jiaxuan, told them that China agreed that "strong measures" were needed to punish North Korea but that it only wanted sanctions related to the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction, National Security Council spokesman Frederick Jones said.

Afterward, Rice acknowledged it would take a little more effort on both sides to come up with a draft acceptable to China, which would have to implement many of the sanctions.

"I think the Chinese clearly understand the gravity of the situation," Rice said. "They clearly understand that the North Koreans in doing this have made the environment much less stable and much less secure." She said that if the vote did not happen today, "I think it will be soon."

Tang goes to Moscow for meetings today and Saturday, while South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun travels to Beijing to discuss the issue.

"I don't want to say we've reached agreement, but many, many of the significant differences have been closed," said U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton, after a breakthrough meeting among the Security Council's permanent members and Japan. "But I'm very pleased with the progress we've made, and I think it's close to the point where we will have an agreement."

Russian Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said he had urged Bolton on Thursday morning to slow down the process to ensure full agreement by the council and to prevent problems in the resolution's implementation.

Bolton said the United States would consider changes in the resolution but was determined to vote on it by the end of the week. He left it "open to interpretation" which day he meant.

"I think the council should try to respond to a nuclear test within the same week that the test occurred," Bolton said. "We're certainly in favor of keeping all the diplomatic channels open, but we also want swift action, and we shouldn't allow meetings and more meetings … to be an excuse for inaction."

Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya said the resolution should be "firm, forceful and appropriate." He said he was willing to accept an article of Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter — at the heart of the debate on the North Korea resolution — authorizing economic sanctions, but not the part that allows military action.

The United States, Britain and France — the other permanent members of the Security Council — argue that the issue is a test of the council's authority.

DOJ_NMG_0080503

British Ambassador Emyr Jones Parry said, "If you can't even vote Chapter 7 when a country performs a nuclear test, you have to wonder whether we'll be using Chapter 7 ever again.

"There is a perception — a misperception — that it leads to military action. It does not."

North Korean Ambassador Pak Gil Yon repeated a threat that his government would consider Security Council sanctions a declaration of war.

"We will take counter-measures," he told The Times.

He said that he did not know if the nuclear test had a smaller explosion than expected but that it had achieved its aims. "I am not a scientist. All I know is that the test was successful."

U.N. Near Agreement On N. Korea Sanctions (WP)

Arms Embargo Among Resolution's Provisions

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 12 -- The U.N. Security Council moved closer Thursday night to agreement on a resolution that would impose an arms embargo and broad financial sanctions on North Korea in response to its claimed nuclear test, according to senior U.S. and European diplomats.

The council's five major powers -- the United States, Russia, China, Britain and France -- and Japan hammered out a compromise text that was to be sent to capitals Thursday night for approval, diplomats said. The preliminary deal was struck after the United States, acting at the request of China, included assurances that the resolution could not be used as a pretext for future military action against North Korea.

"I don't want to say we've reached agreement, but many, many of the significant differences have been closed," John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador, said after the meeting. "But I'm very pleased with the progress we've made, and I think it's close to the point where we will have an agreement."

"It was a good meeting," added French Ambassador Jean-Marc de La Sabliere. "We will now send the outcome of this meeting to our capitals. We are close to an agreement."

The diplomatic movement came hours after President Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met in Washington with China's state councilor, Tang Jiaxuan.

Bush and Rice pressed Tang to support a series of tough measures designed to compel North Korea to halt its nuclear activities and resume multiparty talks aimed at eliminating Pyongyang's nuclear weapons.

A U.S.-backed draft resolution presented to the council earlier Thursday would impose an arms embargo on North Korea, ban all trade linked to its programs for ballistic missiles and nuclear weapons, and permit international inspections of North Korean cargo.

The U.S. text would also prohibit North Korean trade in luxury goods, and would ban travel and freeze assets of individuals involved in the country's prohibited weapons programs. North Korea would be given 30 days to halt its nuclear activities or face additional international penalties.

China has resisted the U.S. approach as too tough, instead favoring U.N. sanctions that would narrowly target North Korea's programs for nuclear and ballistic missiles. In an effort to address China's concern, the United States has agreed to include more restrictive language on the scope of military sanctions and inspections.

Rice told reporters that she, Bush and national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley "had excellent talks" with Tang, a senior official who outranks the foreign minister.

"I think the Chinese clearly understand the gravity of the situation," Rice said. "They clearly understand that the North Koreans in doing this have made the environment much less stable and much less secure."

China has voiced concern that international inspections of North Korean cargo would excessively intrude into the country's commercial affairs.

Beijing also expressed concern that the resolution invokes a provision of the U.N. Charter, Chapter 7, that has been used in the past to authorize military force. China insists that the text should refer to a section of Chapter 7, Article 41, that authorizes only sanctions.

Security Council diplomats said the United States and China are working on compromise language that would split the difference. It would refer to Chapter 7 but would require explicit council approval to consider any action against North Korea.

Russia's ambassador, Vitaly Churkin, meanwhile, said early Thursday that Moscow needs more time to consider the U.S. draft. He said a vote should be delayed until after Russian officials hold high-level meetings in Moscow with a senior Chinese delegation on Friday and Saturday.

DOJ_NMG_0080504

But council diplomats said Russia softened its opposition after Rice agreed in a phone conversation with Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov to drop U.S. opposition to a Russian-backed resolution criticizing its neighbor Georgia, which recently detained seven Russian soldiers who were accused of spying.

Rice, China In Agreement On North Korea (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, October 13, 2006

China agrees that North Korea's nuclear test was a grave development that makes Northeast Asia much less secure, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday after talks with a Chinese envoy.

Rice predicted the U.N. Security Council would respond to North Korea's nuclear test "with a very good resolution that will demonstrate to the North Koreans that the international community is very much united in its condemnation of this test."

President Bush, pursuing a diplomatic solution, spoke with Australian Prime Minister John Howard by telephone and they agreed on the need for a strong U.N. resolution to punish North Korea, a spokesman said.

Bush and Howard said any resolution should be adopted under Chapter 7 of the U.N. charter, which means it could be enforced militarily, National Security Council spokesman Frederick Jones said.

The Chinese envoy, State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan, met briefly with Bush in the Oval Office and conferred at the White House with Rice, national security adviser Stephen Hadley and Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill.

"I think the Chinese clearly understand the gravity of the situation," Rice told reporters later at the State Department. "They clearly understand that the North Koreans doing this have made the environment much less stable, much less secure."

Rice credited China with working very hard to get a tough resolution through the Security Council.

But at the United Nations, Russia urged the United States not to rush a vote but to await the results of high-level diplomacy. China said it would welcome more talks so the council could send a united and forceful message to North Korea.

After his stop in Washington, Tang is due to hold talks in Moscow with Russian officials.

The United States, China, Russia, Japan and South Korea are in a six-party negotiating arrangement with North Korea designed to stop the communist government from making nuclear weapons in exchange for economic and other concessions.

Washington has publicly reassured North Korea that the U.S. has no intention of attacking it.

Deputy national security adviser J.D. Crouch told reporters traveling with Bush to St. Louis on Thursday that the meeting with the Chinese envoy went well.

"I think it's a positive sign that we all agree that we need a resolution and that we need to go forward with strong measures," he said.

U.S. Tones Down U.N. Sanctions Draft (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, October 13, 2006

NEW YORK -- The United States yesterday watered down elements of its U.N. Security Council condemnation of North Korea to win crucial support from Russia and China, but appeared unlikely to get the vote it is seeking by today.

Washington wants a tough rebuke this week of Pyongyang's announcement of a nuclear test, as well as legally binding measures to close down the communist state's access to nuclear and military materiel and illicit sources of funding.

"Differences remain on some important aspects of the resolution," John R. Bolton, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, acknowledged after a morning of meetings. "We will continue to work on it, but not at the cost of sending a swift and strong response."

But Russian and Chinese U.N. ambassadors urged the resolution co-sponsors to slow down and leave some room for diplomacy -- both in their own capitals and directly with the North Korean regime.

China launched its own initiative yesterday, dispatching State Councilor for Foreign Affairs Tang Jiaxuan to Washington, where he met with President Bush in the Oval Office and also conferred at the White House with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley and Assistant Secretary of State for East Asia Christopher R. Hill. Today he plans to travel to Russia for further talks.

"I think the Chinese clearly understand the gravity of the situation," Miss Rice told reporters later at the State Department. "They clearly understand that the North Koreans doing this have made the environment much less stable, much less secure."

She credited China with working very hard to get a tough resolution through the Security Council.

Miss Rice plans to visit Japan Monday, while South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun is expected in Beijing the day before for meetings with top officials.

DOJ_NMG_0080505

Pyongyang, meanwhile, leveled new threats at Japan, which on Wednesday announced a unilateral halt to trade with North Korea and a ban on its vessels entering Japanese ports. Tokyo today approved additional measures, including a total ban on imports from the country.

A North Korean diplomat in Japan, Song Il Ho, told the Kyodo News agency his country "will take strong countermeasures."

The U.S.-drafted resolution, which is co-sponsored by Japan, Britain, France and Slovakia, calls for all states to embargo materials that could contribute to North Korea's nuclear, ballistic missile or weapons programs, freeze assets linked to counterfeiting and smuggling, and impose a travel ban on senior officials. It allows states to inspect cargo moving to or from the North's ports.

The resolution also demands that Pyongyang immediately renounce nuclear weapons and return to various international nonproliferation regimes, and resume without preconditions the six-party talks with the United States and the North's neighbors.

The resolution makes provisions for humanitarian assistance and legitimate trade on which the bankrupt and famine-wracked nation depends.

The newest versions of the resolution delete language that would have demanded that nations close their ports to North Korean goods, ships and planes.

Mr. Bolton yesterday acknowledged "a relatively modest number of changes" but insisted the draft still had enough teeth to curtail North Korea's illegal trading and pursuit of nuclear weapons and energy programs.

The Security Council has been meeting in various formats every day since Pyongyang said early Monday that it had tested a nuclear device. That action galvanized many nations, including those which Mr. Bolton had taunted as Pyongyang's "protectors in the council."

"The nuclear test conducted by [North Korea] is an irresponsible action and this action has to be firmly opposed and condemned," said Wang Guangya, China's ambassador to the United Nations.

"The response and action the council is considering should be firm, forceful and also appropriate," he added. "By appropriate I mean it should reflect the feelings of the international community and more important, should [lead] to a solution of this issue by peaceful means."

U.S. And Japan Try To Get China On Board For Sanctions Against N. Korea (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, October 13, 2006

SEOUL — The United States and Japan are pressing the U.N. Security Council — including a reluctant China — for a vote as early as today on sanctions against North Korea for its reported nuclear test.

The Security Council is considering a U.S.-drafted proposal that would impose wide-ranging sanctions on the reclusive communist state. The latest draft also would demand that the North return to six-party talks without preconditions and that it “not conduct any further nuclear test or launch of a ballistic missile.”

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met Thursday in Washington with Chinese envoy Tang Jiaxuan. She said China agrees that North Korea's announcement Monday of a nuclear test was a grave development and predicted that the Security Council would respond “with a very good resolution.”

Though China denounced North Korea in harsh terms, it has in the past balked at imposing serious sanctions on the Pyongyang government. It fears that economic pressure could destabilize North Korean dictator Kim Jong Il's regime, which could send refugees into China. Russia's U.N. Ambassador Vitaly Churkin also urged the United States not to rush to a vote, saying it should wait for results of diplomatic meetings.

Japan's U.N. ambassador, Kenzo Oshima, said a vote would “most likely” take place Saturday. As two of five permanent Security Council members, China and Russia have veto power and could kill a resolution.

It's unclear how North Korea would respond to punitive measures. North Korean officials have threatened to retaliate against Japan, which said it will ban North Korean imports, bar their ships and block travel to Japan by North Korean officials. “We will take strong countermeasures,” North Korean diplomat Song Il Ho told Japan's Kyodo News. Japan's sanctions are likely to take effect today.

South Koreans, meanwhile, debated how to respond to North Korea's defiant behavior. The South Korean parliament passed a non-binding resolution Thursday condemning the reported test.

A poll published Thursday by the conservative JoongAng Daily newspaper showed that 78% of South Koreans want changes in their government's conciliatory “Sunshine Policy” of aid to North Korea with no strings attached.

“We kept giving to North Korea,” said Shin Wha Lee, a professor of political science and international relations at Korea University in Seoul. “They want to talk with us only if and when they need aid.”

DOJ_NMG_0080506

The JoongAng Poll also showed 65% of the 760 adults surveyed said South Korea should have its own nuclear weapons program. But many are less worried about a North Korean nuclear test than a regional nuclear arms race.

"It will have a domino effect," said Yu Hoon, 48, a sales representative for an Internet phone company. "Japan and Taiwan will want to have nuclear weapons." Those countries said this week that they would not develop nuclear arms.

U.N. Close To Sanctions For North Korea (AP-Y)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP-Yahoo, October 13, 2006

Key U.N. Security Council members moved closer to agreement late Thursday on a U.S.-proposed resolution that would impose sanctions but no military measures against North Korea because of its claimed nuclear test.

Tougher earlier drafts by the United States met opposition from Russia and China who wanted a more moderate response to Pyongyang's nuclear brinkmanship to try to persuade the reclusive communist nation to return to six-party talks on its nuclear program.

Both countries wanted to focus on reining in the North's weapons programs and China wanted to ensure that nothing in the draft could trigger military action.

The new U.S. draft circulated Thursday night tries to satisfy both the United States and China on the scope of sanctions. It also eliminates a blanket arms embargo in the previous draft, instead targeting specific equipment for sanctions including missiles, tanks, warships and combat aircraft.

The United States reported significant progress in bridging differences with Russia and China after more than two hours of closed-door negotiations among ambassadors from the five permanent council nations — the U.S., Russia, China, Britain and France — and Japan's ambassador who is the current council president.

The U.S. said it hoped a vote could be held on Friday though close ally Japan said Saturday was more likely.

"We have made very substantial progress," U.S. Ambassador John Bolton told reporters after the meeting. "I don't want to say we've reached agreement yet, but many, many of the significant differences have been closed, very much to our satisfaction."

A new draft of the resolution was sent to capitals Thursday night so ministers can examine the latest changes. Bolton said the full Security Council is meeting Friday morning.

China's U.N. Ambassador Wang Guangya agreed that "good progress has been made" in improving the text. Russia's U.N. Ambassador Vitaly Churkin said there had been "a number of improvements" and, importantly, council unity "is in good shape."

"We should act with a cool head and moderation and also do everything to achieve a political, diplomatic outcome of this problem — and this is the spirit we had in those discussions," Churkin said. "It's not assured we're going to get there, but the mood is good and the effort is good, too."

North Korea warned it would have a firm response to sanctions, Japan's Kyodo News Agency reported from Pyongyang.

"We will take strong countermeasures," Kyodo quoted Song Il Ho, North Korea's ambassador in charge of diplomatic normalization talks with Japan, as saying.

The new U.S. draft expresses "profound concern" at the increased tension generated by North Korea's claim to have tested a nuclear device and therefore determines there is "a clear threat to international peace and security."

The major compromise, which appears to have satisfied both China and the United States, was on sanctions.

The United States insisted the resolution must be under Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter — which authorizes punishments ranging from breaking diplomatic ties and imposing economic sanctions to naval blockades and military actions — because of the gravity of North Korea's action.

China opposed a blanket reference to Chapter 7 and only wanted measures under one of its articles — Article 41 which authorizes non-military sanctions such as economic penalties, breaking diplomatic relations and banning air travel.

The new draft states that the Security Council would act under Chapter 7 of the U.N. Charter and only take measures under Article 41. It also underlines that the Security Council would have to adopt a new resolution "should additional measures be necessary" against North Korea.

The U.S. proposal eliminates the blanket arms embargo and would instead impose sanctions on specific equipment including tanks, combat aircraft, warships and missiles.

It keeps the requirement that all countries prevent the sale or transfer of luxury goods and material and technology which could contribute to North Korea's nuclear, ballistic missile or other weapons of mass destruction-related programs.

DOJ_NMG_0080507

Like the previous draft, the new draft would condemn the nuclear test, demand that North Korea immediately return to six-party talks without preconditions, and impose sanctions for Pyongyang's "flagrant disregard" of the council's appeal not to detonate a device. It would also demand that North Korea "not conduct any further nuclear test or launch of a ballistic missile."

Beijing and Moscow objected to the wide scope of financial sanctions and a provision authorizing the inspection of cargo going in and out of North Korea, council diplomats said, speaking on condition of anonymity because talks are private. There is concern among some diplomats that boarding North Korean ships could lead to a military response from the North.

The latest draft keeps the financial freeze on individuals and entities with any connection to North Korea's weapons or missile programs as well as a travel ban on those associated with the programs. But it changes the focus of the provision on inspections.

In the previous draft, all countries were authorized to inspect cargo to and from North Korea, "as necessary," to ensure compliance with the sanctions and to prevent illicit trafficking.

In the new draft, all countries are authorized to take "cooperative action including through inspection of cargo ... in particular to prevent illicit trafficking in nuclear, chemical or biological weapons, their means of delivery and related materials."

China And Russia Stall Sanctions On North Korea (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 12 — The American push to win Security Council backing for tough, swift sanctions against North Korea appeared to be set back by China and Russia on Thursday, in an echo of the obstacles the United States faces in a similar push to punish Iran.

The United States circulated a softened draft resolution to the Security Council in response to North Korea's assertion that it conducted a nuclear test on Monday. The United States pressed for a vote by Friday, but China and Russia immediately signaled their opposition to critical parts of the measure and said they needed more time.

China sent an emissary to the White House, Tang Jiaxuan, who met with President Bush on Thursday and appeared to be walking a line between punishing North Korea and preventing the United States from taking measures that would seriously threaten the government, according to the deputy national security adviser, J. D. Crouch.

A senior Bush administration official said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was considering a trip to Beijing, Seoul and Tokyo as early as next week to negotiate punitive steps over and above those that might be acceptable to the full Security Council.

The revised draft resolution dropped earlier Japanese amendments prohibiting North Korean ships from entering any port and North Korean aircraft from taking off or landing in any country. Japan is imposing its own new sanctions on North Korea, including a limit on imports and a ban on North Korean ships in Japanese waters.

The resolution still cites Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, which makes sanctions mandatory and suggests the possibility of military enforcement. China and Russia have consistently opposed Chapter VII enforcement for North Korea.

The United States was able to win a unanimous Security Council resolution condemning North Korea's missile launchings last July only by dropping the reference to Chapter VII, but John R. Bolton, the American ambassador to the United Nations, said he would resist that step this time.

"In light of the fact that North Korea has claimed a test of a nuclear device, we need stronger language," he said.

The draft calls for international inspections of cargo going into and out of North Korea to block transport of weapons-related material, a section that has aroused particular objections from China, which is wary of such interdiction moves being conducted off its coasts.

American officials, while acknowledging how difficult it will be to win Security Council backing for the tough sanctions they prefer, insist that even a weaker resolution would send a strong signal of international condemnation.

The revised draft still requires all countries to prevent the sale or transfer of arms, luxury goods and material related to North Korea's nuclear, ballistic missile and unconventional weapons programs. It maintains a ban on travel by officials connected to those programs and a freeze on their assets.

The new draft omits an earlier mention of curbs on activities benefiting North Korea like "counterfeiting, money-laundering or narcotics," but Mr. Bolton said those activities were covered by the resolution's freeze of North Korean assets, which includes those from "illicit means."

The measure also calls on North Korea to return to the six-nation talks involving South Korea, China, Japan, Russia and the United States that it walked out of 13 months ago.

As for the international inspections, Mr. Bolton said that the United States already had the power to inspect cargoes under the American-led Proliferation Security Initiative, a group of more than 70 countries that have pledged to seize illicit weapons as they move across oceans or are transported by air. But he said the United States wanted language in the resolution that would make it binding on all 192 member states of the United Nations.

China and Russia said they believed the steps recommended by Washington could end up doing more harm than good. “As we know in this problem and in this part of the world,” Vitaly I. Churkin, the Russian ambassador, said, “some strong statements made by others in the Security Council have hurt the entire thing and have aggravated matters, so we do not want to repeat this on the level of the Security Council.”

Sounding a note of exasperation, Mr. Bolton protested as “simply incorrect” the interpretation that Chapter VII sets a pretext for military force, as many countries at the United Nations believe it did in Iraq.

“It would require a separate resolution, if one were needed, to authorize force,” he said.

Mr. Bolton said the United States was still open to changes but was determined to produce a decision by the end of the week.

“I think that the Council should try to respond to a nuclear test within the same week that the test occurred,” he said. “I don’t think that’s too much to ask for.”

Mr. Bolton had begun the week highlighting the unanimity of outrage over the North Korean move and expressing the conviction that in this instance the Council would act quickly and decisively.

To those who might claim that Thursday’s indecision encouraged Iran to believe that it had little to fear from the Security Council in next week’s scheduled debate, Mr. Bolton expressed confidence that the Council would take firm action and that it would set a good example. “I’m sure they’re watching in Tehran,” he said.

Mr. Churkin said he had asked Mr. Bolton on Thursday morning not to call for a vote, “but what happened, happened.”

Mr. Churkin and Wang Guangya, the Chinese ambassador, said high-level negotiations over the resolution’s terms were going on in major capitals over the weekend and ought not to be pre-empted by a hasty vote.

“Of course, some people are talking about a possible vote tomorrow,” Mr. Wang said. “I’m not sure, but I think we have to see the final text, because there are many common grounds that members agree, but there are some disagreements.”

Mr. Bolton responded, “We’re certainly very much in favor of keeping all the diplomatic channels open, but we also want swift action and we shouldn’t allow meetings and more meetings and more meetings and more meetings to be an excuse for inaction.”

Mr. Wang said that Beijing thought the North Korean claim that it tested a nuclear device was an “irresponsible action” which had to be “firmly opposed and condemned.”

But, he added: “More important, it should be helpful for leading to a solution of this issue by peaceful means. It should also create conditions for the parties to once again engage in negotiations to settle this issue.”

Richard A. Grenell, Mr. Bolton’s spokesman, said the Russians and Chinese were already blocking action on other issues before the Security Council regarding places like Zimbabwe, Sudan, Iran and Myanmar, formerly Burma. “It’s all right to keep talking if you are really going to get action, but not if it’s just delay and delay and delay,” he said.

Asked if the United States would settle for a less than unanimous vote, Mr. Bolton said, “We would always like the highest number of votes in the Security Council and we have not given up on our efforts to achieve that, but we have also said that it’s important what we send a very clear signal.”

Acknowledging the lack of unanimity, Mr. Bolton said: “We don’t have it yet. Differences remain, there are still differences on some important aspects of the resolution.”

He said, “We are going to continue to work on it, but we’re not going to work on it at the cost of losing sending a swift and strong response.”

Understanding China's Place In N. Korea Situation (LAT)

By Mark Magnier

The Los Angeles Times, October 13, 2006

BEIJING -- Beijing's reaction to North Korea's nuclear testing announcement was unusually swift and forceful. Within hours on Monday, the normally slow to react Chinese government characterized Pyongyang's action as "hanran," meaning brazen, a term generally reserved for its worst enemies.

By midweek, however, China was sounding more like its old self: calling for dialogue, eschewing confrontation and warning against comprehensive economic sanctions, even as it redoubled efforts to lurch its longtime ally back to the negotiating table.

As North Korea's top supplier of energy and food, Beijing is viewed as the key to a tough international response at the United Nations to North Korean leader Kim Jong Il's provocation. And Washington, for its part, argues that China must be a "responsible stakeholder" if it wants a leading role in international society.

But with its go-slow stance, Beijing has been exposed to foreign criticism that it is squandering a golden opportunity to display global leadership.

The problem, analysts say, is that China draws much different conclusions than Washington, even in the middle of a nuclear crisis, because it has a very different idea of what's important and what it needs to survive and prosper.

While the United States and Europe view a nuclear North Korea as a fundamental threat to the global order, China sees it less as a problem in its own right than as a catalyst for secondary headaches including the possible destabilization of the Korean Peninsula and militarization of Japan.

"America wants to see North Korea go away, representing the final victory of the Cold War," said Alexandre Mansourov, a security expert with the Asia-Pacific Center for Security Studies in Honolulu. "China's interests, however, lie in keeping North Korea in place. China's not doing this because it loves Kim Jong Il, but because it wants the buffer to remain."

Furthermore, Beijing appears to be less worried about a nuclear-armed North Korea.

"There's a big perception gap," said Jin Linbo, Asia-Pacific director at Beijing's China Institute of International Studies. "China has a different assessment of the danger."

Beijing already lives in a tough neighborhood where nuclear neighbors are abundant. It nearly went to war with a nuclear Russia in the 1960s and more recently watched Pakistan and rival India join the club. China is not all that impressed by Pyongyang's nuclear technology, analysts add, nor does it see itself as an intended target.

China's current stage bears similarities to the United States from the Civil War to World War I, says Jin Canrong, vice dean of foreign relations at Beijing's Renmin University. It is industrializing rapidly, weathering a huge population shift from rural to urban areas and is grappling with enormous social problems related to rising expectations and a widening wealth gap.

In the same way America was primarily isolationist as it focused on internal development, China's leadership seeks enough time and international stability to lift its people out of poverty, ease societal stresses and keep enough money flowing to ensure the continued monopoly position of the Communist Party.

A bigger danger than North Korean nukes from China's perspective is of Washington destablizing the region. Beijing apparently believes it needs North Korea as a buffer against the 30,000 or so U.S. troops stationed in South Korea to guard against an attack by Kim.Beijing, along with Russia, fears sanctions could lead to regime change in Pyongyang and growing U.S. influence in their backyard. Sanctions presaged the U.S.-led NATO removal of Slobodan Milosevic in Serbia and the 2003 Iraq invasion that unseated Saddam Hussein.

Moreover, if Kim fell, the risk of refugees flooding across the border into China is a frightening economic and social prospect.

Also weighing on China's mind is a fear that precipitate action could disrupt its courtship of South Korea, analysts say. If the Pyongyang regime collapses in the near future in the wake of sanctions or direct military action, the United States would retain significant influence over a Seoul-dominated Korean peninsula. Keeping Kim in place, on the other hand, would eventually see both Koreas in China's camp.

"South Korea is the big prize in all of this," said Ralph Cossa, executive director of Honolulu-based Pacific Forum CSIS.

Since relations were normalized in 1992, Beijing has watched approvingly as anti-American sentiment has grown in South Korea, U.S. troop levels have declined, China supplanted the United States as Seoul's largest trading partner and trendy young Koreans have dropped their English-language classes in droves to study Mandarin. A sign of China's growing confidence is its support for South Korean Foreign Minister Ban Ki-moon as the next U.N. Secretary General, a nominee it would have condemned as a U.S. puppet a decade ago.

None of which is to say that North Korea doesn't infuriate Beijing. Despite receiving much of its food and an estimated 70 percent of its energy from China, the North is often ungrateful and defiant knowing China's interests would be hurt by its collapse. The way Pyongyang sees it, analysts add, Beijing merely writes the checks while it is doing the heavy lifting in the front-line battle against Western imperialists.

North Korea has also timed its outbursts with seeming disregard for its giant neighbor.

Its 1998 missile launch over the main island of Honshu boosted Japanese public support for an American missile defense plan, hurting Beijing's interests.

Its February 2005 announcement of reactivated nuclear activity, in the middle of Chinese New Year, infuriated Chinese officials forced to cut short their holiday.

And the announcement Monday morning occurred during one of the most important political events on the Chinese calendar -- the Communist Party's four-day central committee meeting.

Chinese leaders, with their love of pageantry, don't like tearing up their domestic or foreign scripts. The test by Beijing's mercurial neighbor not only overshadowed the meeting but also discredited President Hu Jintao's main foreign policy initiative -- six-party talks on the North Korean nuclear issue, with Pyongyang, the U.S., South Korea, Russia and Japan.

DOJ_NMG_0080510

China's biggest nightmare emerging from the crisis is a nuclear Japan, although it remains confident that won't happen given divisions in Japanese society and Washington's own fears it would spur a regional arms race.

While Beijing sees far less danger in a nuclear North Korea than Washington, however, it remains under pressure to bring its stance somewhat more in line with the U.S. position. Too many other countries are angry and the North's defiance threatens to embolden other nuclear wannabe regimes, undercutting the global stability China needs to grow and prosper internally. Nor can Beijing afford to alienate the U.S., its biggest customer, by appearing too cozy with Pyongyang.

China apparently also figures it would have more influence by supporting and watering down a U.N. sanctions resolution than it would through outright opposition. Seoul and Beijing both know that North Korea can take more punishment right now: the fall harvest gives the impoverished country some breathing room.

This all leaves Beijing seeking an equilibrium closer to the U.S. position but not so close that it deals a death knell to the North Korean regime.

Adding to Beijing's lumbering pace this week, analysts say, is its cumbersome decision-making system. Because policy for centuries has been made by a tiny elite behind closed doors, the system can fall short during periods of rapid change as other parts of the government await directives handed down from on high.

Beijing has certainly taken more global responsibility, as seen by its recent decision to send 1,000 peacekeeper troops to Lebanon. By and large, however, it tries to avoid getting entangled in too many overseas responsibilities in line with a multidecade game plan.

"China measures history in centuries, not the next quarter," said Mansourov, of the Asia-Pacific Center for Security Studies.. "There's a notion that China will play out an American scenario, but they don't see it that way. They have a very different national interest."

Japan Takes Lead In Sanctioning N. Korea (AP)

By Eric Talmadge, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 13, 2006

The Yong Gwang 1, one of 24 North Korean merchant ships docked in Japanese ports, bobs beside a pier loaded to the gills with its prized cargo — rusty old bicycles that can fetch a good price on the black market in the impoverished North.

For years, this port on the Sea of Japan coast has been a regular stop for the North Koreans. But that will end Friday when Japan adopts the toughest sanctions by any country so far in response to North Korea's nuclear test.

Tokyo's sanctions include the closure of all Japanese ports to North Korean vessels, a ban on imports and exports, and a six-month ban on travel to Japan by all North Korean government officials.

In this quiet port town, North Korean trade has been a constant. The ships arrive loaded with crabs, clams or "matsutake" mushrooms, a delicacy among Japanese gourmets.

They return home filled with used bicycles or old household electrical appliances the Japanese might normally throw away, but which can be sold for a good price in the North.

The sanctions, approved by Japan's ruling party on Thursday, were to be finalized by Prime Minister Shinzo Abe's Cabinet on Friday. Fishermen here said the North Korean crews have been told to pack up and leave by midnight Friday.

"We will feel it here," said dock worker Koji Kanetsuki of the bans. "But the world needs to do something. Japan has been through Hiroshima and Nagasaki. No good will come out of having nuclear weapons."

North Korea immediately condemned the move.

Song Il Ho, North Korea's ambassador in charge of diplomatic normalization talks with Japan, said his country would take "strong countermeasures" if Japan goes through with the sanctions, according to Japan's Kyodo News.

But Japan's action also underscores the difficulty of punishing the already isolated regime of Kim Jong Il.

Though it is the world's second-largest economy and a regional trade dynamo, Japan represents less than 5 percent of the total trade with North Korea, according to the Korea Trade-Investment Promotion Agency.

The North's most crucial trading partner by far is China, which accounts for 38.9 percent of its imports and exports, followed by South Korea, at 26 percent. In fact, even Thailand outstrips Japan — accounting for 8.1 percent in 2005.

And China and South Korea aren't likely to follow Japan's hard-line example.

Beijing, Pyongyang's closest political ally, has strongly criticized North Korea but has stressed that while action should be taken, it should be "appropriate" and not so severe that it would topple Kim's fragile regime.

Trade between North Korea and China has actually expanded substantially while the efforts to bring the North back to the nuclear negotiating table have fizzled over the past year, largely over the North's demand that the U.S. lift financial sanctions.

DOJ_NMG_0080511

China's total imports and exports with North Korea jumped 14 percent last year to $2.2 billion, according to the Commerce Ministry in Beijing. The North is believed to rely on China for 90 percent of its oil.

North Korea has little to offer in return — Pyongyang ran a $1 billion deficit last year.

China's reluctance to slap tough sanctions on the North has complicated talks in the United Nations, where what to do is still being mulled in the Security Council. The United States, Japan and their allies are pushing for stern action, but Russia and China have yet to sign on.

South Korea, aware that its capital is well within reach of North Korea's artillery and missile arsenal, has also been very cautious in its response, though criticism is rising that its strategy of engagement — the "sunshine policy" — has been a failure.

Like China, South Korea's trade with the North has swelled while the nuclear talks have stalled — climbing by more than 50 percent last year to just over $1 billion, according to the South's Unification Ministry.

Because Japan's trade with North Korea is limited, Abe faced little domestic opposition to cutting it off.

Tokyo already has limited sanctions in place against North Korea, imposed after the North test-fired seven missiles into waters between Japan and the Korean Peninsula in July. Those measures included banning the Mangyongbong-92 — a North Korean ferry that served as a major conduit of trade between the two countries — from entering Japanese waters.

South Korea Grapples With Competing Pressures As It Weighs Its Response To North Korea (NYT)

By Choe Sang-hun

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

SEOUL, South Korea, Oct. 12 — South Korea, one of the few countries that can financially squeeze North Korea, slid into a bitter internal dispute Thursday over how to punish the North for its reported test of a nuclear device.

After days of squabbling, the South Korean National Assembly passed a resolution on Thursday condemning North Korea's test. But some governing party lawmakers criticized the resolution because it did not refer to "U.S. responsibility" for the crisis.

South Korea's inability to make a quick decision reflects a divide among lawmakers over how to reconcile their so-called sunshine policy of engaging North Korea with American pressure for an economic blockade of the North.

The division at home leaves President Roh Moo-hyun without a consensus as he prepares to meet the Chinese president, Hu Jintao, in Beijing on Friday.

The region will closely watch the meeting. Both China and South Korea have tried to engage North Korea. But they also compete for long-term influence there. Many South Koreans are unwilling to punish the North Koreans, partly because it would push the North closer to China.

On Thursday, Liu Jianchao, a spokesman of the Chinese Foreign Ministry, said, "It's necessary to express clearly to North Korea that the nuclear test is the wrong practice." Mr. Liu added, however, that "one can say that punishment isn't the goal."

In contrast to South Korea, Japan reacted swiftly to the reports of the North Korean nuclear test by imposing a ban on imports and ships from North Korea.

In response, a North Korean official warned Thursday that the government would take "strong countermeasures" against Japan if it carried out the ban.

"The specific contents will become clear if you keep watching," Song Il-ho, the North Korean ambassador in charge of relations with Japan, told the Kyodo news agency in Pyongyang, North Korea's capital. "We never speak empty words."

North Korea rattled the Japanese in 1998 by firing a missile that flew over Japan and crashed in the Pacific. A top governing party leader in South Korea highlighted the political divide on Thursday by warning against giving in to demands by conservatives that the country join the American-led Proliferation Security Initiative, which aims to intercept North Korean ships suspected of carrying weapons materials.

Seoul's participation in the initiative "could work as a detonator for a military clash," the party leader, Kim Keun-tae, said at a meeting with cabinet ministers.

The main opposition Grand National Party issued its own statement demanding an end to two joint ventures with the North — the Mount Kumgang tourism project, for which South Korea has provided North Korea over $900 million since 1998, and an industrial complex in Kaesong, where South Korean factories produce garments and kitchen utensils with low-wage North Korean workers.

Lee Jong-seok, South Korea's unification minister in charge of relations with North Korea, told the National Assembly on Thursday that negotiations, as well as the sanctions being considered by the United Nations Security Council, were needed because "North Korea is not a country that one can open up with pressure and sanctions alone."

President Roh has found himself caught between increasing American pressure to get tough with North Korea and strong resistance among members of his own liberal governing party.

DOJ_NMG_0080512

Conservative South Koreans called the North Korean nuclear threat a “death penalty” for the sunshine policy of promoting political reconciliation and economic cooperation with the North. They said billions of dollars funneled into the North — in cash, aid and trade — during eight years of engagement had helped North Korea divert its resources into weapons development.

But liberals within and outside the president’s camp say that although they are frustrated with the North Koreans, they see no other option but to engage them. Ending cooperative projects will only worsen inter-Korean relations and increase the danger of military clashes on the divided Korean Peninsula, they say.

“It’s clear that the sunshine policy has succeeded between the two Koreas, and it could have been more successful were it not for the bad relations between North Korea and the United States,” former President Kim Dae-jung, the architect of the engagement policy, said, according to the South Korean news media.

Asian Nations, U.S. Weigh Censure Of North Korea (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad And Lina Yoon

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

SEOUL -- Several Asian nations and the U.S. moved ahead on multiple fronts to develop sanctions and other measures to censure North Korea's communist regime for its apparent test of a nuclear device.

The leaders of China and South Korea planned to discuss their ideas at a summit in Beijing Friday. The meeting will be the first time South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun has sat down with Chinese President Hu Jintao in 11 months. Mr. Roh also will meet with Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao.

China and South Korea are North Korea's neighbors and largest trading partners, traits that give them the most economic and political leverage over the regime of Kim Jong Il. Leaders in both countries were angered by the North's declared nuclear test on Monday. In developing a response, neither China nor South Korea wants to destabilize the North in a manner that would trigger chaos or lead to refugees on their borders.

China's foreign ministry issued another guarded statement Thursday. Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said "punishment should not be the purpose" of any action taken by the United Nations in response to the test. "The measures taken [by the U.N.] should be conducive to the denuclearization of the Korean peninsula and to bringing about peace and stability on the Korean peninsula," Mr. Liu said.

Japan and the U.S. are leading efforts to forge a resolution at the U.N. Security Council. John Bolton, U.S. ambassador to the U.N., said he would like the council to adopt a resolution by the week's end. The U.S. introduced a new draft resolution in the Security Council to punish North Korea and said it wants a vote on Friday.

Russia urged the U.S. not to rush the vote, saying Moscow still had differences and the U.S. should wait for the results of the flurry of high-level diplomacy. China backed Russia's call, saying Beijing would welcome more talks so the Security Council can send a united and forceful message to Pyongyang condemning the test.

The U.S. and Japan had initially hoped for a vote Thursday. But if Washington wants to get China and Russia on board, a vote is likely be delayed until next week.

"We're certainly in favor of keeping all the diplomatic channels open, but we also want swift action, and we shouldn't allow meetings, and more meetings .. to be an excuse for inaction," Mr. Bolton told reporters Thursday.

Asian stock markets remained calm amid the diplomatic maneuvering. South Korea's Composite Stock Price Index, or Kospi, rose 0.5% Thursday, though it is down 1.5% for the week. Japan's Nikkei Stock Average of 225 companies fell 0.19% Thursday.

The Bank of Korea held its overnight call-rate target steady at 4.5% and suggested its interest-rate tightening might be over as the slower-growing economy faces uncertainties from the North Korean crisis.

"The reaction of the international community, including the U.N., and the North's response to such reactions could hurt both [local] consumption and investor sentiment, so the central bank will closely monitor the situation," central-bank Gov. Lee Seongtae told reporters.

Hyundai Securities economist Lee Sang Jae said the central bank is likely to keep interest rates unchanged until the first quarter of next year while it monitors developments in the U.S. economy and North Korea.

Meanwhile, Goldman Sachs forecast a 4% growth rate for the South Korean economy next year, slower than this year's expected 4.8% rate.

"It is clear Korea reached a peak but will not have a hard landing," said Kim Sun Bae, the bank's co-director of Asia economic research. "It will be a gradual slowdown with an unstable situation until late this year or early next year."

He said the forecast hadn't been affected by the North's test, adding it will add some instability to the South Korean economy but is unlikely to develop into a crisis.

Bush, Australian PM Discuss North Korea (AP-Y)

AP, October 13, 2006

President Bush, pursuing a diplomatic solution to the North Korean nuclear crisis, spoke with Australian Prime Minister John Howard on Thursday and they agreed on the need for a strong U.N. Security Council resolution to punish Pyongyang, a spokesman said.

Separately, Chinese State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan had a meeting in the Oval Office and also conferred with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, national security adviser Stephen Hadley and Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, deputy national security adviser J.D. Crouch told reporters.

Bush and Howard said that any resolution should be adopted under Chapter 7 of the U.N. charter, which means it could be enforced militarily, National Security Council spokesman Frederick Jones said.

Bush thanked Howard for Australia's response to both North Korea's missile test in July and its announced nuclear test on Monday. The president noted the leading position that both Australia and Japan are taking in implementing sanctions against North Korea, Jones said.

The president also thanked Howard for "the resolute commitment that the Australian people have made to the cause of freedom in Iraq and Afghanistan," the spokesman said.

Crouch, talking to reporters who accompanied Bush on a trip to St. Louis, said that meeting with the Chinese official went well.

"I think it's a positive sign that we all agree that we need a resolution and that we need to go forward with strong measures," he said.

There was not a detailed discussion on specific elements of the resolution, Crouch said, but he added that there was a "broad understanding what there needed to be was a strong response and I think that the details of those are going to have to be negotiated."

Making Good On Bush's Vow Will Require Detective Work (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And David E. Sanger

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 12 — Making good on President Bush's vow this week to hold North Korea "fully accountable" if it shares nuclear material will pose a major challenge to American intelligence and diplomacy, requiring new equipment and a high level of international cooperation, administration and military officials say.

Mr. Bush's declaration on Monday, in his first public comments after the North announced that it had detonated a nuclear device, underscored the importance of monitoring North Korea's nuclear program, tracking its exports and investing in technology for "fingerprinting" nuclear materials.

Security specialists said Mr. Bush's warning signaled a significant expansion of longstanding policies of deterrence, extending the threat of reprisals to the transfer of nuclear weapons or materials to another country or to terrorists.

That has long been a concern about the North Korean program, but the tools to prevent it are still limited.

Robert Joseph, the under secretary of state for arms control and international security, said in an interview on Thursday that "to be credible, declaratory policy must be backed up by effective capabilities."

Mr. Joseph cited three existing programs as models for what was needed: the Proliferation Security Initiative, a loose grouping of dozens of countries that have agreed to intercept illicit arms shipments moving through their waters or airspace; Megaports, an effort to install radiation detectors at major cargo ports around the world; and Second Line of Defense, a program to place radiation detectors at major border crossings around the world.

"We are putting in place the ability to detect, disrupt and deter North Korean proliferation activities," he said. "The announced North Korean nuclear test will provide impetus to further expand these capabilities, particularly in Asia."

The Pentagon, in carrying out one of its most sensitive missions, maintains a team of nuclear experts to analyze the fallout from any nuclear attack by terrorists, not only to identify the attackers but also to figure out where they got their bomb.

Separately, the International Atomic Energy Agency, a United Nations unit based in Vienna, compiles identifying markers drawn from the chemistry and physics of processes that produce radioactive material in nuclear programs around the world.

Using that kind of data and technology, it might be possible to figure out the likely origin of an intercepted shipment of bomb material — or of the radioactive debris of a weapon that was used. The atomic energy agency's inspectors have significant records from their time in North Korea before they were expelled, and they could rule out many other possible sources of radioactive material by calling on records from nations that cooperate with the agency.

DOJ_NMG_0080514

The real question is how best to head off a nuclear transfer in the first place. Those options include stiff embargos, like those under discussion at the United Nations or even a more muscular international air and maritime inspection operation.

And then there is the threat of harsh retaliation.

Mr. Bush's declaration on Monday was no strategic aside, a number of administration and military officials said. Mr. Bush consciously chose language that amounts to a new "declaratory policy" of a line that must not be crossed.

"The transfer of nuclear weapons or material by North Korea to states or nonstate entities would be considered a grave threat to the United States, and we would hold North Korea fully accountable of the consequences of such action," Mr. Bush said.

When pressed for details on the implications, a range of administration and military officials declined to elaborate, saying that part of the power of deterrence was its very ambiguity. Most would speak about the topic only on condition of anonymity.

"These declarations are constructed with some elasticity, specifically to raise questions and doubts in the mind of the object," one Bush administration official said.

Last year the White House ordered a study of whether North Korea might share some nuclear fuel with Iran, but the report was inconclusive.

Some administration officials say they doubt that the North Koreans would take the risk. Others, including Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, argue that the North's record indicates that it proliferates any weapon in its arsenal. For example, it has long supplied missiles to Iran, and there have been suspicions, but no evidence, of nuclear cooperation between the countries as well.

Mr. Bush's statement was viewed by national security experts as a major shift in deterrence doctrine, one that acknowledges that the mission today is no longer preventing North Korea from building a nuclear weapon, but deterring its use or transfer.

"The administration will continue saying that a nuclear weapon in North Korea is unacceptable, but in fact they are beginning to accept it," said Scott D. Sagan, director of Stanford University's Center for International Security and Cooperation. "The administration is switching from a nonproliferation policy to a deterrence and defense policy. It is a form of containment rather than a form of nonproliferation."

The considerations during the cold war were far more straightforward: a Soviet missile would leave an obvious return address, allowing the United States to respond with no doubt as to the source of the attack.

But getting from the presumption of North Korean proliferation to the evidence is a very difficult task, one that initially is an intelligence, not a military, effort.

The difficulties of turning Mr. Bush's vow into real deterrence were vividly demonstrated in late 2003, the only moment when North Korea was widely suspected of being the source of nuclear material found elsewhere in the world.

The discovery was made in Libya, which decided to give up its nuclear weapons program. Along with centrifuges and other equipment purchased from the black market network created by Abdul Qadeer Khan, the Pakistani nuclear engineer, the Libyans turned over a cask of nearly two tons of uranium. It had arrived in Tripoli around 2001 in a semiprocessed form: uranium hexafluoride, the gas that is poured into centrifuges for enrichment into nuclear fuel.

Korean markings on the cask suggested that the North was the source. And chemical traces on the outside of the cask proved that the container had been at North Korea's main nuclear site, Yongbyon.

But while the Bush administration at first charged that North Korea had been the source of Libya's uranium, experts spent months trying to determine whether the contents of the cask had come from there as well or whether it had been filled up elsewhere. The result: plenty of suspicions, but no hard proof.

"We took months and months and months and still couldn't come to a 100 percent conclusion," one senior administration official said this year. "That happens. But it doesn't help you justify a counterstrike against someone."

The president's new warning grows from his 2002 National Security Strategy and subsequent statements on deterrence and pre-emption. But until now he never specifically said a nation transferring nuclear weapons or components would be held liable and be subject to retaliation, according to administration officials and analysts in the academic community.

Korean Test Seen As Only Partial Blast (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, October 13, 2006

Four days after North Korea tried to set off its first nuclear bomb, U.S. intelligence agencies think the blast detected by seismic sensors was a plutonium-fueled device that did not fully explode.

"The working assumption is that what happened, more likely than not, was an attempted nuclear test that fell far short of being successful," said one U.S. official familiar with the latest intelligence assessment.

DOJ_NMG_0080515

There is still no confirmation that North Korea succeeded in creating a nuclear explosion, and so far no radioactive particles that would confirm a successful nuclear test have been detected. The Washington Times first reported Tuesday that U.S. officials were having doubts, based on preliminary data, about North Korea's boasts about having successfully tested its first nuclear device.

The latest intelligence estimates of Monday's test at a nuclear test site near Kilju, in northeastern North Korea, put the size of the blast at 0.2 kilotons, or the equivalent of 200 tons of TNT. A plutonium-fueled nuclear device normally creates a much larger blast, in the range of 5 kilotons to 20 kilotons. A kiloton is the equivalent of 1,000 tons of TNT.

The detected explosion likely was produced by the conventional high-explosives used to split the plutonium atoms and produce a nuclear explosion, one official said. A second official said, "There was a yield that was in the several hundred ton range, but it at least partially failed."

Complete analysis of the data could take weeks, the officials said.

Plutonium-fueled bombs use a core of plutonium that is surrounded by conventional high explosives. High-speed electronic triggers are used to set off the high explosives, which apply pressure to the plutonium and produce the nuclear blast.

According to officials, the North Koreans informed China's government that the test they planned to carry out would produce a 4-kiloton explosion. That size indicates the North Koreans were trying to test a small warhead that likely would fit on a missile. The North Koreans have several types of ballistic missiles, including a long-range Taepodong-2, medium-range Nodong and shorter-range Scuds.

Still, the top U.S. military official was noncommittal when asked yesterday by reporters whether North Korea's detected explosion was nuclear or merely conventional.

"It is not yet determined -- with any degree of assurance -- what exactly they tested," said Marine Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Other explanations for the relatively low size of the detected blast include that North Korea did create a small nuclear explosion, but that seismic waves from it -- it registered as a 4.2 on the earthquake scale -- were muffled by an underground cavern, the officials said.

A third theory that intelligence agencies are examining is that the detected explosion was only a conventional explosion that North Korea is trying to fool the world into believing was a nuclear test, the officials said.

So far, aircraft and other sensors nearby the site of the explosion have not detected any radioactive debris. But while the detection of minute amounts of such materials would confirm a successful nuclear test, the officials warned that even if no sensors detect radioactive particles, a partially successful test would remain a possibility.

What Will Stop North Korea (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

It shall be the policy of this nation to regard any nuclear missile launched from Cuba against any nation in the Western Hemisphere as an attack by the Soviet Union on the United States, requiring a full retaliatory response upon the Soviet Union .

-- President John F. Kennedy,

Oct. 22, 1962

Now that's deterrence.

Kennedy was pledging that if any nuke was launched from Cuba, the United States would not even bother with Cuba but would go directly to the source and bring the apocalypse to Russia with a massive nuclear attack.

The remarkable thing about this kind of threat is that in 1962 it was very credible. Indeed, its credibility kept the peace throughout a half-century of the Cold War.

Deterrence is what you do when there is no way to disarm your enemy. You cannot deprive him of his weapons, but you can keep him from using them. We long ago reached that stage with North Korea.

Everyone has tried to figure out how to disarm North Korea. It will not happen. Kim Jong Il is not going to give up his nukes. The only way to disarm the regime is to destroy it. China could do that with sanctions but will not. The United States could do that with a second Korean War but will not either.

So we are back to deterrence. Hence the familiar echoes of the Cuban missile crisis with North Korea's rude entry into the nuclear club this week. The United States had to immediately put down markers for deterrence. President Bush put down two.

One marker, preventing a direct attack on our allies in the region, was straightforward, if bland: "I reaffirmed to our allies in the region, including South Korea and Japan," the president said in a nationally televised statement, "that the United States will meet the full range of our deterrent and security commitments." It is understood by all that the decades-old American nuclear umbrella in the Pacific Rim commits us to attacking North Korea -- presumably with in-kind nuclear retaliation -- were it to attack our allies first.

Gruesome stuff, but run-of-the-mill in the nuclear age. The hard part is the second marker Bush tried to put down: proliferation deterrence.

We are in an era far more complicated than Kennedy's because his great crisis occurred before the age of terrorism. The world of 1962 was still technologically and ideologically primitive: Miniaturized nuclear weaponry had not yet been invented, nor had modern international terrorism. Yasser Arafat and the Palestine Liberation Organization gave the world that gift half a decade later with their perfection of the political airline hijacking.

Terrorism has since grown in popularity, ambition and menace. Its practitioners are in the market for nuclear weapons. North Korea has little else to sell.

Hence Bush's attempt to codify a second form of deterrence: "The transfer of nuclear weapons or material by North Korea to states or non-state entities would be considered a grave threat to the United States, and we would hold North Korea fully accountable for the consequences of such action."

A good first draft, but it could use some Kennedyesque clarity. The phrase "fully accountable" does not exactly instill fear, as it has been used promiscuously by several administrations in warnings to both terrorists and rogue states -- after which we did absolutely nothing. A better formulation would be the following:

Given the fact that there is no other nuclear power so recklessly in violation of its nuclear obligations, it shall be the policy of this nation to regard any detonation of a nuclear explosive on the United States or its allies as an attack by North Korea on the United States requiring a full retaliatory response upon North Korea.

This is how you keep Kim Jong Il from proliferating. Make him understand that his survival would be hostage to the actions of whatever terrorist group he sold his weapons to. Any terrorist detonation would be assumed to have his address on it. The United States would then return postage. Automaticity of this kind concentrates the mind.

This policy has a hitch, however. It works only in a world where there is but a single rogue nuclear state. Once that club expands to two, the policy evaporates, because a nuclear terror attack would no longer have a single automatic return address.

Which is another reason why keeping Iran from going nuclear is so important. With North Korea there is no going back. But Iran is not there yet. One rogue country is tolerable because it can be held accountable. Two rogue countries guarantees undeterrable and therefore inevitable nuclear terrorism.

Bush Gets Bum Rap (WT)

By Yearn Hong Choi

The Washington Times, October 13, 2006

President Bush has been bombarded by criticism from Democratic politicians and the so-called liberal intellectuals since North Korea announced Monday that it had tested its first nuclear bomb. This is ridiculous. Although Mr. Bush's supposed inaction has been criticized, he has been trying to operate the six-party talks to disarm North Korea. I am not sympathetic to the criticisms, because they should instead be targeting North Korea's Kim Jong-il, as well as China and South Korea, the two nations that have been financing North Korea's nuclear programs indirectly, if not directly.

There is a legitimate question to be asked: Who violated the agreement signed by North Korea and the United States in Geneva in 1994? The United States was faithful to the agreement and supplied heavy oil to North Korea, while South Korea was constructing light water reactors in North Korea. But North Korea was secretly making nuclear bombs, and subsequently disclosed the fact that it has such weapons. Mr. Bush stopped the supply of heavy oil. There was no other way. North Korea was a rogue state. It did not know how to act as a civilized partner to the Agreed Framework signed with the United States 12 years ago. As a matter of fact, North Korea and South Korea had an agreement to keep the Korean Peninsula a nuclear-free zone as early as the 1970s. But Pyongyang did not care about the signed agreement.

North Korea kidnapped South Korean fishermen from the open sea and Japanese citizens from the seashore of Japan, and bombed a South Korean plane. The DPRK sold opium and produced counterfeit U.S. dollars. It has been starving its own people. But it has produced nuclear bomb(s) and long-distance missiles in order to threaten South Korea, Japan and the United States.

How could American liberal intellectuals trust North Korea's Kim Jong-il and distrust Mr. Bush? President Clinton's engagement policy was betrayed by Kim Jong-il, and he has also betrayed South Korea's "Sunshine Policy." The appeasement policy and Sunshine policy just helped the North Korean dictator sustain his power, rather than have his country go bankrupt.

Mr. Bush's understanding of North Korea's dependence on China was admirable. China has always been behind North Korea. Kim Jong-il has been visiting Beijing seeking help, and China has warmly greeted and embraced him. So, China should participate in the six-party talks to change North Korean behavior. Could Mr. Bush have done more? I don't know, China is joining the United States in supporting a U.N. Security Council resolution imposing sanctions on North Korea. It was a good response from Beijing — for the first time. It was a success for Mr. Bush. I appreciate China's new stance towards North Korea, and believe South Korea will follow China's steps. I hope China will keep a distance from its colony-like North Korea, as long as it is an "Animal Farm." China should be proud of its superpower status, and should act accordingly.

Who are liberal intellectuals? They are supposed to admire civil rights of citizens and civil liberties of citizens — not to support the "Animal Farm" of the 21st century. They are supposed to admire freedom of religion, freedom of expression and freedom of movement. There are no such things in North Korea. That is why it is a rogue state.

Why don't they want regime change in North Korea — something they should be advocating? There is no way to negotiate with a man like Kim Jong-il.

The United States has limited power to punish the North Korean dictator beyond rhetoric and U.N. sanctions, however effective they may be. Should the United States target a North Korean nuclear-weapons production site, South Korea will beg Washington not to carry out an attack because of concern that Pyongyang will retaliate against its southern neighbor. Under the circumstances, South Korea has been the North Korean dictator's hostage. Former South Korean President Kim Dae-jung and current President Roh Moo-hyun have been trying to "please" Kim Jong-il. They have been pathetic. They have been seeking Kim Jong-il's mercy.

Former Secretary of Defense William Perry should know that whatever conciliatory actions South Korean people made to North Korea have failed. Washington should expect the same result from dealing with North Korea: betrayal. Mr. Bush should not be blamed for "inaction." He worked hard to establish the six-party talks to disarm North Korea's nuclear weapons. Now, China is doing something good with regard to North Korea.

General: U.S. Has Troops To Fight N. Korea (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON — The U.S. military's top officer said Thursday that the Pentagon would have sufficient forces to win if called on to fight a war in North Korea, but the conflict would be more difficult without the intelligence and guidance systems devoted to Iraq and Afghanistan.

Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said that about 200,000 U.S. troops were deployed in Iraq and Afghanistan, leaving more than 2 million troops available for a war in Asia.

Pace said a conflict with North Korea, which both he and President Bush have said is highly unlikely, would rely heavily on the Navy and Air Force because of the significant deployment of land forces in Iraq. In addition, such an attack would not be "as clean as we would like," he said, because guidance systems used to aim bombs were in use in the Middle East.

"You wouldn't have the precision in combat going to a second theater of war that you would if you were only going to the first theater of war," Pace told a group of military reporters. "You end up dropping more bombs potentially to get the job done, and it would mean more brute force."

Although Pace did not name specific guidance and intelligence systems, Air Force officers have said they do not have surveillance aircraft such as Global Hawk and Predator reconnaissance drones available for East Asia because of their heavy use in Iraq and Afghanistan. The unmanned aircraft are used to spy on enemy territory.

Pace said a war in Asia would further strain U.S. troop rotations.

Pentagon officials have acknowledged in recent weeks that the Army is struggling to maintain a rotation that allows troops to return home for a year before redeploying to Iraq and Afghanistan. A third major conflict, Pace said, would probably end such yearlong respites.

One senior Pentagon official said if there were another war, most troops currently in Iraq would be forced into extended deployments, while those preparing to be sent to the Middle East would go to Asia.

Pace said the U.S. government had not confirmed whether North Korea tested a nuclear weapon, as the government in Pyongyang claimed.

The general said that even with nuclear capability, North Korea would be more worrisome to the U.S. military as a source of nuclear materials for terrorists than as a potential military foe.

Another U.S. official said intelligence agencies were still gathering data to determine whether the test blast, small by atomic standards, was a nuclear detonation.

"The working assumption has been, and continues to be, that they tried to conduct a nuclear test and that it didn't go particularly well, that it was more fizzle than pop," the official said.

Analysts think the explosion was smaller than initially reported — generating the force of perhaps as little as 200 tons of TNT, a fraction of the power of the atomic bombs the United States dropped on Japan more than 60 years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0080518

U.S. intelligence officials cautioned that the shock waves from the North Korean explosion could have been muffled if the underground test site was surrounded by caverns and tunnels that absorbed the bomb's force.

Officials said there was no confirmation of a nuclear test pending the longer-than-expected collection of atmospheric samples over Japan, downwind from the blast. The samples will be analyzed for the presence of nuclear fallout.

"It depends on meteorological conditions, and it turns out that they were not very favorable," said Daniela Rozgonova, a spokeswoman for the Vienna-based Comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban Treaty Organization. "It can take weeks."

If North Korea contained the fallout from the blast, as the country claimed, it might not be possible to confirm that it was a nuclear explosion, officials said.

Weighing Carrots Or Sticks For North Korea (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen And Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

As U.S. Weighs Response To Pyongyang, Both Parties Trade Blame for Failed Diplomacy

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration has a simple explanation for why it won't restart one-on-one talks with North Korea to persuade Pyongyang to abandon its nuclear weapons program:

"Bilateral negotiations didn't work. I appreciate the efforts of previous administrations. It just didn't work," President Bush said Wednesday, referring to the Clinton administration's years of talks with North Korea. "And therefore I thought it was important to change how we approached the problem."

Since North Korea claimed a successful nuclear detonation early this week, Democrats and Republicans have traded barbs about which administration bears more responsibility for allowing the reclusive country to acquire such weapons.

Republicans accused the Clinton administration of failing to take tough steps in the 1990s to persuade North Korea to abandon its nuclear-weapons program. Democrats say Mr. Bush's refusal to engage Pyongyang drove North Korea to accelerate that program, culminating in the announced test this week.

"It's difficult to say that the Clinton policy failed, but it's crystal clear that the current policy has failed," said Larry Wilkerson, who was chief of staff to former Secretary of State Colin Powell. "You need a carrot-and-stick approach -- you can't just use the stick."

Neither approach has succeeded, underscoring the challenges for the U.S. and its allies in deciding how to respond to the test, and ultimately, how to get Pyongyang to stop its nuclear program.

Yesterday, the U.S. and key Asian partners remained divided over how to proceed. U.S. diplomats circulated a draft Security Council resolution that, among other measures, calls for international inspections of cargo coming in or out of North Korea to prevent the transfer of weapons-related material. U.S. officials said they want to see the resolution brought to a vote today, but Russia and China said they prefer delaying the vote to allow more time for arriving at an international consensus.

China opposes the cargo inspection measure and doesn't like that the American draft resolution comes under Chapter 7 of the U.N. charter, which would preserve the option of military action against North Korea. China wants the resolution to be introduced under Article 41, which permits only nonmilitary sanctions.

A senior Chinese envoy, State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan, met with Mr. Bush and members of the president's national security team in Washington yesterday to discuss China's preference for more moderate sanctions.

The disagreements over what to do next are being shaped, in part, by the various assessments of what happened the last time the U.S. tried direct negotiations with the North Koreans.

National-security experts from both parties say the Clinton approach of engaging in talks succeeded in temporarily lowering tensions between the two sides and curbing North Korea's nuclear ambitions. Some argue that the U.S. should, for this reason, resume talks while also preparing punitive measures that could be used if Pyongyang refused to alter course.

In 1993, North Korea threatened to withdraw from the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. The Clinton administration, fearing that Pyongyang was close to deploying nuclear weapons, considered a pre-emptive military strike. President Clinton ordered the Pentagon to craft plans to send tens of thousands of additional U.S. forces to South Korea, along with war planes and other combat vehicles.

At the same time, the Clinton administration began negotiations with Pyongyang, which culminated in a 1994 deal. The so-called Agreed Framework provided a blueprint for gradually normalizing relations between the U.S. and North Korea. It called for Pyongyang to halt efforts to build nuclear weapons, and in return, the U.S. would help build two light-water reactors for power generation and provide North Korea with hundreds of thousands of tons of heavy fuel oil.

Key parts of the deal held for eight years: North Korea halted its plutonium-reprocessing work and allowed international inspectors to return. But other aspects of the agreement frayed. A Republican sweep of Congress weeks after the signing of the deal undermined the Clinton administration's ability to implement it.

Congressional opposition to building the light-water reactors delayed their construction for several years. The U.S. and its allies ended the program earlier this year without completing either plant. The U.S. suspended shipments of the heavy fuel oil in November 2002 and did little to normalize ties between the two countries.

Supporters of the Clinton administration's approach say its strength was that it prioritized the threats North Korea posed to U.S. national security interests and systematically sought to address them. They say the Agreed Framework stopped Pyongyang's most advanced nuclear program, using plutonium fuel, and secured a promise from North Korean leader Kim Jong Il in 2000 to shelve missile tests. Officials had hoped to build on these gains to address other security challenges posed by North Korea, particularly its illicit businesses, human-rights abuses, and its placement of conventional forces within striking distance of the South Korean capital of Seoul.

The Bush administration's approach, in contrast, has tried to address all the issues at once and -- critics say -- resolved none. Some current and former U.S. diplomats say the Bush administration's hard-line approach has resulted in Pyongyang restarting its plutonium-based nuclear program and its missile tests. And there are no signs that Pyongyang plans to address the other issues.

"My biggest concern has always been the nukes," said one State Department official who has worked on Korea policy during both administrations. "But if you allow these other issues to distract from the most important one, you'll get nowhere. And this has happened."

The Clinton approach wasn't a total success, either, analysts note. Both critics and supporters say it failed to spur North Korea to decisively abandon its nuclear-weapons ambitions. U.S. intelligence officials now believe that North Korea launched a secret uranium enrichment program a few years after signing the 1994 agreement.

That agreement formally collapsed when the Bush administration confronted Pyongyang in October 2002 with evidence of its secret nuclear-weapons program and North Korea acknowledged its existence.

"It's true that we've talked to our enemies in the past, but I don't know if it would do a ... bit of good because North Korea hasn't shown any willingness to give up its nuclear program once and for all," said David Asher, a former senior State Department official.

That Was Then (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

After North Korea conducted what it said was a nuclear test Sunday, many Republicans blamed the Agreed Framework negotiated by the Clinton administration -- under which a five-megawatt reactor was shut down and spent fuel rods were kept under 24-hour international supervision -- for causing the problem. But in 2003, after North Korea was discovered to have violated the agreement and the Bush administration terminated it, then-Secretary of State Colin S. Powell told The Washington Post:

"The previous administration I give great credit to for freezing that plutonium site. Lots of nuclear weapons were not made because of the Agreed Framework and the work of President Clinton and his team."

US No-talks Policy Comes Under Fire (CSM)

By Howard Lafranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON

President Bush has made his stance clear: The US doesn't negotiate directly with its enemies.

But after North Korea's apparent nuclear test this week - and problems with getting severe sanctions approved by the UN - that stance is now setting off a vigorous debate.

"In my view, it is not appeasement to talk to your enemies," James Baker, secretary of State for the former President Bush, said this week.

In key election states, the Republican National Committee is offering a different view. It's airing TV ads showing Madeleine Albright, secretary of State for former President Clinton, clinking glasses with Kim Jong Il and presenting the North Korean dictator with a basketball signed by Michael Jordan. Its point: "basketball diplomacy" doesn't work.

The debate shows how the White House's policy of not directly engaging adversaries - whether North Korea, Iran, Syria, or organizations like the Palestinians' Hamas and Lebanon's Hizbullah - is under intensifying fire, including from friendly circles.

Now is probably not the moment for the United States to approve the kind of bilateral negotiations North Korea wants, many agree. "There's going to have to be a timeout chair for North Korea," says Michael Green, who served as Asia director in the Bush White House's National Security Council until last December.

But others say the North Korea nuclear crisis, following questionable US diplomacy on this summer's war in Lebanon and a stalemate with Iran over its nuclear ambitions, is raising new challenges for the Bush administration's "no-talk-with- enemies" diplomatic approach.

"The reason we're hearing so much about this right now is that the policies towards Iran and North Korea are not working," says Geoffrey Kemp, a national security expert at the Nixon Center in Washington.

The Bush administration in its second term has embraced "multilateralism" - six-party talks with North Korea and the European Union as a go-between with Iran - without accepting direct talks with parties President Bush has termed "evil," Kemp says.

He adds, "if the multilateral approach is not going anywhere either, that really does lead you back to bilateral discussions."

Some appear to think snubbing adversaries was invented by the Bush White House, while the more adamant Bush advocates would have us believe the Clinton White House never had a foreign enemy it didn't cozy up to. But some say the seesaw of pragmatic engagement with adversaries balancing a moralistic refusal to talk has been teeter-tottering at least since the triumph of the Bolshevik revolution.

"There is a moralist streak in American foreign policy, this idea that you don't talk to bad people, that is not new," says Kemp, who served on the National Security Council in the Reagan White House.

Indeed President Reagan was famous for calling the Soviet Union "the evil empire" - but then embracing Mikhail Gorbachev, saying "I can work with this guy." Kemp says the Reagan administration was "initially standoffish" towards the Soviet Union and took years to receive a Soviet leader. But things changed, he adds, after the president was "won over by the leading pragmatists around him - those being Nancy Reagan and George Schulz."

For years it was taboo for US leaders to speak with the Palestinian Liberation Organization - so much so that Andrew Young lost his job as US ambassador to the United Nations for doing just that. Kemp remembered Alexander Haig's first Middle East trip as secretary of state, when Mr. Haig's insistence that he wouldn't stop in Damascus became the trip's major topic.

The seesaw tipped by the time Clinton took office when PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat, having renounced the doctrine of Israel's destruction, was a repeat visitor to the White House and "official visits to Damascus were almost every hour on the hour," Kemp quips.

In a news conference Wednesday President Bush fielded questions about his refusal to directly engage with Kim Jong Il's regime, saying the Clinton administration's approach "just didn't work."

Clinton administration officials refute this. Ms. Albright said in a statement Wednesday that "through our policy of constructive engagement, the world was safer" because North Korea did not develop new nuclear weapons or proceed to a nuclear test. Former Clinton Defense Secretary William Perry said it's a "lost cause" for the the US to try to deal with North Korea unless it agrees to one-on-one talks.

Bush emphasized Wednesday that his approach to North Korea is to rely on diplomacy. That suggests the debate over talking or not talking comes down to a definition of diplomacy. Administration hard-liners have argued against direct talks with the North because they say it would legitimize an abhorrent regime. But critics of the Bush approach say diplomacy is not only about dealing with allies.

Kurt Campbell, who served in both the White House and Pentagon under Clinton, says he would not "view diplomacy as a gift or as something we bestow on others, but [as] really designed for dealing with bad people on issues you care about."

Still, for others, the attraction of the Bush approach is not that it shuns talking, but that it offers talks in the context of broader bilateral negotiations - so that success or failure does not ride exclusively on American shoulders.

"The question is how do you rein in rogue regimes, and in the case of both North Korea and Iran the Bush administration has this exactly right," says Raymond Tanter, a professor at Georgetown University in Washington who served under the first President Bush.

Mr. Tanter says the Clinton administration's engagement with North Korea did not prevent the North from cheating, and exposed the US to the full blame for that. "But if North Korea is cheating on five countries, that isolates them much more, it prevents them from blaming just the US," he adds, "and it makes them subject to the weight of the international community."

White House Reverts To Cold War Containment (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, October 13, 2006

Lacking a viable military option in dealing with a nuclear North Korea or Iran, the Bush administration is adopting a cold war-style strategy of containment and deterrence that does not completely close the door on negotiated settlements.

DOJ_NMG_0080521

While analysts and diplomats in Washington do not rule out the possibility of US military strikes against Iran – some even wager a better than 50 per cent chance by next summer – there is a sense that the Bush doctrine of pre-emptive or preventive war is buried in the wreckage of Iraq.

There will be tough bargaining at the UN as the Bush administration seeks the legitimacy afforded by Security Council resolutions to press sanctions.

But the success of US strategy in both regions will depend more on developing ad hoc coalitions of allies and overcoming opposition from China and Russia.

Imposition of financial and trade sanctions, freezing of assets, international isolation through travel bans and interceptions of cargo at sea will be accompanied by efforts to strengthen the military capabilities of allies. This means closer military co-operation with the Gulf Arab states and a sympathetic ear to suggestions by Japan's new government that it might rewrite the postwar pacifist constitution.

Interviews with US officials, who asked not to be identified, reveal that the liberation theology that dominated the post-September 11 2001 discourse, notably President George W. Bush's second inaugural speech last year, has given way to a more pragmatic approach.

The shift is so pronounced that both neoconservatives and liberal hawks among Democrats are alarmed that the Bush administration's apparent embrace of realpolitik will mean abandoning promises made to oppressed peoples while entering into nuclear-reduction deals with the Iranian and North Korean regimes.

Beyond the US, more than 100 Arab and Muslim activists have written to Mr Bush calling on him to reaffirm his commitment to sustained democratic reform in the Arab world. They write that autocrats are intensifying their repression, emboldened by the impression that the US is wavering.

Reinforcing such impressions, one US official even suggested the administration would be willing to negotiate trade-offs at the UN in parallel discussions over North Korea, Iran and Sudan. "There are competing interests," he said.

Cliff Kupchan, analyst at the Eurasia Group consultancy, sees the Bush administration groping for an alternative to the "binary choice" of living with a nuclear Iran or staging surgical strikes.

"This administration has not reconciled itself to a nuclear Iran, but it has with North Korea," he says. But he sees any containment strategy – should it exist – complicated by a serious deterioration in the US relationship with Russia.

According to one senior US official, pressure on Iran cannot change the regime, but it might buttress the more pragmatic forces in Tehran who want to negotiate a settlement with the US.

Although the US has moved in the direction of talking to Iran – to the relief of its European allies – it still rejects one-on-one negotiations and insists that the Iranians first suspend their nuclear fuel programme.

Similarly with North Korea, the US is resisting direct talks outside the six-party process that has stalled for nearly a year. Responding to its claim of a nuclear test on Monday, the US is speaking the language of isolation and deterrence.

"Well, I think the North Koreans know that firing a nuclear missile, shall we say, would not be good for North Korean security," Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, stated.

"The North Koreans are not confused about what it would mean to launch a nuclear attack against the United States, one of our allies or somebody in the neighbourhood."

John Hillen, assistant secretary of state for political and military affairs, is leading the push for a "new security architecture" in the Persian Gulf to counter the perceived threat from Iran. This involves beefed up military co-operation, including big ticket hardware sales, with Arab states in the Gulf Co-operation Council who are enjoying the windfall from higher oil prices.

Not surprisingly, the Arab states that feared both the wrath of the US and the threat of Islamist extremists after September 11 welcome such solicitations.

But Emile El-Hokayem, analyst at the Stimson Center in Washington, says the Arab Gulf states have a predicament. He recalls that Qatar, which hosts a US military base, was the only Security Council member not to vote in favour of the July 31 resolution demanding that Iran stop its uranium enrichment.

He also argues that a containment strategy relying heavily on a build-up of GCC military capabilities could backfire "by validating Iran's security concerns and justifying Tehran's need for a deterrent".

A less adventurist foreign policy would be welcomed by the US public, according to a poll by the Chicago Council on Global Affairs. Three out of four Americans feel the US is overdoing the job of global policeman, only 17 per cent rank spreading democracy as an important foreign policy goal, while 61 per cent say the war in Iraq has not reduced the threat of terrorism.

In Iran, Two Power Centers Vie Amid Standoff Over Nuclear Fuel (WSJ)

By Bill Spindle

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0080522

TEHRAN, Iran -- As the West debates how to deal with North Korea after its defiant nuclear test, another atomic confrontation awaits the world's attention, the showdown with Iran. In some ways, it is even trickier.

Both nations' leaders taunt America with bombastic rhetoric. But unlike Kim Jong Il's North Korea, Iran isn't a one-man dictatorship. Contrary to a common view of an Iran as being firmly in the hands of its fiery president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, Iran is torn by competing power centers that wage a daily battle for supremacy.

On one side is a mostly youthful group of fundamentalist hard-liners, typified by Mr. Ahmadinejad, who are determined to keep the revolutionary spirit vibrant. On the other is Iran's elite class of clerics, aging former revolutionaries and businessmen -- also deeply conservative and wary of reform, but far less interested in confronting the world and risking the isolation of their country.

Typifying this less-recognized power center is Iran's tough but suave chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani. He is a fluent English speaker whose appointment to the critical negotiating role was seen inside Iran as a way to counterbalance the mercurial president.

Mr. Ahmadinejad tries to shake things up and sometimes succeeds, says Nassar Hadian, a political-science professor at Tehran University, "but the entire establishment of Iran is opposed to him."

Both factions vow to proceed with Iran's uranium enrichment program, which they insist is solely for peaceful purposes. Both also seek a bigger role for Iran in the regional and world stages. But they have quite different ideas about how to achieve it and about just what kind of role Iran should play in the world.

President Ahmadinejad's group favors confrontation with the West, figuring Russia and China will never back tough sanctions but instead will always offer Iran access to world markets. Iran's more traditional and establishment conservatives, by contrast, put emphasis on maintaining economic and political ties to the West, and perhaps even opening some sort of dialogue with the U.S.

All this makes for a complicated task facing the United Nations Security Council as it tries to hash out sanctions over Iran, following its defiance of an Aug. 31 U.N. deadline to accept economic incentives in exchange for giving up nuclear-fuel enrichment. The U.S. argues that only the pressure of tough sanctions will induce Iran's hard-liners to back down. Others argue that lowering tensions, perhaps by direct U.S.-Iran dialogue, would bolster pragmatic Iranian leaders who don't want to see the country outside the international fold.

The two strains of Iranian conservatism wrangle endlessly, from the oil ministry to the parliament to the backrooms where much authority really rests. Establishment conservatives have often checked the 50-year-old Mr. Ahmadinejad's ambitious plans for change. For instance, parliament ignored his drive to overhaul the oil ministry, the spigot for 80% of Iran's export income. Parliament rejected three attempts by Mr. Ahmadinejad to place loyalists as oil minister.

But Mr. Ahmadinejad has stretched the limited powers of the presidency with bombast and provocative rhetoric, thereby sometimes managing to dominate policy decisions, especially on the nuclear issue. His ability to create public furors, such as by taunting Israel and questioning the Holocaust, have brought him Western condemnation but a burst of popularity in the Muslim world. The result has been to further his agenda of defiance, as the West's negative reaction creates a sense in Iran that it is under siege and thus shouldn't give ground.

"He's tried to provoke a crisis in order to achieve better control," says Saeed Laylaz, a political analyst in Tehran.

Mr. Ahmadinejad isn't Iran's top official. That is Ali Khamenei, 67, the Supreme Leader. He gets the last word, and everyone in the system pays homage to him. But Ayatollah Khamenei is a power broker who tests the political winds in the country and moves carefully with them.

It wasn't many years ago that Iran's big political battles pitted hard-liners against liberal reformers pushing democracy and social freedom. The champion of reform, Mohammed Khatami, was president for eight years until 2005 but delivered little change. Liberals lost control first of parliament and then of the presidency. Conservatives have been in the clear ascendancy since President Ahmadinejad's election last year.

But it didn't take long after that for tensions in the conservative camp to emerge. Ayatollah Khamenei appointed Mr. Larijani -- from the camp opposite to the president-elect -- to oversee Iran's nuclear negotiations, as Secretary of the Supreme National Security Council.

Ayatollah Khamenei had backed Mr. Larijani in the presidential race just weeks earlier. His appointment was seen as a signal the nuclear portfolio would be kept out of Mr. Ahmadinejad's control.

Mr. Larijani is as close to an establishment blue-blood as there is here. He is the son of a Grand Ayatollah, the pinnacle of the Shiite Muslim world's religious hierarchy. He and his three brothers were reared in protected religious centers and have held various high political positions over many years. He is married to a daughter of a famous Iranian cleric and is close to the powerful speaker of Iran's parliament.

DOJ_NMG_0080523

Refined and intellectual, Mr. Larijani, 49, has studied math, computer science and Western philosophy. In his last role, heading the government broadcasting operation, he introduced sports and entertainment channels -- in addition to a bigger stream of state propaganda and religious programming -- as the regime tried to keep up with satellite TV that is spreading in Iran despite being illegal.

Like the president, Mr. Larijani is a true believer in the Iranian Revolution, say diplomats who know him. "He's a real hard-liner, purely in it for the survival of the regime," says a European diplomat who's been involved with the nuclear talks. He strikes diplomats as a smooth conveyor of a steely message. "In the way Larijani acts and talks, even the way he walks...he is the opposite of a populist or a demagogue," says another European diplomat who has dealt with him in the current talks.

It's a contrast to Mr. Ahmadinejad's public embrace of U.S. antagonists like Venezuela. Mr. Larijani has talked up another model for Iran: India, a nation that, even while developing nuclear weapons, has deepened its ties with the U.S. and international community.

Ayatollah Khamenei, the Supreme Leader who made Mr. Larijani the nuclear negotiator, has nonetheless not stopped Mr. Ahmadinejad from speaking out on the nuclear issue. And Mr. Ahmadinejad has proved adept at using his pulpit to influence the Supreme Leader.

Mr. Khamenei got the top position in a period of intense political maneuvering following Ayatollah Khomeini's death in 1989. Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, the late hero of the 1979 revolution, had fused, in the Supreme Leader role, the Islamic Republic's two founding values: religious faith and revolutionary spirit.

The Supreme Leader enforces the values through a network that includes the judiciary, the military and the Guardian and Expediency Councils. The 12-member Guardian Council, whose membership is controlled by the Supreme Leader, is especially powerful: It decides who is allowed to run for office, and it has overturned hundreds of laws passed by parliament.

Ayatollah Khamenei after 1997 went along with some moves by the reformist president then in office to relax political and social rules. But by 2004, the Supreme Leader was working with conservatives to oust the reformers.

Critics of Mr. Ahmadinejad believe he has used the crisis atmosphere of nuclear dealings to offer Ayatollah Khamenei something that previously eluded him: a chance to make Iran a leader in the wider Muslim world. They say this dynamic gives Mr. Ahmadinejad pull with the ayatollah on nuclear issues, where the president has little formal role.

Critics of the radical president worry that his clout may be growing, based on two key diplomatic exchanges this year.

One was in March, when Mr. Larijani announced Iran was willing to discuss Iraq with the U.S. Mr. Ahmadinejad and his backers attacked the idea bitterly in speeches and newspaper editorials. Ayatollah Khamenei publicly backed Mr. Larijani. But it turned out the U.S., whose offer to talk had been on the table for months, had by this time lost interest. Mr. Ahmadinejad then stole Mr. Larijani's thunder by writing a rambling letter to Mr. Bush that renewed Iran's defiant stance -- and that spoke to a wider Muslim populace angry with America.

Mr. Larijani fared worse in the second exchange. It involved the U.N.'s Aug. 31 deadline for Iran to give up uranium enrichment in return for economic benefits. After the deadline passed with no compliance by Iran, President Ahmadinejad sent one of his top aides to Paris to meet French President Jacques Chirac. Among issues they would discuss was Lebanon, where France was reluctant to contribute to a U.N. peacekeeping force because of the risk of coming into conflict with Hezbollah. Iran has long supported and advised that group.

Just two days later, Mr. Larijani was talking about a softer line on the nuclear issue. As before, President Ahmadinejad was assailing the softer line. Ayatollah Khamenei remained silent. Soon, Mr. Larijani gave up discussing any sort of enrichment suspension, in what appeared to be a tactical victory for Mr. Ahmadinejad.

Yet, the struggle for power over Iran's policy has hardly ended. And as always, it's taking place in the larger context of the establishment's attempts to keep Mr. Ahmadinejad in check. Consider a recent move by a former president of Iran, Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, a man who is hard to categorize politically but is surely part of the Iranian establishment.

Mr. Rafsanjani is a man Mr. Ahmadinejad defeated in the 2005 presidential vote. He also is a candidate for the Assembly of Experts, a panel that could have a big say over who becomes the next Supreme Leader.

This month, Mr. Rafsanjani released a secret letter that the late Ayatollah Khomeini wrote almost two decades ago, explaining why he was willing to end the eight-year war with Saddam Hussein's Iraq short of victory. Ayatollah Khomeini said military officers had told him that to continue, they would need far more firepower, perhaps even a nuclear weapon. A newspaper close to Mr. Rafsanjani then editorialized that Ayatollah Khomeini was wise not to let his revolutionary ideology get in the way of "a realistic understanding of the international situation." For Mr. Rafsanjani's supporters, the message was unmistakable: Today's Iran, too, should proceed with caution and pragmatism.

Mr. Ahmadinejad now is striking back. He spent much of the week denouncing Mr. Rafsanjani for releasing the letter. He also put his right-hand aide into a key position in the Interior Ministry -- one that oversees Iran's elections.

Iran Defies Call To Drop Nuclear Plans (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

TEHRAN, Oct. 12 — The Iranian leadership is vowing to continue to defy an international demand to stop nuclear activities while refusing to condemn North Korea for its reported test of a small nuclear device.

Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, said in a speech on Tuesday that Iran would continue its uranium enrichment program, asserting, as other senior Iranian leaders have done, that the program was intended for peaceful civilian purposes.

He said the decision was made easier by the fact that Iran voluntarily suspended enrichment three years ago, a cooperative gesture that proved fruitless. "If we had not experienced that path, perhaps we would have criticized ourselves today," he said. "But now we will pursue with a strong heart."

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said in a speech on Tuesday that Iran would "continue its path of dignity based on resistance, wisdom and without fear."

The government spokesman, Gholam Hossein Elham, while saying that "Iran opposes any use of weapons of mass destruction," nevertheless blamed the United States for the nuclear test that North Korea said it conducted Monday. "The root cause of this should be sought in the policy, behavior and method adopted by the rulers of the United States," he said Tuesday in his weekly news conference.

It appeared that Iran was emboldened by North Korea's action, and what seemed to be light penalties proposed Wednesday in the United Nations Security Council. Iran and North Korea face possible Security Council sanctions over nuclear activities.

"It looks like the message of North Korea's test for Iran was that it can also continue its program," said Saeed Leylaz, an economist and political analyst in Tehran. "They felt that if they act forcefully and confrontationally, they can also proceed with their program like North Korea."

Iran, unlike North Korea, contends that its program is for civilian purposes, and Ayatollah Khamenei has repeatedly spoken out against nuclear weapons. Although Iran's facilities are visited by inspectors from the International Atomic Energy Agency, the United States contends that Tehran is using its civilian nuclear activities as a cover for a nuclear weapons program.

In an editorial on Tuesday, Kargozaran, a moderate daily newspaper, said North Korea could proceed with its program because it had China as its ally.

"The international community was less tough with North Korea, which has a nuclear bomb, than with Iran, which does not have a nuclear bomb," the newspaper said.

Iranians were mixed about whether Iran should continue with its nuclear program.

Some said they felt strongly that their country should pursue nuclear weapons, and dismissed efforts by the United States to halt proliferation. "A country that has nuclear bombs has no right to tell other countries that they should not have one," said Javad Tabatabai, a retired schoolteacher, as he browsed at a newsstand in north Tehran. "We are a superpower in the region, and no one will dare to stop our program."

Others said just as strongly that Iran should give up the quest. "People are hungry," said Armin Manouchehri, a 33-year-old mechanic. "Why do we need a nuclear program when the government is not capable of controlling the inflation?" Inflation is running in double digits in Iran, with items like bread and fuel rising even more.

Some people said they feared that the Security Council might be even tougher on Iran now. "North Korea's tests will make the West more sensitive toward Iran because Iran is in a more sensitive place in the Middle East than North Korea," said Fazlali Mahmoudi, 80, a pharmacist. "I am afraid that our leaders' policies would drag the country to the brink of war."

Israeli Forces Kill At Least 7 Palestinians In Gaza Fighting (WP)

By Scott Wilson, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 13, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 12 -- Israeli forces killed at least seven Palestinians on Thursday in the Gaza Strip during hours of sporadic ground fighting and airstrikes. Five of those killed were from a single family.

Israeli military officials said forces entered the strip before dawn near the central Gaza city of Khan Younis in search of cross-border tunnels that Palestinian armed groups use for smuggling.

The troops were fired on soon after, Israeli military officials said, and returned fire during a series of small-scale attacks for the next few hours. In addition to the dead, at least 11 Palestinians were reported wounded in the exchanges.

DOJ_NMG_0080525

The most severe strike occurred when an Israeli military aircraft, which Palestinian witnesses identified as an Apache attack helicopter, fired on ground targets near the eastern border town of Abassan.

Palestinian medics reported that five members of the Gdaih family were killed in the strike, including three gunmen from the Izzedine al-Qassam Brigades, Hamas's military arm. The two others were identified as Adel Gdaih, 40, and his 13-year-old son, Suhaib. Witnesses said they were unarmed.

An Israeli airstrike in the Shajaiyeh neighborhood of Gaza City killed at least two Palestinians and injured four others just after nightfall, according to Palestinian health officials. The target was the home of Ashraf Forwana, a Hamas gunman, who was not there at the time.

One of those killed was an 8-year-old girl, hospital officials said, and the other was Forwana's 40-year-old brother. It was unclear whether he was affiliated with Hamas's military wing.

Israel seized Gaza in the 1967 Middle East war but evacuated its settlements and military posts there last year. Israeli forces reentered the strip after the June 25 capture of an army corporal in a cross-border raid carried out by Hamas's military wing and two smaller armed groups at war with the Jewish state.

Negotiations are underway to exchange the captured Israeli soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, for some of the roughly 8,500 Palestinians being held in Israeli jails.

The Palestinian Health Ministry reports that the Israeli military operation, known as Summer Rains, has killed 290 Palestinians, including at least 35 children. International and Israeli human rights agencies also put the number of dead at more than 200, many of them civilians.

Israeli forces are also operating in northern Gaza to stop the firing of crude rockets into southern Israel. At least five rockets landed in southern Israel in the hours after the fighting, including one that disrupted electrical service in the city of Sderot. No injuries were reported.

Special correspondent Islam Abdelkareem in Gaza contributed to this report.

Israeli Operations In Gaza Leave 8 Dead (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, October 13, 2006

JERUSALEM — Israeli forces killed eight people in separate operations in the Gaza Strip on Thursday, Palestinian officials said, as militants fired several rockets into southern Israel.

Six people were killed in the southern Gaza Strip during an Israeli operation early in the day near the town of Khan Yunis.

At least three of those killed in the clashes were identified as fighters belonging to the military wing of Hamas, the ruling Palestinian movement. The others were bystanders, including a man and his 13-year-old son, who were from the same extended family as the slain militants, neighbors said.

Two people, including a 2-year-old girl, died Thursday night during an Israeli airstrike on a house on the eastern edge of Gaza City, Palestinian officials said.

The strike, which targeted the home of Ashraf Farwana, a senior Hamas militant, also killed his 38-year-old brother, Ayman. Israeli officials said Ashraf Farwana had been involved in attacks against Israel and was making and distributing weapons to Hamas militants.

The eight fatalities marked the highest one-day death toll stemming from Israeli military actions in more than a month. At least 13 Palestinians were wounded in the Khan Yunis clashes and seven others were hurt in the evening airstrike in the Shajaiyeh neighborhood, hospital officials in Khan Yunis and Gaza City said.

Hamas responded to the morning raid by firing at least six Kassam rockets toward Israel, and four made it over the border, the Israeli army said. The rocket salvos caused no injuries and only minor damage to farms, the military said.

The Israeli operation began before dawn Thursday in the village of Abasan, just outside Khan Yunis.

An Israeli spokeswoman said troops were searching for cross-border tunnels and "any kind of terror threat." But Palestinian officials said they suspected that the Israelis were after a Hamas militant living in the area.

The army said soldiers shot at Palestinian gunmen who had fired on them with rifles and antitank missiles. The spokeswoman said the troops believed they had struck gunmen during at least three separate encounters.

Later, an Israeli aircraft fired a missile at a group of armed men who approached the soldiers on the ground, the military said. Palestinians said the missile killed the three militants, all from the Qudeh clan, and that a second projectile hit a house, killing the man and his son.

Israel has conducted sporadic raids since launching a broad incursion into the Gaza Strip after militants killed two soldiers and captured a third by tunneling under the border June 25. Hamas claimed partial responsibility for the cross-border raid.

DOJ_NMG_0080526

The fate of the abducted soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit, remains unknown. Mediation efforts to win his release as part of a prisoner exchange with Israel have so far failed.

The military operations since June have left more than 200 Palestinians dead.

Hamas is locked in a power struggle with the once-dominant Fatah movement of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. Negotiations over a coalition government have bogged down over Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel.

Abbas and Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh last month said they had agreed on an alliance. But the deal unraveled, and clashes last week between the two factions left 10 dead and ratcheted up a feeling of lawlessness on the streets of the Gaza Strip and West Bank.

On Thursday, a 30-year-old Palestinian intelligence officer died after being wounded in a shooting in Gaza City. Last month, gunmen in Gaza killed Jad Tayeh, a ranking Palestinian intelligence officer.

French Pass Bill That Punishes Denial Of Armenian Genocide (NYT)

By Thomas Crampton

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

PARIS, Oct. 12 — The National Assembly, defying appeals from Turkey, approved legislation Thursday that would make it a crime to deny that the mass killings of Armenians in Turkey during and after World War I were genocide.

The legislation, which was criticized by Turkey's government and some European Union officials, could further complicate talks for Turkey's admission to the Union.

With 106 deputies voting in favor and 19 against, the law sets fines of up to 45,000 euros, or about $56,000, and a year in prison for denying the genocide. Of the 577 members of the Assembly, 4 abstained and 448 did not vote at all, raising the question of whether there would be enough political will to push the law through the Senate.

Scholars and most Western governments have recognized the killing of more than a million Armenians by Ottoman Turks from 1915 to 1919 as genocide. But the subject is still taboo in Turkey, and charges have been pressed against writers and others who have brought attention to the genocide, including Orhan Pamuk, who was just awarded the Nobel Prize in literature.

"The Turkish people refuse the limitation of freedom of expression on the basis of groundless claims," the Turkish Foreign Ministry said in a statement. "With this draft law, France unfortunately loses its privileged status in the eyes of Turkish public opinion."

Ali Babacan, the Turkish economy minister and the country's lead negotiator on talks with Europe, said he could not rule out consequences for French companies.

"What happened in France today, we believe, is not in line with the core values of the European Union," Mr. Babacan said, adding that the government would not encourage a boycott of French goods.

In Brussels, the European Union warned that the law could have a harmful effect on negotiations. "It would prohibit dialogue which is necessary for reconciliation on the issue," said Krisztina Nagy, a spokeswoman for the Union. "It is not up to law to write history. Historians need to have debate."

Turkey's potential membership in the European Union has been a hot political topic here ahead of the presidential elections next spring. The leading candidates to succeed President Jacques Chirac, including Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy and Ségolène Royal, have agreed that Turkey must acknowledge the genocide before gaining membership. But the new legislation has been more of a campaign issue in France, which has one of Europe's largest Armenian populations.

Although most of France's top politicians supported the European Union's planned constitution, the French rejected it last year in a referendum that was also seen as a vote against further European expansion. The problem for politicians seeking to succeed Mr. Chirac is how to oppose Turkish entry without taking on the xenophobic tones of the far right.

After the vote, Mr. Chirac's government, which opposed the legislation, expressed eagerness for dialogue with Turkey and said the bill was unnecessary and inopportune. "We are very committed to dialogue with Turkey, as well as to the strong ties of friendship and cooperation which link us to that country," said Jean-Baptiste Mattéi, a spokesman for the Foreign Ministry.

Ms. Royal, who is the leading Socialist candidate for president, has loudly supported the bill. On Wednesday, she reiterated that "obviously," Turkey would have to recognize the genocide, and added, "My opinion is that of the French people."

Two other senior Socialists, Dominique Strauss-Kahn and Jack Lang, had reservations about the bill.

On the center right, Mr. Sarkozy has opposed Turkey's joining the European Union, but he kept silent about the genocide bill, which was sponsored by the Socialists.

A leading Turkish analyst of the European Union, Can Baydarol, said that although the decision would seem to have no direct effect on Turkey's relations with Europe, the hostile attitude of French lawmakers demonstrated some of the obstacles to Turkish membership.

DOJ_NMG_0080527

"Now people see that more than the technical details, political maneuvers will mark the years-long process on the way to full membership," he said.

French 'Genocide' Bill Raises Worry On Turkish Trade Ties (WSJ)

By Geraldine Amiel

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

PARIS -- French lawmakers in the National Assembly approved a bill that would make it a crime to deny that the mass killings of Armenians in Turkey during and after World War I amounted to genocide.

The action by the lower house of the French Parliament poses a threat to France's trade relationship with Turkey and "puts at stake what is an important economic relationship for us," said French Trade Minister Christine Lagarde.

The bill -- introduced by the opposition Socialists -- still would need to be approved by the Senate and signed by French President Jacques Chirac. "It's going to be a long trip before it is passed, and I hope it won't succeed," Ms. Lagarde said.

Turkey represents "a €10 billion [$12.5 billion] relationship, with €5 billion worth of exports with an annual growth of 20%," she added. According to data for 2005 on the Turkish Treasury Web site, France is the third-largest foreign investor in Turkey after Germany and the U.S.

In Brussels, Turkey's economy minister, Ali Babacan, warned that the French vote "might have economic consequences." The European Commission, the executive arm of the European Union, also noted that the bill -- if approved by the French legislature's other chamber and signed into law -- would hamper reconciliation between Turkey and Armenia.

An estimated 1.5 million Armenians were killed from 1915 to 1919. Turkey maintains the deaths occurred during civil unrest, disputes the numbers and rejects the genocide label. The French government declared in January 2001 that the killings of Armenians at the end of World War I constituted genocide.

Turkey Dealt Blow Over EU Accession (FT)

By Martin Arnold And Vincent Boland

Financial Times, October 13, 2006

Turkey's prospects of joining the European Union took a heavy blow on Thursday night, after France's National Assembly approved a bill which outraged Ankara and that critics say will set back the cause of reform within Turkey itself.

The French legislation, which could still be blocked by the senate, would make it a crime to deny that Armenians were the victims of genocide in the last years of the Ottoman Empire.

The bill was read in Turkey as a sign that France was now permanently opposed to Ankara's bid to join the EU. Bulent Arinc, the parliamentary speaker, criticised France's "hostile attitude" towards Turkey. "This is a shameful decision. We are very sorry to see that this [bill] was passed only because of internal [French] politics."

Turkey itself denies genocide and the judicial authorities have prosecuted writers who have used the term to describe the killings of Armenians.

One of the most prominent such figures is Orhan Pamuk, the Turkish novelist, who was awarded the Nobel prize for literature on Thursday minutes after the French vote.

Opinion polls show a majority of French voters oppose Turkish membership. The issue is sensitive in France because of the country's 450,000-strong Armenian community, which has grown rich and influential.

Armenians say as many as 1.5m people died in 1915-18, while Turkey admits only that hundreds of thousands of both Armenians and Turks died, largely as a result of civil war and famine.

Anti-EU sentiment in Turkey has risen sharply recently, ahead of a crucial European Commission report next month that is likely to be critical of Turkey's lack of progress over reforms.

Even before Thursay's vote, many diplomats believed that the EU membership talks could be formally suspended this year and might never be revived.

Politicians in Ankara have threatened to retaliate with economic sanctions and have even toyed with a law making it a crime to deny that North Africans were massacred by French colonial rulers.

While Mr Chirac favours Turkish accession to the EU, prominent ministers such as Nicolas Sarkozy are firmly opposed. Ségolène Royal, the Socialists' leading presidential candidate, has been non-committal, saying this week she would defer to public opinion on the question.

But Mr Chirac said on a visit to Armenia this month that Turkish recognition of the Armenian genocide should become a pre-condition of EU membership.

Diplomats and political commentators said French companies could be frozen out of the bidding as Turkey prepares to build three nuclear power stations and to replace parts of its defence infrastructure.

French Bill Enrages Turkey (WT/AP)

By Emmanuel Georges-Picot

The Washington Times, October 13, 2006

PARIS -- France's lower house of parliament approved a bill yesterday that would make it a crime to deny that mass killings of Armenians in Turkey during the World War I era amounted to genocide, provoking anger in Turkey.

In Ankara, Turks threw eggs at the French Embassy amid growing calls to boycott French goods, although the bill faces a major struggle to become law.

"No one should harbor the conviction that Turkey will take this lightly," Turkish Foreign Minister Abdullah Gul said.

The bill passed 106-19, but the majority of the 557 lawmakers in France's lower house did not take part in the vote.

President Jacques Chirac's government opposed the bill, brought by the opposition Socialist Party, but did not use its majority in the lower house to vote it down.

Mr. Chirac did not comment on the vote yesterday, although he has said that the bill "is more of a polemic than legal reality." Catherine Colonna, his former spokeswoman and current minister for European affairs, told parliament that "it is not for the law to write history."

France's Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen, enacted in 1789 and considered to carry the legal force of a constitution, states: "The free communication of ideas and opinions is one of the most precious of the rights of man. Every citizen may, accordingly, speak, write, and print with freedom, but shall be responsible for such abuses of this freedom as shall be defined by law."

In practice, French law prohibits public speech or writings that incite racial or religious hatred, as well as those that deny the Jewish Holocaust during World War II.

The Armenia genocide issue has become intertwined with ongoing debate in France and across Europe about whether to admit mostly Muslim Turkey into the European Union. France is home to hundreds of thousands of people whose families came from Armenia.

An hour after the vote, Turkish novelist Orhan Pamuk won the Nobel Prize in literature for his works dealing with the symbols of clashing cultures.

Mr. Pamuk was charged last year with insulting Turkish identity after he told a Swiss newspaper that Turkey was unwilling to deal with two of the most painful episodes in its recent history: the massacre of Armenians and guerrilla fighting in Turkey's overwhelmingly Kurdish southeast. The charge was later dropped.

Mr. Chirac has urged Turkey to recognize "the genocide of Armenians" in order to join the bloc. "Each country grows by acknowledging its dramas and errors of the past," he said.

France already recognizes the killings of up to 1.5 million Armenians from 1915 to 1919 as genocide; under yesterday's bill, those who contest it was genocide would risk up to a year in prison and fines of up to $56,000.

French Bill Complicates Turkey's EU Bid (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, October 13, 2006

ISTANBUL, TURKEY

By a wide margin, the French parliament voted Thursday to make it a criminal act to deny an Armenian genocide at the hands of Ottoman Turks, enraging Turkey and further deepening its suspicion of the European Union.

Islamic Turkey - which has sought for decades to join the EU and is now in membership negotiations - vowed retaliation against France that could disrupt billions of dollars in trade, even as both sides explore the limits of free speech.

The vote came the same day that Orhan Pamuk, the celebrated Turkish novelist, was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature. Charges of "denigrating Turkishness" against Mr. Pamuk - brought after he publicly spoke of the killing of 1 million Armenians during World War I, and 30,000 Kurds - were dropped earlier this year in a case seen as a test of Turkey's commitment to EU-driven reforms.

The two events get at the heart of contradictions in modern Turkey, where democratic and West-leaning EU aspirations often clash with history. The staunchly secular state - a full member of the NATO military alliance - casts itself as an indispensable bridge between East and West, but has yet to be accepted as such by Europe.

Many Turks see the genocide vote - a hot- button issue - as just one more obstacle to keep them out of the 25-member EU club.

DOJ_NMG_0080529

"Turks find it very hard to swallow this; even Francophile Turks educated there are turning their backs on France," says Sami Kohen, a foreign affairs columnist for Milliyet newspaper. "A lot of us fear this will further encourage critics of the EU [who] will say: 'Enough is enough; we should give up on this EU.' "

Turkish lawmakers Wednesday proposed a counter-bill that would recognize an "Algerian genocide" carried out by colonial French forces in 1945.

Turkish columnists are also raising France's considerable role in Rwanda's 1994 genocide, as they seek to even the moral playing field.

Analysts say the French vote is likely to embolden Turkish nationalists and those who oppose EU membership for Turkey. Recent polls show that Turkish support for joining the EU has dropped from nearly 70 to around 50 percent now.

To become law, the bill must pass the French senate, which is not certain, and be signed by President Jacques Chirac. Punishment would include a one-year prison term, and a €45,000 ($56,500) fine, the same penalty now on French books for denying the Holocaust.

One Turkish newspaper headline took aim at France's reputation as the home of human rights and justice. It read: "Liberté, égalité, stupidité."

"French-Turkish relations, which have developed over centuries ... have been dealt a blow today as a result of the irresponsible false claims of French politicians who do not see the political consequences of their actions," Turkey's foreign ministry Abdullah Gul said in a statement.

"If this bill is passed, Turkey will not lose anything but France will lose Turkey," Mr. Gul had warned before the vote. "[France] will turn into a country that jails people who express their views."

The vote has become a political issue in France, where a majority is against Turkey's membership in the EU, where 400,000 ethnic Armenians live, and presidential elections are to be held in seven months. French exports to Turkey in 2005 totaled $5 billion.

During a visit to Armenia last week, Mr. Chirac stated that Turkey should not be allowed to join the EU unless it officially accepts that the death of more than 1 million Armenians, which took place in the last years of the Ottoman Empire, constitute a "genocide."

Though the French government said Thursday it opposed the legislation as "unnecessary and untimely," Chirac says Turkey must recognize the genocide before it joins the EU.

But while EU officials have been at pains to note that no such genocide criterion applies to Turkey, the sentiment matches widening unease in Europe over Turkey's EU application. Such fears in France are believed to be one reason the French last year rejected the proposed EU constitution.

"France has done its best to hamper Turkey's relations with the EU" and has been seeking "a kind of vengeance" against Turkey since the EU constitution failure, says Seyfi Tashan, director of the Turkish Foreign Policy Institute in Ankara, Turkey's capital. "So politically, the more damage they do to Turkey, the better."

Armenians say that 1.5 million died in 1915 in the first systematic genocide of the 20th century, though historians often count 1 million. Turkey officially argues that some 300,000 Armenians died in a partisan conflict that took just as many Turkish lives, when Armenians sided with invading Russian armies during World War I.

While Turkey has declared that it would open its files to historians, a host of Turkish writers and academics who have challenged official versions of events, sometimes using the word "genocide," have been charged with insulting the state by hard-line prosecutors.

Treading that line has been Mr. Pamuk, whose novels have dug into Turkey's imperial past to explore the contradictions and dilemmas of modern Turkey. The Nobel citation praised the work: "In the quest for the melancholic soul of his native city, [Pamuk] has discovered new symbols for the clash and interlacing of cultures." In February 2005, Pamuk told a Swiss newspaper that "30,000 Kurds and a million Armenians were killed in these lands and nobody but me dares to talk about it."

"What I said is not an insult, it is the truth," Pamuk said during his trial. "But what if it is wrong? Right or wrong, do people not have the right express their ideas peacefully?"

Pamuk The Provocative (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

The Swedish Academy has shown it's once again plugged into the Zeitgeist by awarding the Nobel Prize for Literature to Turkish novelist Orhan Pamuk. The award might be better named the Nobel Prize for Most Provocative Public Intellectual.

In seven novels, one memoir and countless public statements, the 54-year-old product of Istanbul's Europeanized upper classes explores tensions not so much between Islam and the West as within Muslim society itself. In that sense, Mr. Pamuk comes as a relief from the blind anti-Americanism of such recent European winners as Harold Pinter.

DOJ_NMG_0080530

In an interview with the Journal last December, Mr. Pamuk said he believed in a "liberal outlook" in which democracy, Western freedoms and Islam are compatible. But as his life and work bear out, clashes are inevitable. "Snow" (2002), which he called "my first and last political novel," explored the violent assault of political Islam on Turkey's rigid secular order. Three years later, ultra-nationalists persecuted Mr. Pamuk for speaking out against Turkey's historical amnesia about the 1915 massacre of Armenians; the charges of "insulting Turkishness" were later dropped.

In Mr. Pamuk's vision of a free Muslim society, space exists for religious conservatives, nationalists and Westernized people like himself. He rejects attempts by Islamists and Kemalists alike to impose their order by force, and sees in Turkey's attempts to join the European Union protection against both camps. Still, the overriding tone of his work is melancholy and betrays doubts about whether his open Muslim state can ever be.

After the death of the Egyptian Nobelist Naguib Mahfouz in late August, Mr. Pamuk took on the role of the world's best-known Muslim novelist, the West's literary guide to the East. It is a heavy burden for a writer of innovative but often plodding and windy work. Yesterday's honor will make him better known world-wide. If it also helps to make his vision of a modern Muslim society better known, so much the better.

U.S. Cuts Funding For AIDS Program (AP)

By Michael M. Phillips

AP, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Bush administration cut funding for the only U.S. foreign-assistance project that provided male circumcision as a method of AIDS prevention.

At a time when scientists are lining up behind the idea that circumcision provides substantial protection against HIV transmission, the U.S. Agency for International Development pulled out of a small, $150,000 program in Swaziland that had circumcised more than 325 men since it was launched in January.

David Snider, a USAID spokesman, said the agency had been wrong to provide its initial funding for the program, which is run by a private non-profit called Family Life Association of Swaziland. U.S. foreign-assistance guidelines allow American money to be used for "formative assessments related to male circumcision but will not support the actual provision of clinical services" until further scientific evidence of its effectiveness is available.

The initial U.S. funding for the FLAS project "should not have occurred, and there will be no further circumcisions performed with U.S. government funds" until the scientific steering committee that guides U.S. aid so recommends, Mr. Snider said in a written response to questions.

"This was the one donor-funded program that was making male circumcision more available anywhere in Africa," said a Western AIDS official who works with Swaziland. "The other donors aren't doing anything to actually provide the services, and people are dying in huge numbers."

Swaziland, a tiny kingdom in southern Africa, has the world's highest HIV prevalence rate, with 33.4% of adults thought to be infected, according to UNAIDS. Almost 39 million people worldwide carry the AIDS virus, 24.5 million of them in sub-Sahara n Africa, according to UNAIDS.

At least three major studies have looked at the effect of circumcision on HIV transmission. One study in South Africa concluded that circumcision reduced the risk of HIV infection by 60% to 75%. The other studies are still underway.

Word of the initial findings, however, has spread around Africa, sparking a surge of demand for circumcision.

"The demand will not lose its momentum," predicted Dr. Adam Groeneveld, Swaziland's only urologist, who performs circumcisions at the Government Hospital in the capital city of Mbabane. "That's why FLAS will have to find some other source of money. There will be a temporary dip in the number of circumcisions, and an increase in the waiting list."

Dr. Groeneveld said the FLAS project, while small, provided a substantial increase in circumcision services. Doctors at Government Hospital perform just 10 circumcisions a week, and someone asking to be circumcised today would have to wait until February for the procedure, he said. The hospital is experimenting with the idea of devoting one entire day each weekend exclusively to circumcision procedures, he said.

AIDS Tests, Everywhere (NYT)

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

At the beginning of 2004, AIDS treatment in Botswana — a country with the world's second-highest rate of H.I.V. cases — was stagnating. The country was providing free antiretrovirals, but only one in 10 who needed the drugs was taking them.

Then Botswana made a simple change in the rules for AIDS testing that allowed the program to soar. Previously, Botswanans could get tested only after providing written consent and accepting extensive counseling. Now, unless they object, all patients entering a clinic or hospital are routinely given an AIDS test. The rate of testing has quadrupled. A third of Botswanans now know their H.I.V. status, and 85 percent of those who need treatment get it.

The American Centers for Disease Control and Prevention recommended late last month that such routine AIDS testing — called opt-out — become the standard in the United States. This is an important reform. It is even more crucial for poor countries, where 90 percent of those infected do not know it.

Unaids and the World Health Organization should move quickly to endorse opt-out AIDS testing. Their guidance is followed worldwide and will help rally needed help from outside donors.

The current protocols for testing — with their strong emphasis on privacy and consent — were designed when little could be done to help people with H.I.V. Now antiretrovirals are being rolled out in every country. But without easy access to testing, people may find out they have AIDS only when it is too late to save their lives. They will also have spent years unknowingly passing on the infection.

Where opt-out testing has been used, few patients decline tests. Treating H.I.V. like any other disease could also help lessen the stigma. People who have been tested before they feel sick also start AIDS treatment earlier, and do better on it. And studies show that those who know their status are only half as likely to infect someone else, when compared with an H.I.V. carrier who is still in the dark.

Governments need to follow Botswana's lead and make AIDS testing routine in every health clinic and hospital. And donors should ensure that every clinic has a reliable supply of AIDS tests.

Venezuela Challenges U.S.-backed Guatemala For U.N. Seat (MCT)

By Pablo Bachelet

McClatchy Newspapers, October 13, 2006

WASHINGTON - Elections to seats on the United Nations Security Council are usually drab affairs, beyond the diplomatic chatter and a sense of international respect for the winners. But not this year.

Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez is challenging U.S.-backed Guatemala for a seat, triggering what many analysts and diplomats are calling the hottest Security Council race in nearly 30 years.

The 192 U.N. member nations will vote at a General Assembly session Monday on which of the two countries will succeed Argentina for a two-year term in the council seat reserved for Latin America. A two-thirds vote is required to win. There's a chance that neither will prevail and another country will be chosen as a compromise.

Chavez's self-avowed campaign to forge a Third World bloc against Washington's "hegemonistic tendencies" has transformed the race into a popularity contest between President Bush and the Venezuelan leader, who called Bush a devil last month during a speech to the General Assembly.

"In many ways, we can take this vote as a plebiscite on the U.S. position and how it's perceived within the U.N.," said Don Kraus, the executive vice president of Citizens for Global Solutions, a nonpartisan organization that advocates more cooperation among countries.

U.N. member nations also will vote Monday on council seats for representatives from Africa, Europe and Asia, but most of the attention will be on the Guatemala-Venezuela contest.

"I have never recalled so many media headlines" on a council election, said Heraldo Munoz, the U.N. ambassador from Chile. "The awareness has almost come to a man-on-the-street level."

To find a more contentious race, he added, one has to go back to Cuba's bids during the Cold War. In 1979, Cuba and Colombia went through 154 rounds of voting over three months - each failing to get the votes required for victory - before Mexico finally was picked as a consensus alternative.

Cuba ran again the following year, and after 23 rounds of voting in which several contenders rotated in and out, Panama emerged as the winner. Cuba eventually won a term, for 1990 and 1991.

A Chavez defeat would be a blow for his ambitions to become a leading voice of the underdeveloped world, while a victory would be an embarrassment for the Bush administration, which accuses the left-wing leader of everything from undermining democracy in Venezuela and around Latin America to failing to cooperate in the fight against drug trafficking and terrorism.

"This is about whether or not a state is responsible or simply wishes to have a constant struggle with the United States every day on every issue, thereby making the Security Council unworkable," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told The Wall Street Journal last month.

Chavez retorts that he's defending himself from U.S. plans to topple him or invade his country and says Washington's policies are impoverishing people around the world. Each side denies the other's accusations.

Viewed as the world's premier multilateral conflict-resolving institution, the Security Council oversees 70,000 blue-helmeted peacekeepers worldwide and can slap sanctions on wayward nations.

DOJ_NMG_0080532

The Bush administration fears that Chavez will use a Security Council seat not only as a platform to berate Bush but also to play an obstructionist role as the council debates hot-button issues such as Iran and North Korea. U.S. officials have complained that Chavez is using his oil wealth to expand his influence around the globe - and is looking for General Assembly votes.

The council's five permanent members - the United States, China, Great Britain, Russia and France - mostly call the shots, thanks to their veto power. But passing a resolution still requires at least nine votes in the 15-member body.

The presidency of the council is rotated among members for a one-month period, meaning that Venezuela could chair the body at least once during its term, serving as its representative and influencing its agenda.

Plus, the Security Council operates about a dozen committees, usually chaired by nonpermanent members, that monitor everything from sanctions against Sudan to counterterrorism and nuclear-proliferation issues.

Venezuela's candidacy has divided Latin America along its political and regional fault lines.

Central America, ruled mostly by conservative, pro-U.S. governments, is backing Guatemala. South America, run mostly by moderate leftist governments more critical of Washington, has tended to side with Chavez.

But there are exceptions: Colombia, one of the world's top beneficiaries of U.S. military aid, backs Guatemala. Peru, where a Chavez-backed presidential candidate was defeated in recent elections, plans to abstain.

The Caribbean Community - potentially benefiting from oil subsidies offered by Venezuela and opposed to Guatemala over its long-standing border dispute with Belize - has indicated that its 14 votes in the U.N. General Assembly might go to Venezuela.

Guatemala beat Venezuela in a vote earlier this year for a seat on the U.N.'s Human Rights Council, but Chavez has since traveled the globe in search of support, including trips to a vote-rich summit of 116 nonaligned nations in Havana last month and a July summit of 53 African Union countries in Gambia.

Venezuelan officials say they've secured the votes of most African nations and the 22-member League of Arab Nations plus China and Russia, among others. U.S. officials expect Guatemala to win the votes of many European and Asian democracies.

Observers think that Venezuela will receive more votes than Guatemala on Monday but will fall short of the two-thirds threshold. Already, news reports in Latin America are suggesting that the Dominican Republic, Costa Rica, Uruguay or Panama may step forward as alternatives.

Guatemala has tried to shake off the notion that it's simply doing Washington's bidding. The country argues that it launched its election bid in 2002 - well ahead of Venezuela - and that despite being a founding member of the United Nations and a contributor to some of its peacekeeping missions, it's never sat on the council.

Venezuela has had four previous stints on the Security Council, all before Chavez was elected president in 1998.

India, EU Work Toward Trade Pact (WSJ)

By John W. Miller

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

HELSINKI -- The European Union and India stepped up free-trade negotiations that could one day link two of the world's biggest markets. Both sides said they hope to complete a deal by early 2009.

"India is a market the EU has to get closer to before it goes off with another partner," EU Trade Commissioner Peter Mandelson said yesterday in an interview here in the Finnish capital, as top political and business leaders from India and Europe began two days of meetings.

The push for a bilateral deal is a strong signal that countries are putting aside hopes of resuming talks toward a global trade deal that would slash tariffs among the World Trade Organization's 149 members. The so-called Doha round of WTO negotiations collapsed in July, primarily because of farm-subsidy disagreements among the U.S., Europe and developing nations.

Like other officials, Mr. Mandelson still expresses hope that a comprehensive global deal isn't dead. "But Doha first never meant Doha alone," he said.

In private, EU officials say their motivation to move ahead with bilateral talks stems partly from a belief that rising protectionist sentiment among U.S. lawmakers eager to protect farm subsidies will make Doha impossible to achieve until after the 2008 presidential election. In an official policy declaration last week, Mr. Mandelson said the EU would work hard to sign bilateral trade deals with Russia, India and several countries in Latin America, Asia and the Middle East.

"Europe has for too long overlooked opportunities in Asia," Mr. Mandelson said. "I am now trying to correct that imbalance." Today, the Indians and Europeans expect to set a date for formal bilateral-trade talks.

Despite optimism about an EU-India deal -- including a pledge by Indian Commerce and Industry Minister Kamal Nath to move toward no tariffs for EU goods -- negotiations promise to be long and complicated. Decades of socialist rule have left India with cumbersome regulations and steep tariffs that shut out foreign companies and goods, while its own businesses struggle to meet strict environmental, safety and social standards the EU requires before opening the door to its 450 million consumers.

"Most European businesses face so many technical barriers to their investments that they make a U-turn and go home," says Marco Felisati, the top trade official for Confindustria, Italy's business lobby. Consequently, despite the size of their economies, trade between the EU and India remains relatively small.

EU trade with India amounted to €40 billion, or about $50 billion, of goods and services last year, with exports to India accounting for less than 2% of the EU total. By comparison, trade between the 25-nation bloc and China totaled €261 billion last year. Of course, European companies have been outsourcing much of their information-technology and call-center work to India, while India exports some €2 billion of precious stones, mostly diamonds, to the EU every year.

The EU wants India to remove regulations that prevent foreign companies from setting up shop and to cut high tariffs on certain goods Europeans produce, especially wine and spirits, said Mr. Mandelson. Because of levies as high as 264%, EU producers sold only €4 million of wine to India in 2004.

European companies are increasingly frustrated at being shut out of selling goods and services to a country of one billion people whose gross domestic product rose 8.3% in 2005 and 8.1% in 2004. Rules currently prohibit large retailers such as Tesco PLC, Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and Carrefour SA from building in India.

The picture is even worse for services, says Pascal Kerneis, managing director of the European Services Forum, a Brussels-based lobbying group. For example, the pension market is still entirely closed to foreign companies, to the frustration of European giants such as Allianz AG, which does sell insurance in India but only through a local partner. "You can argue whether it's 200 million potential consumers or 300 million, but it's a market with a huge potential," says Heinz Dollberg, Allianz's executive vice president.

Indian companies and politicians complain that EU regulations unfairly benefit European companies. For example, Europe requires farmers to certify that pesticide levels in their crops aren't dangerous, and compliance costs €1,700 per Indian farmer, according to the Federation of Indian Chambers of Commerce and Industry -- a fortune in India. The EU is readying legislation requiring firms importing chemical-based products into the EU to prove they are safe. That would cost as much as €325,000 per chemical, according to the federation.

Georgia Halts Talks On Russia's WTO Bid (AP)

By Misha Dzhindzhikhashvili, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 13, 2006

Georgia has blocked the next round of talks on Russia's bid to join the World Trade Organization in retaliation for Moscow's blockade of its small southern neighbor, the government said Thursday.

The next meeting of the group working with Russia on its membership talks had been postponed indefinitely at Georgia's request, the Foreign Ministry said. The working group met in Geneva on Thursday and had been expected to set a date for the next round of consultations.

Russia's top WTO negotiator, Maxim Medvedkov, confirmed that that no date had been set for the next round of talks. The ITAR-Tass news agency quoted him as saying that this was because Russia needed time to resolve some issues with certain countries at a bilateral and multilateral level.

In a statement, the Georgian ministry said Russia had banned Georgian wine and mineral water from its market. "And after the recent imposition of new economic sanctions, the situation got even worse. This has practically led to an economic blockade of Georgia by Russia," it said.

Last week, Georgian National Bank President Roman Gotsiridze had said that Georgia, which is already a member of the powerful global trade body, could demand that Russia be barred from the organization unless it ended its sanctions against Tbilisi.

Russia had been expected to sign a membership agreement with the United States at the Group of Eight summit it hosted in St. Petersburg this year — one of the last countries it has yet to clinch an agreement with — but talks stumbled on the question of sanitary controls for U.S. meat imports. Russia is the largest economy outside the 149-nation WTO.

Furious at the arrest of four Russian officers accused of spying two weeks ago, Russia responded by slapping a sweeping transport and postal blockade on Georgia despite the alleged spies' release.

Relations in recent years have become increasingly hostile between Russia and Georgia, whose pro-Western President Mikhail Saakashvili has sought to join NATO and throw off historic Russian influence since coming to power in 2003.

Slain Reporter's Last Story Bares Chechen Torture (NYT)

By C. J. Chivers

DOJ_NMG_0080534

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 12 — The newspaper Novaya Gazeta on Thursday published the last article by its slain special correspondent, Anna Politkovskaya, along with transcripts of videotaped torture sessions of Chechens that she had obtained in her work.

The article, an unfinished column that presented new allegations of torture by security forces in Chechnya, appeared on the same day that the European Court of Human Rights issued a ruling holding Russia responsible for the killings of five Chechen civilians in early 2000 by Russian police officers.

The victims of that incident included a 1-year-old boy and his young mother, who was eight months pregnant. All of the victims were shot, and the mother's jewelry was stolen, the court said.

The article also appeared as the federal prosecutor's office in Grozny, the capital of Chechnya, said it was checking into reports of the disappearance of another prominent Chechen: the mother of the last wife of Shamil Basayev, the terrorist leader who died in an explosion in June. The woman, Rita Ersenoyeva, has been missing since Oct. 2, human rights workers say, and had spent the last several weeks searching for her daughter, who had been kidnapped as well after what her mother had described as a forced marriage to the terrorist leader.

Ms. Politkovskaya, one of Russia's best-known journalists and human rights advocates, was fatally shot on Saturday, apparently the victim of a contract killing. The events on Thursday together served as a sort of coda on her life, reminders of the lingering chaos and human costs of the war in Chechnya, which Russia insists has been won.

Ms. Politkovskaya, 48, was a leader among the shrinking group of Russian journalists who dared to keep challenging that thinking, by writing frankly about the violence and disorder in the republic. Chechnya, her work said, remains a place where open fighting has slowed but murky police and military operations continue, and chilling behavior by Russian forces and the Kremlin's proxies is a dark norm.

Her final article, a column under the headline "We Declare You a Terrorist," presented allegations of the use of torture to exact confessions and manufacture good news from the war.

"When prosecutors and the courts work, not for the sake of the law, but on political commission and with the only goal of providing good reports for the Kremlin, then criminal cases are baked like pancakes," she wrote. "An assembly line producing 'open-hearted confessions' effectively guarantees good data on the war on terror."

She asked: "Are we, the lawful, fighting against the unlawful? Or are we battling 'their' lawlessness with 'ours?' "

The article described the case of Beslan Gadayev, a Chechen migrant deported from Ukraine to Chechnya, where he claimed in a letter to Ms. Politkovskaya that he had been asked if he committed certain unsolved murders.

When he said he had not, he wrote, he was punched near an eye, beaten, tied up, handcuffed, hung from a pipe and then connected to electric cable, whose current was switched on. In time, he said, he confessed and the next day he was told to confess again in front of journalists and to say that his injuries were a result of an escape attempt.

The article was accompanied by images from videos that Ms. Politkovskaya had obtained of an armed Chechen, who her newspaper said was presumably a member of the Chechen armed forces, torturing at least one man.

Not long after the newspaper was published Thursday morning, the European Court of Human Rights released a unanimous decision blaming Russia for deaths of five members of the Estamirov family in Grozny in early 2000, a period when Russian forces had just wrested control of the capital from separatists.

It also found that Russia had failed to adequately investigate the killings, which were part of a sweep operation that Human Rights Watch, the American-based organization, investigated and called a massacre.

At least 60 civilians were killed, shot at close range, human rights workers said, apparently by enraged police units from St. Petersburg and Ryazan who were looting the neighborhood. Nobody has ever been charged for the crimes. The court on Thursday ordered Russia to pay about 230,000 euros, or about $290,000, in damages to the victims' relatives.

Ole Solvang, executive director of the Stitching Russian Justice Initiative, a private organization that has helped survivors of the Chechen war seek justice in the European Court, said the evidence showed that the deaths were deliberate. For example, he said, the slain 1-year-old boy, Khasan Estamirov, was shot multiple times at close range. At least one shot was to the head.

"They just went completely nuts that day," Mr. Solvang said. "It was horrible."

Russia, which earlier this year also was found responsible by the court for the summary execution of a young Ingush fighter at about the same time, made no comment on the case. It has three months to appeal.

Later in the day, Valery Kuznetsov, the top federal prosecutor in Chechnya, said by telephone that his office was looking into reports that Rita Ersenoyeva had been abducted.

Kidnappings, both to gain ransom and to kill suspected rebels and their supporters, have been a part of life in Chechnya for more than a decade. Human rights groups say Russian forces or Chechens loyal to the Kremlin premier are often responsible.

DOJ_NMG_0080535

Ms. Ersenoyeva disappeared on Oct. 2 after being summoned by telephone to an administration building in the village of Stariye Atagi, according to Tanya Lokshina, chairwoman of Center Demos, a human rights group. Neither Ms. Lokshina nor Mr. Kuznetsov said they had found witnesses to the abduction.

But Ms. Ersenoyeva has not been heard from since she left for the meeting, Ms. Lokshina said, adding that Ms. Ersenoyeva left eagerly after a caller told her that there was good news about her daughter, who in August had vanished as well after gunmen seized her from the street.

China's Oil Imports Surge Amid Relentless Demand (WSJ)

By Shai Oster And David Winning

The Wall Street Journal, October 13, 2006

BEIJING -- China, the world's second-biggest oil consumer, imported a record volume of crude last month, underscoring that petroleum demand here and in other developing economies, such as India and the Middle East, continues to rise despite lofty petroleum prices.

Despite Beijing's efforts to conserve energy and curb runaway economic growth, crude imports in September jumped to 13.46 million metric tons, or an average of about 3.3 million barrels a day -- 24% more than in September 2005 and 2.4% more than the previous record in January, according to China's General Administration of Customs.

Meanwhile, China's overall trade surplus eased to $15.3 billion last month, the customs agency said, snapping a string of four straight monthly records that culminated in an August surplus of $18.8 billion. The country's exports last month rose 30.6% from a year earlier to $91.64 billion, while imports rose 22% to $76.34 billion. For the first nine months of the year, China's trade surplus reached $109.85 billion, surpassing its $102 billion surplus for all of 2005.

Economists expect China's trade surplus to return to record levels as soon as this month. "I expect [the surplus] to bounce up to $19 billion in October," said Ben Simpfendorfer, an economist at Royal Bank of Scotland Group in Hong Kong. But he added he wouldn't be surprised if it hit $20 billion.

China's mounting trade surplus has been a sore point in relations with its major trading partners, and has added pressure on the country to allow the value of its currency to rise. Its strong exports also are driving the rapid economic growth which in turn has fueled its fast-growing thirst for both foreign and domestically produced oil.

Another factor in the growth of China's oil imports last month was a move by Chinese refiners to snap up crude now that prices have fallen about 25% from a peak of around $77 a barrel in July. The lower prices have given more breathing room to companies like PetroChina Co. and China Petroleum & Chemical Corp., or Sinopec, which have had their profits squeezed by a state-set ceiling on fuel prices.

Yesterday on the New York Mercantile Exchange, crude oil for November delivery settled at $57.86 a barrel, up 27 cents. Oil remains about twice the price it was three years ago but far below the inflation-adjusted high of $99.56 it reached in April 1980.

Analyst also attribute part of China's oil-import growth to the country's efforts to build emergency stockpiles of oil. Chinese officials have been reluctant to disclose how much oil they are putting into their strategic oil reserve, because they fear such information could contribute to an increase in world prices. Last week, Xu Dingming, vice director of the State Energy Office under the State Council, said China has begun filling an oil reserve at Zhenhai in the eastern province of Zhejiang.

The International Energy Agency, a Paris group that advises major industrialized nations on energy policy, forecast in a monthly report Wednesday that China's oil demand would rise 6.4% this year, to about seven million barrels of oil a day. While the figure was revised down a bit from earlier estimates, it still is more than double the pace of growth in 2005, which was 2.6%. The U.S., however, remains the world's largest oil consumer by far, with projected oil consumption this year of about 21 million barrels a day, little changed from last year.

In 2004, China's appetite for oil rose nearly 16%, startling global markets and helping fuel a huge rise in international oil prices. That year's demand surge was caused by widespread electrical-power shortages, which forced many factories to use diesel generators to keep operating. The electricity shortage has eased, but China's rising middle class has bought millions of new cars and homes -- further driving up fuel needs.

Oil traders watching the recent import rise are much less concerned with China's outlook than in the past, partly because there appears to be plenty of supply sloshing around.

China Drafts Law To Empower Unions And End Labor Abuse (NYT)

By David Barboza

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0080536

SHANGHAI, Oct. 12 — China is planning to adopt a new law that seeks to crack down on sweatshops and protect workers' rights by giving labor unions real power for the first time since it introduced market forces in the 1980's.

The move, which underscores the government's growing concern about the widening income gap and threats of social unrest, is setting off a battle with American and other foreign corporations that have lobbied against it by hinting that they may build fewer factories here.

The proposed rules are being considered after the Chinese Communist Party endorsed a new doctrine that will put greater emphasis on tackling the severe side effects of the country's remarkable growth.

Whether the foreign corporations will follow through on their warnings is unclear because of the many advantages of being in China — even with restrictions and higher costs that may stem from the new law. It could go into effect as early as next May.

It would apply to all companies in China, but its emphasis is on foreign-owned companies and the suppliers to those companies.

The conflict with the foreign corporations is significant partly because it comes at a time when labor, energy and land costs are rising in this country, all indications that doing business in China is likely to get much more expensive in the coming years.

But it is not clear how effectively such a new labor law would be carried out through this vast land because local officials have tended to ignore directives from the central government or seek ways around them.

China's economy has become one of the most robust in the world since the emphasis on free markets in the 80's encouraged millions of young workers to labor for low wages at companies that made cheap exports. As a result, foreign investment has poured into China.

Some of the world's big companies have expressed concern that the new rules would revive some aspects of socialism and borrow too heavily from labor laws in union-friendly countries like France and Germany.

The Chinese government proposal, for example, would make it more difficult to lay off workers, a condition that some companies contend would be so onerous that they might slow their investments in China.

"This is really two steps backward after three steps forward," said Kenneth Tung, Asia-Pacific director of legal affairs at the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company in Hong Kong and a legal adviser to the American Chamber of Commerce here.

The proposed law is being debated after Wal-Mart Stores, the world's biggest retailer, was forced to accept unions in its Chinese outlets.

State-controlled unions here have not wielded much power in the past, but after years of reports of worker abuse, the government seems determined to give its union new powers to negotiate worker contracts, safety protection and workplace ground rules.

Hoping to head off some of the rules, representatives of some American companies are waging an intense lobbying campaign to persuade the Chinese government to revise or abandon the proposed law.

The skirmish has pitted the American Chamber of Commerce — which represents corporations including Dell, Ford, General Electric, Microsoft and Nike — against labor activists and the All-China Federation of Trade Unions, the Communist Party's official union organization.

The workers' advocates say that the proposed labor rules — and more important, enforcement powers — are long overdue, and they accuse the American businesses of favoring a system that has led to widespread labor abuse.

On Friday, Global Labor Strategies, a group that supports labor rights policies, is expected to release a report in New York and Boston denouncing American corporations for opposing legislation that would give Chinese workers stronger rights.

"You have big corporations opposing basically modest reforms," said Tim Costello, an official of the group and a longtime labor union advocate. "This flies in the face of the idea that globalization and corporations will raise standards around the world."

China's Labor Ministry declined to comment Thursday, saying the law is still in the drafting stages. Several American corporations also declined to comment on the case, saying it was a delicate matter and referring calls to the American Chamber of Commerce.

But Andreas Lauffs, a Hong Kong-based lawyer who runs the China employment-law practice at the international law firm of Baker & McKenzie, said some American companies considered the proposed rules too costly and restrictive.

Mr. Lauffs said the new rules would give unions collective-bargaining power and control over certain factory rules, and they would also make it difficult to fire employees for poor performance.

"You could hire a sales manager, give him a quota and he doesn't sell anything, and you couldn't get rid of him," Mr. Lauffs said. "It's not easy to get rid of someone now, but under these rules it would be impossible."

It is not clear what the final law will look like, and only an updated draft is expected soon. But specialists say the trend suggests that there may be new challenges ahead for foreign companies doing business in this country.

Under China's "iron rice bowl" system of the 1950's and 60's, all workers were protected by the government or by state-owned companies, which often supplied housing and local health coverage.

DOJ_NMG_0080537

But by the 1980's, when the old Maoist model had given way to economic restructuring and the beginning of an emphasis on market forces, China began eliminating many of those protections — giving rise to mass layoffs, unemployment, huge gaps in income and pervasive labor abuse.

The worst off have been migrant workers, most of them exiles from the poorest provinces who travel far from home to live in cramped company dormitories while working long hours under poor conditions.

Migrant workers in virtually every city complain about abuses like having their pay withheld or being forced to work without a contract.

"I don't know about the labor law," said Zhang Yin, an 18-year-old migrant who washes dishes in Shanghai. "During the three months I've been here, my boss has delayed the salary payment twice. I want to quit."

Having grown increasingly concerned about the nation's widening income gap and fearing social unrest, officials in Beijing now seem determined to improve worker protection. In recent years, more and more factory workers have gone to court or taken to the streets to protest poor working conditions and overdue pay.

"The government is concerned because social turmoil can happen at any moment," says Liu Cheng, a professor of law at Shanghai Normal University and an adviser to the authorities on drafting the proposed law. "The government stresses social stability, so it needs to solve existing problems in the society."

In a surprisingly democratic move, China asked for public comment on the draft law last spring and received more than 190,000 responses, mostly from labor activists. The American Chamber of Commerce sent in a lengthy response with objections to the proposals. The European Chamber of Commerce also responded.

The law would impose heavy fines on companies that do not comply. And the state-controlled union — the only legal union in China — would gain greater power through new collective-bargaining rights or pursuing worker grievances and establishing work rules. One provision in the proposed law reads, "Labor unions or employee representatives have the right, following bargaining conducted on an equal basis, to execute with employers collective contracts on such matters as labor compensation, working hours, rest, leave, work safety and hygiene, insurance, benefits, etc."

If approved and strictly enforced, specialists say the new laws would strikingly alter the country's vast labor market and significantly push up the wages of everyday workers.

"If you really abide by the Chinese labor laws," said Anita Chan, an expert on labor issues in this country and a visiting fellow at the Australian National University, "migrant-worker wages would go up by 50 percent or more."

Until now, though, existing Chinese labor laws have gone largely unenforced, which has further complicated the debate here. Opponents of the proposed law argue that enforcing existing labor laws would be enough to solve the country's nagging problems. Advocates respond that adopting new laws would set the stage for stricter enforcement.

Even lawyers working for multinational corporations seem to agree that there is an epidemic of cheating.

Mr. Liu, the Shanghai lawyer who advised the government on the draft proposal, says many companies avoid existing laws by using employment agencies to hire workers. He says the new law will do more to protect workers from such abuse by holding companies accountable.

"The principle is not to raise the labor standard dramatically," he said, "but to raise the cost of violating the law. The current labor law is a paper tiger and is a disadvantage to those who obey it. If you don't obey the law, you won't be punished."

Official Union In China Says All Wal-Marts Are Organized (NYT)

By David Lague

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

BEIJING, Oct. 12 — Workers have set up unions at all 66 Wal-Mart outlets in China, beginning what a Chinese union official described Thursday as a wider campaign aimed at other foreign companies.

Wal-Mart has long battled to ban unions from its stores and distribution centers, and Guo Wencai, a senior organizer of the government-sanctioned All-China Federation of Trade Unions, called the establishment of union branches at the Wal-Mart stores a "breakthrough" for organized labor.

Mr. Guo said at a news conference here that the success at Wal-Mart would be a springboard to similar efforts aimed at Eastman Kodak, Dell and other companies.

"We are going to exert very high pressure on all these types of companies until unions are established there," Mr. Guo said. "It is an irreversible trend." He said union membership would lead to better conditions for employees, including higher wages and safer workplaces.

The effort to unionize workers at foreign companies is strictly limited to expanding the membership of the officially sanctioned labor federation, which says it has 150 million members.

But some labor market analysts and human rights groups say establishing branches of the official union in foreign companies is aimed more at allowing the Chinese authorities to tighten control over the rapidly expanding private-sector work force.

Under Chinese law, employees are barred from organizing independent unions, and workers or activists seeking to challenge these rules are routinely prosecuted and jailed, according to human rights groups.

Already, many foreign businesses have allowed their workers to form unions in China. In the economic and technological development area of Tianjin, southeast of Beijing, union branches have been established at more than 300 foreign companies including the food giant Nestlé, Mr. Guo said. In Beijing, there are unions at 44 foreign enterprises.

The labor federation, with strong backing from the Chinese government, has applied intense pressure on Wal-Mart as the first phase of the wider effort to establish branches in all foreign-financed enterprises.

There are now more than 100,000 such companies operating in China, including businesses from Taiwan and Macao, according to government statistics quoted in the official media.

It is unlikely, though, that the existence of branches of the official union will lead to increased worker militancy. Labor activists at times accuse the labor federation of siding with management rather than acting as a champion of workers' rights. At best, they say, the official union sometimes tries to mediate disputes.

Labor unrest is common these days in China, particularly among the 150 million migrant workers, and some specialists suggest that an improved network of official union branches could assist the authorities in defusing protests that could potentially pose a threat to Communist Party rule. The heightened unrest is one reason that the Chinese government has announced plans for greater worker protection, including a crackdown on sweatshops.

"They are afraid that public protests or strikes might get out of hand," said Robin Munro, research director of the China Labor Bulletin, a workers' rights group in Hong Kong. "Hence, the big drive to impose unions and provide greater union coverage; I think this is seen as a way of crisis management."

Other analysts suggest that the authorities also want to expand the reach of the official union because the decline of state-owned industries has stripped away much of the Communist Party's traditional power base in the Chinese economy.

Wal-Mart, in keeping with its efforts to ban labor organizing among its work force in the United States and elsewhere, resisted official efforts to unionize until late in July, when workers at one of its stores in Fujian Province set up a union branch. Within two months, branches were established in other stores as labor federation officials and local governments encouraged workers to organize and promised that they would be protected if the company tried to retaliate.

Mr. Guo, the organizer of the official union, said about 6,000 of Wal-Mart's 30,000 employees in China were now union members and efforts were under way to improve their welfare.

A spokeswoman for Wal-Mart's international division, Beth Keck, said she was unable to provide the exact number of union branches at company stores in China. "But our position is very clear," she said. "We have committed to having branches in all our stores."

Mr. Guo said the labor federation would now assist workers in their negotiations with Wal-Mart management for new contracts and would seek to improve conditions for part-time workers.

Something In Hong Kong's Air (NYT)

The New York Times, October 13, 2006

Anyone who has ever fallen under Hong Kong's exotic spell in recent years knows how taking a deep breath can make the magic disappear. The air throughout Hong Kong's tropical landscape has grown steadily more polluted — tainted by dark, unhealthy clouds from power plants, traffic and underregulated smokestacks from the Chinese mainland.

Hong Kong's average air pollution levels can be so high — double or even triple the World Health Organization limit — that some analysts estimate the air contributes to an extra 2,000 deaths a year. Leaders in Beijing and Hong Kong have repeatedly promised to cut down on environmental toxins in the air, land and water.

But with China's booming economy, such promises keep sliding down the real priority lists. What might change that attitude is how the outside business world views the quality of life for employees. As one businessman explained to The Wall Street Journal about his family's recent retreat to Australia: "You can drink bottled water. But with the air — you have to breathe it."

Such departures have finally begun to raise concerns in Hong Kong's business community. The local Chamber of Commerce issued an urgent request for the government to commit to "genuine reductions in air pollution" after it found that "an alarming 95 percent" of executives interviewed were worried or very worried about air quality and its effects on their health. But in a disheartening development this week, Hong Kong's chief executive, Donald Tsang, missed yet another opportunity to lay out a workable plan for clearing the air quickly.

This is not a hopeless situation, as leaders in Mexico City could attest. Once a place where residents courted asthma with every step outside, Mexico City approved what is generally regarded as one of the best and most comprehensive approaches to air pollution in 1990. The measures included everything from new fuel composition standards to new emission standards for vehicles. As a result, Mexico City halved some forms of air pollution in only five years. If Hong Kong even committed to cutting its pollution in half, that would be a good start.

AT&T seeks change in NSA case

MONTPELIER – The phone company AT&T has proposed moving to California a federal lawsuit that seeks to block Vermont from investigating whether phone companies improperly provided phone records to the National Security Administration.

If successful, the request filed in Washington D.C. before a group of federal judges called the Judicial Panel on Multidistrict Litigation would add Vermont's case to a growing list of related litigation being heard in San Francisco.

All of the cases involve lawsuits over access to records of domestic phone calls. They allege that phone companies provided records of calls to the federal government without going through established procedures.

Vermont is involved because phone customers, the American Civil Liberties Union of Vermont and the state's Public Service Department, which advocates for customers, have asked the Public Service Board to investigate whether two companies which operate in the state, AT&T and Verizon, made such records available or violated the state's consumer protection rules.

The U.S. Department of Justice sued the state to stop the inquiry, arguing that the investigation could threaten national security. Walt Sharp, a spokesman for AT&T, said the Vermont suit should be consolidated with at least 17 other cases in the federal court district of Northern California. The panel of judges hearing those lawsuits has recommended combining them, he said.

Gov. James Douglas, who pushed for the state to begin its investigation and is urging that it continue, said Thursday he would oppose the change of venue.

"I generally would like things dealt with in Vermont," he said.

There may be an important difference between the consolidated cases and Vermont's. The other cases are being brought by private phone customers against phone companies; the Vermont case involves a federal lawsuit that seeks to stop an investigation by state regulators.

Allen Gilbert of ACLU Vermont said the state's unusual regulatory system, and the involvement of state regulators, could make its situation singular.

"Our case may be unique because of the involvement of the state Department of Public Service," he said.

Sharp said that question "is up to the courts to determine."

The state is likely to make its next move after the panel of federal judges issues a preliminary ruling on AT&T's request, the first step in such cases.

"We don't want to give them opportunities to further circumvent Vermont's Consumer Bill of Rights," said Jason Gibbs, a Douglas spokesman. "The governor will seek to keep this proceeding in our area where it belongs."

U.S., CANADA AGREE TO AMEND, IMPLEMENT SOFTWOOD LUMBER DEAL

The U.S. and Canada late last week announced they would implement the softwood lumber agreement on Oct. 12, and signaled they would first amend the deal finalized on July 1 so it no longer requires all parties to end litigation in order for the deal to take effect.

Implementation of the deal had been held up in part by the refusal of some Canadian companies to end litigation surrounding the lumber dispute. But sources said the U.S. and Canada now plan to amend this provision, which requires counsel to all participants in the deal to sign agreements terminating litigation in the lumber fight.

Although the two governments at press time had not made the amendments public or shared them privately with industry, sources said they would also change the requirement that U.S. importers representing 95 percent of the duties collected on Canadian softwood lumber since 2002 agree to give up a portion of those deposits. Both of these requirements were seen as being difficult to meet in April, when the deal was tentatively reached.

The U.S. and Canada signaled their intention to amend the agreement in Oct. 6 joint motions in two different lumber cases at the Court OF International Trade. The nearly identical motions stated that the two governments on Oct. 6 had "tentatively agreed to amendments to the Agreement" that, "if implemented, would affect" the specific CIT cases.

The motion also said the two governments expected the agreement to be implemented on Oct. 12, at which time the U.S. and Canadian governments would agree to a dismissal of all claims raised by the government of Canada in a suit it filed against the U.S. at the Court of International Trade over continued U.S. antidumping and countervailing duties on imports of Canadian softwood lumber.

Canada had argued that an International Trade Commission finding under Section 129 of U.S. trade law, which is used to implement WTO decisions, should not have been used as a justification to keep U.S. antidumping duties in place after a North American Free Trade Agreement panel ruled that they should be terminated.

The Oct. 6 motion states that when the deal is implemented, the U.S. Department of Commerce will revoke the underlying antidumping and countervailing orders on Canadian softwood lumber. It also states that U.S. Customs and Border Protection, pursuant to the tentatively agreed amendments in the deal, will begin liquidating all entries of softwood lumber once the orders are revoked.

This move would allow all but $1 billion of the deposits collected by CBP on imports of softwood since 2002 to be returned to U.S. importers of record, which are generally affiliated with Canadian mills. According to the deal, the remaining $1 billion of the more than $5 billion collected would not be returned. Of that, $500 million would flow to members of the Coalition for Fair Lumber Imports, the U.S. lobby group that petitioned for the orders.

These actions would render moot most of the existing litigation in the lumber fight because Canadian companies, even those that do not want to drop litigation, could no longer claim they are suffering injury from the U.S. actions, since the orders would be revoked and the majority of deposits would have be returned, according to industry sources.

The Coalition for Fair Lumber Imports will drop its challenge of NAFTA's constitutionality filed in U.S. court if the deal is implemented and litigation is dropped, an industry source said.

However, it was not immediately clear what would happen with several complaints filed under Chapter 11 of NAFTA, as several sources said these challenges would not be made moot by the softwood deal. A U.S. industry source said the Coalition understood that all of the Chapter 11 claims would also be dropped.

A second industry source speculated that complaints from the U.S. industry and members of the U.S. Senate that Canadian firms were increasing their exports to the U.S. in anticipation of the deal might have had an impact on the decision by the two governments to amend the deal and move to implementation. Once the deal is implemented, Canadian exporters will face a 15 percent export tax, or will face a smaller tax but will see their imports restricted by a quota. Presently, they only face duties of about 11 percent, and they will get almost all of these duties back under the terms of the deal.

Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-ME) and nine other U.S. senators in an Oct. 6 letter to U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab called for the deal and export tax to be implemented retroactively to Oct. 1, when the deal was initially to have been implemented. This followed a similar letter from Senate Finance Committee Ranking Member Max Baucus (D-MT) (Inside U.S. Trade, Oct. 6, p. 1).

Sources said this week that the two sides will also have to amend the requirement that U.S. importers responsible for 95 percent of the deposits collected sign letters allowing a portion of their deposits to not be returned, as not enough importers are voluntarily signing up to do this.

The Canadian government had tried to get more importers to sign the letters by announcing that a 19 percent tax would be imposed only on Canadian lumber companies that do not have their importers sign letters of support for the deal. The tax is meant to fill the gap that would be created if some importers do not agree to allow a portion of their deposits to be used to funnel $500 million to members of the Coalition for Fair Lumber Imports, $450 million to a fund for meritorious initiatives in the U.S., and $50 million for the marketing of North American lumber. Canadian taxpayers would otherwise have to make up this difference, sources said.

The Oct. 6 motion notes that some deposits may not be liquidated until a CIT injunction preventing liquidation of some of the duties is changed, as requested by the U.S. government. The CIT injunction prevents about $900 million in deposits from being collected because of a dispute surrounding deposits kept on imports of lumber from West Fraser Mills Ltd.

The court has scheduled a status conference to discuss the West Fraser dispute on Oct. 19, and the Oct. 6 joint motion from Canada and the U.S. said liquidation of affected entries would remain suspended until the injunction is modified.

Documents Reveal Scope of U.S. Database on Antiwar Protests

By ERIC LICHTBLAU

WASHINGTON, Oct. 12 — Internal military documents released Thursday provided new details about the Defense Department's collection of information on demonstrations nationwide last year by students, Quakers and others opposed to the Iraq war.

The documents, obtained by the American Civil Liberties Union under a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit, show, for instance, that military officials labeled as "potential terrorist activity" events like a "Stop the War Now" rally in Akron, Ohio, in March 2005.

The Defense Department acknowledged last year that its analysts had maintained records on war protests in an internal database past the 90 days its guidelines allowed, and even after it was determined there was no threat.

A department spokesman said Thursday that the "questionable data collection" had led to a tightening of military procedures to ensure that only information relevant to terrorism and other threats was collected. The spokesman, Maj. Patrick Ryder, said in response to the release of the documents that the department "views with great concern any potential violation" of the policy.

“There is nothing more important or integral to the effectiveness of the U.S. military than the trust and good will of the American people,” Major Ryder said.

A document first disclosed last December by NBC News showed that the military had maintained a database, known as Talon, containing information about more than 1,500 “suspicious incidents” around the country in 2004 and 2005. Dozens of alerts on antiwar meetings and peaceful protests appear to have remained in the database even after analysts had decided that they posed no threat to military bases or personnel.

Some documents obtained by the A.C.L.U. referred to the potential for disruption to military recruiting and the threat posed to military personnel as a result.

An internal report produced in May 2005, for instance, discussed antiwar protests at the University of California, Santa Cruz, and was issued “to clarify why the Students for Peace and Justice represent a potential threat to D.O.D. personnel.”

The memorandum noted that several hundred students had recently protested the presence of military recruiters at a career fair and demanded that they leave.

“The clear purpose of these civil disobedience actions was to disrupt the recruiting mission of the U.S. Army Recruiting Command by blocking the entrance to the recruiting station and causing the stations to shut down early,” it said.

But the document also noted that “to date, no reported incidents have occurred at these protests.”

The documents indicated that intelligence reports and tips about antiwar protests, including mundane details like the schedule for weekly planning meetings, were widely shared among analysts from the military, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Department of Homeland Security.

“There is simply no reason why the United States military should be monitoring the peaceful activities of American citizens who oppose U.S. war policies,” said Ben Wizner, a lawyer for the A.C.L.U.

Joyce Miller, an official with the American Friends Service Committee, a Quaker group that learned that information on some of its antiwar protests was in the military database, said she found the operation to be a “chilling” and troubling trend.

Dania man ordered to pay $1.8 million in fraud case

A Dania Beach man was sentenced Wednesday to three years of supervised release and ordered to pay more than $1.8 million in restitution for his role in a fraud scheme, the U.S. Attorney's Office said. Jason Kowal was part of a group that promised 800 investors who chipped in a total of $15 million that if they bought ATMs through a company, they could earn their investment back in 12 months or less.

The ATMs were different in that rather than withdrawing cash, customers would receive a receipt that they would then redeem at the business where the ATM was located. Kowal fraudulently posed as an investor to lure other investors to the business, telling them he had profited from the ATMs, according to authorities. In actuality, Kowal never owned one, prosecutors said.

Mountie who fingered Arar gets promoted

Glen McGregor

OTTAWA -- An RCMP investigator who told U.S. authorities that Maher Arar was suspected of al-Qaida links has been promoted and continues to perform sensitive police work for the force.

Cpl. Michel Lang wrote to the U.S. Customs Service in 2001 and described Arar and his wife as members of a group of "Islamic extremists" with suspected connections to al-Qaida, according to findings of Justice Dennis O'Connor's inquiry into the case.

Arar was later detained in the United States and deported to Syria, where he was tortured and jailed for nearly a year.

O'Connor found that information passed on by the RCMP to U.S. agencies -- though not necessarily that provided by Lang -- likely contributed to their decision to detain the Ottawa computer programmer and send him to Syria.

Despite the public fallout from the case, few of the RCMP members involved in the investigation of Arar appear to have suffered any career setbacks. Two officers in the chain of command during the Arar investigation have been decorated with awards of merit. And Lang, despite sending contentious information, has been bumped up to his current rank of corporal, from constable.

An RCMP spokeswoman said Lang is currently working in undercover operations.

"Due to the nature of his work, we cannot specify which area he is presently assigned to," Sgt. Sylvie Tremblay said.

She said Lang was not available to comment.

Any questions about the Arar case would be addressed by RCMP Commissioner Giuliano Zaccardelli when he testifies before a parliamentary committee, she said.

Before Arar was deported, Lang was a member of the RCMP's Project A-O Canada, an anti-terrorism taskforce formed after the 9/11 attacks. He had come from the Mounties' customs and excise unit and was listed in the O'Connor report as one of several of "key investigators" working on the taskforce.

In October 2001, Lang asked Canada Customs to place a "lookout" on Arar, his wife, Monia Mazigh and several other people. That required Customs agents to conduct further searches on Arar, his wife, and their luggage and car when they entered the country. In a supporting letter, Lang wrote: "We are presently investigating in Ottawa, a group of Islamic-extremist individuals suspected of being linked to the al-Qaida terrorist movement. The following individuals and or vehicles have been identified."

Lang then repeated the same request with the U.S. Customs Service. The request again described Arar, his wife and others as members of a group of Islamic extremists with suspected al-Qaida links, according to the inquiry report.

O'Connor said he was satisfied there was reasonable ground for the Mounties to put a lookout on Arar, both in the U.S. and in Canada, as he was a person of interest in an investigation of another Ottawa man, Abdullah Almalki. However, he said the language used was "inaccurate, without any basis, and potentially extremely inflammatory in the United States in the fall of 2001."

He also said there was no reason to also apply the lookout to Mazigh.

But without the U.S. taking part in his inquiry, O'Connor said he could not determine whether the lookout request played any role in the decision to detain Arar in New York in Sept. 2002.

During in-camera testimony, two of Lang's superior officers agreed that "Islamic extremist" was an improper characterization of Arar and his wife. In his testimony in 2004, Lang said he had no information to justify the description, O'Connor wrote.

Zaccardelli has said that errors made by his force in the Arar case were not the result of any malice and do not require disciplinary measures.

Lang is not the only Arar investigator to receive a promotion. Insp. Richard Roy, a liaison officer, was promoted to superintendent. Rick Flewelling was later promoted to sergeant.

Hearing to Be Held in Suit Over Newspaper Anthrax Columns

ALEXANDRIA, Va. (AP) - A hearing is scheduled Friday in a defamation lawsuit against The New York Times over columns that linked a former Army scientist to the 2001 anthrax killings.

The hearing in Alexandria is expected to discuss the newspaper's confidential sources used in columns about bioterrorism expert Steven Hatfill. He was labeled a "person of interest" by then-Attorney General John Ashcroft. He was never charged and has since filed several lawsuits.

A federal judge threw out Hatfill's lawsuit against The New York Times over 2002 columns by writer Nicholas Kristof that accused the FBI of failing to thoroughly investigate Hatfill.

In March, the U.S. Supreme Court refused to block the suit after it was reinstated by the 4th US Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond.

Authorities have never solved the mysterious mailing of anthrax-laced letters that killed five people not long after the September 11th terror attacks.

Colorado man arrested for anti-war comments to Cheney files lawsuit

By: Sunil Freeman

On Oct. 4, Steven Howards, an environmental consultant, filed a federal lawsuit against the U.S.

government alleging civil rights violations. The suit grew out of an encounter with Vice President Dick Cheney that occurred on June 16.

The incident shows the Bush administration's unwillingness to tolerate any dissent to its genocidal policies in Iraq.

The U.S. imperialists' war has become so unpopular that the government—feeling defensive and vulnerable—is reacting repressively to benign expressions of individual dissent.

Howards was walking through an outdoor public mall in Beaver Creek, Colo., on that date with his children, who were going to a camp for piano lessons. Much to his surprise, he saw Vice President Dick Cheney, who was shaking hands with people in the mall.

Howards had a moment of hesitation, but then he approached Cheney, who had several Secret Service agents nearby, and calmly told him: "Your policies in Iraq are reprehensible." This was soon after the media had reported the 2,500th U.S. troop death in the war in Iraq.

Howards and his children then continued on their way. About 10 minutes later he returned through the same public mall with his 8-year-old son.

A Secret Service agent approached him and asked, "Did you assault the vice president?" Howards replied that he had not assaulted Cheney but had criticized him, further commenting that if freedom of speech was illegal the agent should arrest him.

At that point the agent, Virgil D. Reichle, Jr., gave him a lesson in just how far civil liberties have eroded in this country. Reichle grabbed Howards and cuffed his hands behind his back in front of his son and onlookers. When Howards said he couldn't leave his son alone the agent retorted that "Social Services" would be contacted to take the son. The traumatized child saw his mother as his father was being carted away and ran to her to evade government custody.

According to Howards, Reichle said he would be charged with assaulting the vice president. Howards was formally charged with "harassment," a misdemeanor that carries up to a one-year jail sentence. He was held in jail for three hours and released after posting a $500 bond. The charges were eventually dropped. Howards is now suing the arresting agent.

The incident in Beaver Creek is not an aberration. There are two other similar suits pending against Secret Service agents or White House staff members.

On July 4, 2004, Jeff and Nicole Rank were arrested at a George Bush appearance in Charleston, W.Va. They had proper tickets to attend the event, but they were wearing anti-Bush t-shirts. And in March 2005, two people who had an anti-war bumper sticker on their car were ejected from a taxpayer-financed Bush appearance in Denver, Colo.

Howards' lawyer, David A. Lane, has said that although the suit only names agent Reichle, Cheney could be called as a witness. He also said that additional defendants could be named if it becomes evident that agent Reichle was acting on orders from superiors.

U.S. Judge Likely to Allow Discovery in Plan B Suit

NEW YORK - A federal judge said on Wednesday he was inclined to let evidence gathering continue in a lawsuit over the morning-after contraceptive pill, but stopped short of ruling whether the plaintiffs can subpoena documents and testimony from the White House.

A lawsuit filed by the The Center for Reproductive Rights on behalf of plaintiffs alleges the U.S. Food and Drug Administration has repeatedly broken its own regulations in denying women of all ages increased access to the Plan B contraceptive.

The rights group also claims that testimony from depositions it has taken so far show agency officials planned to drag out the approval process for the contraceptive for political reasons.

Evidence gathering in the case has stalled as Magistrate Judge Viktor Pohorelsky mulls whether the plaintiffs can subpoena White House documents and testimony from former White House policy aide Jay Lefkowitz and deputy FDA director Dr. Sandra Kweder.

"I'm inclined the to permit discovery be completed," Magistrate Judge Viktor Pohorelsky said in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn. "How much, I don't know."

The Center for Reproductive Rights filed its first complaint in January 2005 over the FDA's failure for make Plan B available without a prescription for women of all ages.

But in August, officials from the agency ruled the Plan B contraceptive could be sold to adults without a prescription, which some saw as ending the three-year fight over wider access and use by teenagers.

Franklin Amanat, who represents the FDA in the case, said they plan to file a motion to have the case dismissed in light of the agency's decision to allow the "vast majority who would purchase the drug" over-the-counter access to it.

But the rights group argued their claim is still valid because the agency's entire decision making process on Plan B was marred by politics, a sentiment with which another judge appeared to agree.

In another hearing on the case held earlier in the day before Chief Judge Edward Korman in Brooklyn, the judge repeated a sentiment he expressed earlier, saying the entire case "reeks with bad faith" on the part of the FDA.

Barr Pharmaceuticals Inc. applied for over-the- counter status for Plan B om 2003.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Attorney Stewart Faces Sentencing In Terror Case. The New York Times (10/16, Preston) reports, "Lynne F. Stewart, the firebrand lawyer known for defending unsavory criminals, now faces the possibility of living out her life like many of them, in maximum-security lockdown in a federal prison. … Today, 20 months after she was convicted on terror charges, Ms. Stewart and two co-defendants who were convicted of conspiring with her will be sentenced in Federal District Court in Manhattan. Prosecutors, arguing that Ms. Stewart repeatedly flouted the law to aid the violent designs of an imprisoned terrorist client, have asked Judge John G. Koeltl to condemn her to 30 years in prison. … That would be a life sentence for Ms. Stewart, who turned 67 last week. Long an abrasive advocate of anti-government causes, these days she is not defiant. She is mournful about what she said were her failures as a lawyer." The Times adds, "Her dread of prison deepened unexpectedly, Ms. Stewart said, during the long period after a jury found her guilty on Feb. 10, 2005, of providing material aid to terrorism. She has recently recovered from breast cancer, but fears it will return in prison. … And if the judge comes down hard, she could be held in solitary confinement with limited visits, the same conditions as Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman, the terrorist she was convicted of aiding."

The New York Sun (10/16, Goldstein) reports that Stewart "and her allies are pinning their hopes for leniency on a strategy that argues she became so emotionally involved in the sheik's case that she acted irrationally — a strategy that is underpinned by a sealed letter to the court from a psychiatrist." The Sun continues, "A psychiatric report submitted to the federal judge in Manhattan who will decide the sentence, John Koeltl, claims that several emotional events in Stewart's life suggest her actions were motivated by 'human factors of her client and his situation' and not by politics, according to portions of the psychiatric report. … The psychiatrist, Steven Teich, points to 11 emotional events that he claims prompted her to want to take action on Abdel Rahman's behalf, Stewart's attorneys say. Among the events that make Dr.Teich's list are her experiences seeing Abdel Rahman incarcerated and the 1995 suicide of a drug defendant named Dominick Maldonado, whom Stewart had once represented. … While the evaluation by Dr. Teich is filed under seal, Stewart's attorneys quote portions of it at length in public legal papers."

Specter's Role In Crafting Detainee Bill Agreement Disputed. The Washington Post (10/16, A19, Smith, 748K) reports, "The last-minute maneuvering before the Sept. 28 vote [on the detainee bill] remains a hot topic of debate among lobbyists, lawmakers and staff members. They are wondering if [GOP Sen. Arlen] Specter, as several Judiciary Committee staff members privately asserted at the time, was pressured into discarding a less extreme and more politically palatable amendment at the Bush administration's request, in favor of an alternative more likely to be defeated. Specter says that he was not ... Questions about Specter's role in the last-minute maneuvering arose in part because he had taken a maverick position before -- and then backed President Bush's policy on the floor or in his votes."

WPost Weighs In On Treason Charges Against Gadahn. The Washington Post (10/16, A20, 748K) editorializes on the treason charges against Adam Gadahn. The "first such charge in decades marks a significant change of course. Instead of causing him to disappear into military custody, as it did with Mr. Hamdi, the government is following a road explicitly laid out in the Constitution. Broadly speaking, this is a constructive development. Unlike the murky terrain governing the holding of American citizens as enemy combatants, treason is defined in the Constitution. So there's no doubt as to the government's authority to pursue its case or the propriety of doing so. … Yet treason charges could come to pose civil liberties concerns of their own. The Constitution cannot, by definition, be unconstitutional -- yet its definition of treason is so broad and vague that, were it merely written in statute, it would probably be so."

FBI Believes High-Level Al Qaeda Suspect Could Be In UK. The (UK) Sun (10/16) reports, "An al-Qaeda general believed to be plotting dirty bomb attacks on seven US cities could be in Britain, FBI sources said yesterday. Adnan El Shukrijumah, who has a £2.5million bounty on his head, is suspected of planning a spectacular attack using bombs that spread radioactive waste. The FBI are investigating the 31-year-old Saudi-born scientist's UK links," and "a US source said: 'He has travelled extensively in the last seven years, and we believe this includes the UK.'"

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Coast Guard's Great Lakes Antiterrorism Plan Sparks Controversy. The New York Times (10/16, Davey, 1.21M) reports, "Even in autumn, the cold, silent expanse of Lake Michigan defines this town, where pleasure boats glide into harbor, fishermen wait patiently for salmon and tourists peer up at the lighthouse." But "the United States Coast Guard has a new mission for the waters off of these quiet shores. For the first time, Coast Guard officials want to mount machine guns routinely on their cutters and small boats here and around all five of the Great Lakes as part of a program addressing the threats of terrorism after Sept. 11." Also, "for the first time in memory, Coast Guard members plan to use a stretch of water at least five miles off this Michigan shore -- and 33 other offshore spots near cities like Cleveland; Rochester; Milwaukee; Duluth, Minn.; and Gary, Ind. -- as permanent, live fire shooting zones for training on their new 7.62 mm weapons, which can blast as many as 650 rounds a minute and send fire more than 4,000 yards." The Times adds, "The notion is so unusual that it prompted United States diplomats to negotiate with Canadian authorities in order to agree that it would not violate a 189-year-old treaty, signed after the War of 1812, limiting arms on the Great Lakes."

Long-Serving DHS Official Leaving Agency At "Critical Time." In its web-only "Washington Wire" column, the Wall Street Journal (10/15, Block, 2.03M) reported Ambassador Cresencio 'Cris' Arcos, who had been among "the last remaining senior-level political officials left from Tom Ridge's" time at DHS, "has stepped down." Arcos's "departure comes at a critical time for DHS which is coming under growing criticism for plans to build 700 miles of fencing along the US/Mexico border as a way to crack down on illegal immigration." He "is going into semiretirement and will work part time as a consultant."

WAR NEWS:

Baker Commission To Recommend "Significant Changes" To US Iraq Strategy. The Los Angeles Times (10/16, McManus, 918K) reports the Baker Commission "backed by President Bush that is exploring U.S. options in Iraq intends to propose significant changes in the administration's strategy by early next year. ... Two options under consideration would represent reversals of U.S. policy: withdrawing American troops in phases, and bringing neighboring Iran and Syria into a joint effort to stop the fighting." One participant said the 10-member commission has agreed "it's not going to be 'stay the course.' ... The bottom line is, [current U.S. policy] isn't working. ... There's got to be another way." The Times says if the panel "recommends overhauling Bush's approach to Iraq, it could give a boost not only to critics of current policy but also to officials in the administration who have argued for broad changes."

Hagel Seconds Warner's Iraq Assessment. NBC Nightly News (10/15, story 4, 0:20, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "Today a powerful Republican senator is joining the Republican chairman of the Senate Armed Service Committee in calling for a new strategy in Iraq. Sen. Chuck Hagel said he agrees with Sen. John Warner's assessment that Iraq appears to be 'drifting sideways.' Warner advocates a change of course if the Iraqi government fails to restore order in the next few months." Hagel, on CNN's Late Edition (10/15), said, "We are going to have to find a new strategy. ... The future of Iraq is going to be determined by the Iraqi people. It will not be determined here in Washington. ... The American people are not going to continue to support, sustain a policy that puts American troops in the middle of a civil war." The AP (10/15, Pickler) says Hagel and Warner "are part of the growing list of Republicans who are speaking out against President Bush's current plan for Iraq as U.S. casualties rise."

Ford Questions Administration "Sanity" On Iraq. Bloomberg (10/15, Elsibai) reports Rep. Harold Ford, "engaged in a close battle for an open Senate seat in Tennessee, questioned the 'sanity' of the Bush administration's policy on Iraq." On ABC's "This Week," he said, "After hearing Vice President Cheney and others over the last few weeks indicate that they would have gone forward with the war in Iraq even knowing what they know now, it raises serious questions about not only judgment but sanity."

Levin Says Phased Redeployment Of US Troops Should Begin In Next Few Months. Sen. Carl Levin said on CNN's Late Edition (10/15) that "either the insurgency or the sectarian violence requires a political solution, and that we've got to put pressure on the Iraqis to take over their own country. If they're going to have a civil war, they're going to have to do it without us, and what the leaders, our uniformed leaders in Iraq, really tell us is that we've got to find a way to put some pressure on the Iraqis to make these tough decisions. ... We've got to focus Iraqi leadership attention on this by telling them we need to begin a phased redeployment of American troops from Iraq within the next few months."

Five Americans Killed In Iraq, Bringing This Month's Toll To 53. The New York Times (10/16, Semple, 1.21M) reports, "Two marines were killed by insurgents in Anbar Province on Sunday, the American military command said, and three American soldiers died a day earlier in a bombing in southern Baghdad, bringing the total of American troop deaths in Iraq this month to at least 53, an extraordinarily high midmonth tally." At the current rate, "October is on track to be the third-deadliest month of the entire conflict for the military, according to Iraq Coalition Casualty Count, an independent Web site that tracks war-related casualties. The two most deadly months coincided with major American offensives against entrenched guerrilla fighters." The number of wounded troops, "a figure that usually parallels the number of fatalities, has also increased drastically. From Sept. 28 to Oct. 11, 427 American troops were wounded, one of the worst two-week stretches of the war, according to Iraq Coalition Casualty Count."

Iraq Violence Continues With Four Car Bombings In Kirkuk. ABC World News (10/15, story 3, 2:15, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "One year ago tonight in Iraq, they were celebrating a national election, ratifying a new constitution that seemed to offer a way out of war. But on this anniversary, there is no celebrating. Instead, today, the Prime Minister cancelled a scheduled national reconciliation conference amid another spasm of religious violence." The AP (10/15, Bodeen) reports the national reconciliation conference was "indefinitely postponed" as a" two-day spree of sectarian revenge killings and insurgent bombings left at least 86 Iraqis dead."

NBC Nightly News (10/15, story 3, 2:25, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) said October "has been an especially bloody month. Fifty-three Americans have been killed and there's been an upsurge in sectarian violence. Today four car bombs exploded in quick succession in the northern city of Kirkuk." NBC (Arraf) added, "This was some of the worst violence in weeks, just one of the suicide bombs that ripped through Kirkuk's streets. ... In cities like Kirkuk and Baquba in the Sunni Triangle, US forces thought it was calm enough earlier this year to hand control over to the Iraqi army. But that was before a wave of violence sparked by an attack on one of the holiest Shiite shrines. ... The Kirkuk violence and other attacks in capped a weekend in which more than 80 people were killed, including a US Marine and four soldiers. No one immediately claimed responsibility for any of the violence but al Qaeda has said it would increase attacks on foreigners during the holy month of Ramadan."

The Los Angeles Times (10/16, Daragahi, 918K) says in its lead that "months of bloodshed have threatened the loosen the bonds holding together Iraq's fractious government, with tensions between political blocs spilling out in recent days in fiery sectarian rhetoric as well as fighting that left at least 130 people dead nationwide." The Times says October is "on pace to be the deadliest for U.S. troops in the country since January 2005."

Maliki Says Forced Disarmament Of Militias Not Imminent. USA Today (10/16, Jervis, 2.27M) reports Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki told USA Today his government "will not force militias to disarm until later this year or early next year, despite escalating violence in Baghdad fueled by death squads and religious warfare." His remarks "point to a growing gap between the U.S. and Iraqi governments over how to handle growing sectarian violence."

Militants Declare New State In Sunni Part Of Iraq. The Washington Times/AP (10/16, Bodeen) reports, "A militant network that includes al Qaeda in Iraq declared in a video yesterday that it had established an Islamic state in six provinces where Sunni Muslims are dominant." The announcement by the Mujahedeen Shura Council "appeared mainly symbolic, since no Iraqi insurgent group has the strength or authority to act as a rival government and none controls territory. It underscored, however, the weakness of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government and its inability to bring Iraq's deeply divided politicians together."

The Financial Times (10/16, Negus) reports a video posted on the Internet in the name of the Mutayibeen Coalition, "one of Iraq's largest insurgent groups," called for the "creation of a separate Sunni Islamic state in the country. If authentic, it could indicate a shift in strategy for parts of the Sunni Arab insurgency."

US Helps Rebuild Iraqi Air Force. The Washington Times (10/16, Axe, 88K) reports, "A team of U.S. Air Force personnel at this sprawling British base in southern Iraq is working to rebuild an air force that the U.S. military spent more than a decade destroying. Former test pilot Lt. Col. Kelly Latimer and her team of five pilots and maintainers are partnered with 70 Squadron of the reborn Iraqi air force." The Times notes that, after devoting flights exclusively to training the Iraqis, "the unit can [now] dedicate more efforts to patrolling vital oil and power facilities and supporting the Basra-based Iraqi army's 10th Division and the tiny Iraqi navy based at nearby Umm Qasr."

Pace Says Terrorists Have "100 Year Plan" For Fighting US. Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace spoke with reporters at a Christian Science Monitor (10/16, Cook, 58K) lunch Thursday, and offered "a passionate argument for the US military's mission in Iraq, stressed the nation's capacity to handle a threat from North Korea, and defended his performance as America's top military officer." His "polished performance was in contrast to the controversy surrounding remarks by Britain's army chief, Gen. Richard Dannatt, who said Thursday that British troops should be withdrawn from Iraq 'soon.'" Pace "said the enemy has 'a 100 year plan according to the map they published about a year and half ago. So anybody looking for a quick win in the war on terrorism probably hasn't read the enemy's published intent.'"

Soldier's Refusal To Deploy Roils Japanese American Community. The Los Angeles Times (10/16, Watanabe, 918K) reports on Japanese American reaction to the case of Ehren Watada, "an Army first lieutenant who earlier this year became the first commissioned officer to refuse deployment to Iraq, calling the war illegal and immoral." Watada's case "has stirred national debate over the legality of the Iraq war and a soldier's duty versus conscience. But in the Japanese American community, the case has struck a particular nerve, echoing conflicts of another war six decades ago." The case resonates within the community because "debate lingers over how Japanese Americans responded after Japan's attack on Pearl Harbor in 1941." Various Japanese Americans expressing their opinions are quoted.

Fallen Eskimo Guardsman Is Buried In Alaska. The New York Times (10/16, Leduff, 1.21M) reports on the late Staff Sgt. Billy Brown, who "is believed to be the first Eskimo killed because of this war. He was 54. Sergeant Brown, an Alaska national guardsman, never got to a battlefield. He was killed when a tractor-trailer slammed into the back of his Humvee late in July while he was on training maneuvers at Camp Shelby in Mississippi." The Times states, "For this war, 670 Guard members have been called up from rural Alaska, its largest foreign deployment ever. The Alaska Guard estimates that one-third of its members are Eskimo, so most likely a third of those deployed are indigenous men." The Times describes the impact on and incipient doubts about the war in Brown's hometown of Barrow, Alaska.

Dannatt's Remarks Spur National Debate In Britain. The Christian Science Monitor (10/16, Rice-Oxley, LaFranchi, 58K) reports, "A vigorous debate about how quickly Britain can pull out of Iraq has erupted following an unprecedented intervention from the head of the British armed forces." General Dannatt reportedly fears "that the formidable demands on the British army in both Iraq and Afghanistan are stretching the force to its limits." Experts "say the general, appointed only in August, was voicing the fears and frustrations of soldiers and officers alike who face an increasingly fraught mission with no end in sight"; "blogs and Internet postings have found British soldiers overwhelmingly applauded their commander. One on-line poll found 76 percent thought he had been 'absolutely right' to speak out."

British Scholar Sees UK Civil-Military Crisis. In a commentary for the Washington Times (10/16, 88K), military scholar Paul Moorcraft writes of Gen. Richard Dannatt's statement, "The United Kingdom is facing its biggest crisis in civil-military relations since the Second World War. ... The British Army is running out of soldiers, equipment and patience, though not fighting spirit. The British military establishment fears it is reinforcing failure in Iraq." Moorcraft argues, "Tony Blair is a lame-duck prime minister. He may be too weak to sack his forthright general. A behind-the-scenes forced resignation, especially if it were seen to be a result of US pressure, would trigger more unrest in the armed forces, perhaps even a joint demarche by other commanders. ... But

Gen. Dannatt's frankness may be dangerous. Civilian control of the military is a cornerstone of Western democracy. ... [Dannatt] is risking the top job for the army he loves."

Prominent Journalists' Recent Books Critiquing Iraq War Reviewed. In the Washington Post (10/16, C1, 748K), Howard Kurtz examines the recent "series of books about the Iraq war" that "has exposed deep flaws in its planning and execution, made the Bush administration appear dysfunctional at times and generated enormous news coverage. All are by journalists with access to daily or weekly outlets. The bestsellers include 'Fiasco' by The Washington Post's Thomas Ricks; 'Cobra II' by Michael Gordon of the New York Times and former Timesman Bernard Trainor; 'Hubris' by Newsweek's Michael Isikoff and the Nation's David Corn; and now 'State of Denial' by The Post's Bob Woodward. Even President Bush observed last week that 'somebody ought to add up the number of pages that have been written about my administration.'"

Canadian Death Toll In Afghanistan Now 42. The New York Times (10/16, Gall, 1.21M) reports, "Two Canadian soldiers in the NATO force were killed and three were wounded in an ambush in southern Afghanistan on Saturday afternoon, and an Afghan provincial council member was assassinated Sunday on his way to work, officials said. ... The Canadians were killed when their convoy came under fire by rocket-propelled grenades and gunfire in Kandahar Province, forcing their unit to call in airstrikes, according to a NATO news release. Forty-two Canadian soldiers have been killed in Afghanistan this year."

Italian Reporter, Assistant Kidnapped In Afghanistan. The Wall Street Journal/AP (10/16) reports, "An Italian freelance photographer and his assistant were abducted in southern Afghanistan, an official said Sunday. Gabriele Torsello and his Afghan translator were abducted by armed men on Saturday as they were driving from Lashkar Gah, the capital of the southern Helmand province, toward neighboring Kandahar." Helmands and Kandahar "have been the scene of the most intense fighting between Taliban and NATO troops this year, the worst upsurge in violence in the country since the U.S.-led invasion in 2001 that ousted the Taliban regime from power."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

UnitedHealth CEO Ousted Amid Options Probe. The New York Times (10/16, Dash, Freudenheim) reports, "Dr. William W. McGuire, a medical entrepreneur who built the UnitedHealth Group into a colossus in its field, was forced to resign from the company yesterday and to give up a portion of the $1.1 billion he holds in harshly criticized stock options." The Times continues, "UnitedHealth, one of the nation's two largest health insurers, also dismissed its general counsel and a member of its board in what amounted to a sweeping overhaul of its governance practices and leadership ranks. The options that Dr. McGuire had been granted over the years have led to criminal and civil investigations and public disapproval." The Times adds, "In a sweeping report released yesterday that was highly critical of management, a law firm hired by UnitedHealth to investigate the timing of stock options concluded that the company was riddled with poor controls and conflicts of interest. The report, which the company posted on its Web site, found that UnitedHealth had backdated options to maximize employees' compensation. … The company said yesterday that the disputed options would be repriced from the lowest share price for the years in question to the highest prices, scaling back the earnings of Dr. McGuire and others. The company did not say precisely how much its executives would give up. … The developments are the most dramatic to date since federal regulators started looking into the widespread practice of backdating stock options. More than 100 companies have come under scrutiny over the unlikely coincidence of stock options being granted again and again to senior executives on dates when the company's share price was low, a tactic that guaranteed the maximum profit when the options were turned into cash."

The AP (10/22, Freed) reports the company "said McGuire will step down immediately as chairman and as a director. It said that McGuire would continue as chief executive until Dec. 1 at the latest and that he would 'assist in an orderly transition to new leadership.'" The company "named Stephen Hemsley, currently president and chief operating officer, to be the new chief executive. It also installed Richard Burke, the founding chief executive of UnitedHealth's predecessor company, as chairman."

The Los Angeles Times (10/16, Girion) notes that the announcement "came in the wake of a board-commissioned investigation that found that stock option grants were "likely backdated" to allow insiders to maximize financial gains." An investigation "by a law firm hired by UnitedHealth's board concluded that 1.5 million options — most of which were granted to McGuire as a part of his 1999 compensation package — were 'likely backdated.' The results of that investigation — given to board members last week and made public Sunday — were viewed as creating pressure on McGuire to leave." Yet, "because the investigation had been underway for more than six months, there was a sense among investors until only recently that McGuire would survive the scandal, said Sheryl Skolnick, an analyst at CRT Capital in Stanford, Conn."

The Wall Street Journal (10/16, A1, Bandler, Forelle) reports, "The probe's findings, released yesterday, provided a detailed picture of how stock-option backdating worked at the company, offering glimpses of cronyism and a culture in which vast sums of compensation were handed out with few controls or written records. Among the troublesome option grants detailed in the report was a massive 1999 award to Dr. McGuire that ranks among the most lucrative ever." UnitedHealth "also is being investigated by the Securities and Exchange Commission, by federal prosecutors in New York, and by the Minnesota attorney general."

UnitedHealth To Face Investor Scrutiny. The Wall Street Journal (10/16, Fuhrmans) reports, "With William McGuire forced out from the helm of UnitedHealth, investors will start sorting out whether the company's management team can get it back on track without the man who built it. Despite the obvious challenges ahead, some investors and analysts say it can." UnitedHealth "has one critical factor working in its favor: It is known for its deep bench of management talent. … Against that backdrop, investors need to decide whether to sell the stock because the company could struggle without Dr. McGuire's leadership, or to buy it because the uncertainty about the stock-options scandal is closer to being resolved."

Smaller Firms Take On Accounting Giants. The Washington Post (10/16, D1, Hart) reports, "For more than a decade, many smaller Washington-based accounting and consulting firms have aligned themselves with one of four larger networks that represent mid-size regional firms. Now one of those networks has gone a step further: banding its member firms together to act as one company." The Post continues, "The network, called Baker Tilly USA, opens for business today, combining 22 mid-size accounting firms from around the country, including Beers & Cutler PLLC locally. The alliance plans to offer tax, audit and consulting services to capture more of the accounting market, a strategy other accounting networks plan to adopt over the next year." The Post adds, "The dissolution of accounting giant Arthur Andersen in the Enron scandal, and the more stringent internal accounting controls required by the Sarbanes-Oxley law, created more demand for the Big Four -- Deloitte & Touche LLP, Ernst & Young LLP, KPMG LLP and PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP -- particularly from the nation's largest public companies. .. .Second- and third-tier accounting firms often found it difficult to move up the accounting ranks because larger clients typically require industry-specific skills and global reach, which many regional firms do not have."

SEC To Relax Margin Rules. The Financial Times (10/16, Grant) reports, "The US is set to relax margin rules in force since after the Wall Street crash of 1929 with the approval of a system that will cut securities trading costs and pave the way for 'multi-asset' trading across equities, options and futures." The Times continues, "The move removes a key barrier to the competitiveness of the US capital markets as similar margin rules already exist in Europe, attracting increasing numbers of hedge funds to London. … It comes as many US exchanges are trying to expand the mix of their businesses towards a combination of equities, options and futures." The Times adds, "This is in response to demand from hedge funds and other traders who increasingly prefer to trade such assets simultaneously. … The Securities and Exchange Commission's staff has approved an application by the New York Stock Exchange for a new type of 'portfolio margining' account that calculates margin based on the types of assets held in the account and the interplay between them. … It will provide an alternative to the 'Reg T' margining system, under which the Federal Reserve and NYSE set margins for stock trading at up to 50 per cent."

Regulators Rethinking Hedge Fund Rules. The Financial Times (10/16, Grant) reports, "Top US policymakers believe fresh regulation of hedge funds may be needed to avoid a catastrophic hedge fund failure and that relying on banks and other counterparties to manage their exposure to the booming industry may no longer be enough." The Times continues, "The development marks a shift in thinking on hedge fund oversight since a US court in June struck down a rule that hedge fund managers register with the Securities and Exchange Commission. … Hedge funds have since been in regulatory limbo." The Times adds, "The $6bn losses at hedge fund Amaranth have thrust into the spotlight concerns over the systemic risks associated with the $1,500bn industry. … Since the collapse of Long Term Capital Management in 1998, the President's Working Group on Financial Markets – made up of the Federal Reserve, Treasury, SEC and Commodity Futures Trading Commission – has believed that counterparty risk management is the best way to guard against risks to the financial system posed by hedge funds. … Ben Bernanke, US Federal Reserve chairman, in May expressed scepticism about giving regulators more oversight over hedge funds, saying that allowing hedge funds and trading partners to manage risk in the sector made 'economic sense'. … However, one senior official close to the group said the explosive growth of such funds, the leverage available and the increasing exposure of pension fund money to them had cast doubt on that approach. … Speaking on condition of anonymity, he said: 'It's an unavoidable question that you ought to look comprehensively at how this framework is working . . . Is counterparty risk management still the right approach?'"

Hedge Funds Draw Insider-Trading Scrutiny. The New York Times (10/16, Anderson) reports, "In early March, executives from Movie Gallery, a big movie rental chain, held a private conference call for their lenders to talk about how disastrous 2005 had been for the company. A string of Hollywood flops had kept customers away. More people were recording movies from television instead of renting them from a store. The executives said they needed more time to fix the problems, which included more than $1 billion in debt." The Times continues, "Most of the roughly 200 lenders were not bankers, but hedge funds. And what they heard was supposed to be confidential: it was inside information, as valuable to investors as a tip about an imminent takeover. … During the next two days, though, Movie Gallery's shares were heavily traded, and its stock plummeted 25 percent. … A coincidence? Regulators are not so sure. The Securities and Exchange Commission is now looking into whether any of the hedge funds on the private call with Movie Gallery took their inside knowledge of the company's struggles and traded on it. Movie Gallery announced earnings results to the public nearly two weeks after the private conference call." The Times adds, "The Movie Gallery case provides a window onto the growing power of hedge funds in financial markets, and raises questions about their role in how information flows on Wall Street. Hedge funds have become a dominant force in the New York and London stock exchanges, and now account for roughly half of all trading in those markets. But they also have recently become major players in the more opaque debt market, which includes bonds as well as loans, and is more than one and a half times as big as the stock market. … The power shift in the loan market has prompted the trade association for lenders to develop new guidelines, to be announced today, governing how confidential and material — meaning potentially market-moving — nonpublic information is used."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ To Launch Initiative Seeking Causes Of Violent Crime Increase. USA Today (10/16, Johnson) reports, "Teams of federal investigators looking to curb increases in murder and robbery will visit several U.S. cities in order to pinpoint the root causes of community violence, the Justice Department is expected to announce today." USA continues, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales plans to outline the initiative in an appearance at the annual meeting of the nation's police chiefs in Boston, the Justice Department said." USA adds, "The Justice review comes after the Police Executive Research Forum, a national police advocacy group, reported last week that murder, robbery and assault offenses had increased substantially in a cross-section of cities during the first six months of 2006. … Last month, the FBI's national crime report for 2005 also revealed a nearly 2% increase in the nation's murder rate after a two-decade low in 2004." USA notes, "The federal program will dispatch investigators to several cities during the next few weeks to look at possible causes of increased violence, according to an outline of the initiative provided by the Justice Department. The department didn't identify the cities."

Abramoff Associate Met White House Officials 12 Times In 2003 And 2004. The Financial Times (10/16, Kirchgaessner) reports, "A lobbyist associated with Jack Abramoff, the convicted former 'superlobbyist', met White House officials on 12 occasions in 2003 and 2004 on behalf of an association that represented PartyGaming and other online gaming websites, according to billing records released by Congress." White House officials' "meetings with Shawn Vasell, a former associate of Mr

Abramoff, were documented by the latter's former lobbying firm, Greenberg Traurig. The documents were released following a broader investigation into contacts between Mr Abramoff's team and the Bush administration by the House committee on government reform." The Times adds, "A spokesman for Mr Abramoff, who pleaded guilty to corruption charges this year, declined to comment."

Mehlman Denies Involvement In State Department Official's Firing. The Financial Times (10/16, Kirchgaessner) reports RNC Chair Ken Mehlman "was on Sunday put on the defensive about his alleged role in the ousting of a State Department official in 2001 who was a political foe of Jack Abramoff." Mehlman "said he did not recall the specifics of the removal of Allen Stayman, who supported changes to labour laws on the Northern Mariana Islands, an important client of Mr Abramoff, but said it was 'not true' he had the authority to fire anyone in his former role as political director at the White House." The Times quotes one of the released Abramoff emails saying, "Mehlman said he would get him [Stayman] fired." Stayman, now on the minority staff of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, had been the Director of the Office of Compact Negotiations and also served as the Department of the Interior's Deputy Assistant Secretary for Insular Affairs.

Mehlman was asked on CNN's Late Edition (10/15) about a report that an official at the State Department was fired because Jack Abramoff came to him "and basically said, fire this guy; he's not allowing the policies in the Northern Mariana Islands that Abramoff and his clients wanted." Mehlman said, "It is not true. And I'm not sure that those e-mails suggested that. First of all, I did not have the authority, as the political director, to fire anybody. It wasn't my decision."

Tampa Gambino Trial Begins Today. The St. Petersburg Times (10/16, Weimar) reports, "Not so very long ago, Tampa was an underworld hub, a place where mobsters ran illegal gambling operations out of Ybor City coffee shops and killed the people who got in their way. Those days are over, thanks largely to a crackdown by law enforcement in the 1970s and '80s. But experts say the Mafia never really left Tampa: It just changed form. Starting today, four men alleged to be members of the Gambino crime family will go on trial in U.S. District Court in Tampa on charges of racketeering and extortion. Prosecutors said the crew, headed by Ronald 'Ronnie One Arm' Trucchio, committed a string of crimes from New York to Miami, including murder, robbery and extortion." The Times adds that today, "mobile groups of crime associates called 'crews' migrate to Florida and work independently, making payments to heads of families in New York or New Jersey."

The Tampa Tribune (10/15, Silvestrini) reported, "Lorraine Lamendola's terrifying tale of hiding from mobsters by crawling around on the floor of her darkened house is at the heart of what the federal government says was a brutal struggle to control the valet parking business in Tampa. While members of the Gambino crime family…carried out murders, armed robberies and drug sales in New York, New Jersey and Florida, mobsters used extortion to gain dominance over valet revenue at hospitals, restaurants and nightclubs in the Tampa area, federal authorities allege." The Tribune noted, "Documents filed in the federal criminal case and the county civil case paint a picture of a violent struggle over the lucrative business of parking cars in the Tampa Bay area."

Internet Investigators Fight Rising Threat Of Child Predators. In a story about the rising threat of Internet child predators, the Miami Herald (10/14, Veciana-Suarez, 310K) noted, "About 18 months ago, the FBI's Miami division launched a separate Crimes Against Children Squad. The squad includes about 10 undercover investigators who mostly work online. … Since the squad began, FBI agents have arrested or identified 82 suspects for a range of sex crimes against children, said Judy Orihuela, the FBI's Miami spokeswoman." The Herald added, "The squad, which serves the Keys through Palm Beach County, also works with public schools to teach children how to stay safe. But police, like other experts, say it's ultimately up to the parents. 'We don't advocate for parents to try to keep their kids offline,' said Supervisory Special Agent Terri Patterson. 'That's unhealthy. The kids have to spend time online. Their parents just have to monitor it.'"

Bikers Raise Funds For Amish School Families. NBC Nightly News (10/15, story 11, 1:45, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, " In Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, it's a weekend of healing as neighbors reach out to neighbors following the deadly Amish school shooting there. And in the wake of the violence, a new story is unfolding, one of community compassion and grace. Today, more than a thousand bikers turned on the power of their engines to help families. ... An act of kindness raising nearly $30,000 today to benefit families whose children were shot in an Amish school two weeks ago."

Former Duke Students Say Rape Accusation Ruined Lives. The New York Times (10/16, Wilson) reports, "In their first news interviews, three former Duke University students told the CBS News program '60 Minutes' that they were falsely accused of raping a woman hired to dance at a lacrosse team party last March." The Times continues, "One of the men has graduated from Duke, while the other two, who were sophomores, have been suspended from the university pending the outcome of the case, they said on the program, which was shown yesterday. They are free on $100,000 bail while awaiting a trial expected to start next spring. … 'This woman has destroyed everything I worked for in my life,' said the student who graduated, David F. Evans, 23, of Annapolis, Md. 'And, worst of all, she's split apart a community and a nation on facts that just didn't happen and a lie that should have never been told.'" The Times adds, "Also appearing on the show was James E. Coleman Jr., a professor at Duke's law school who criticized the prosecutor in the case and accused him of misconduct. Mr. Coleman, who led a university review of the men's lacrosse program after the party, said of Michael B. Nifong, the Durham County district attorney, 'I think in this case, it appears that this prosecutor has set out to develop whatever evidence he could to convict people he already concluded were guilty.' … In June, Mr. Coleman said Mr. Nifong should ask the state attorney general to appoint a special prosecutor and remove himself from the case. Mr. Coleman said Mr. Nifong 'pandered to the community' and set up an improper photo lineup to identify suspects. … In a telephone interview last night, Mr. Coleman said, 'He has forgotten about his obligation to protect the innocent, and in my view, that's prosecutorial misconduct.' … Mr. Nifong did not return telephone calls and e-mail messages yesterday. The accuser, a student at North Carolina Central University, could not be contacted."

Author Offers Hope To Imprisoned Teens. The New York Times (10/16, Smith) reports, "On a recent weekday afternoon (in Orlando, FL), Dennis Lehane, the best-selling crime writer, stood in front of 17 imprisoned teenagers, trying to establish his street credentials. He grew up in a violent neighborhood, he told them, Dorchester, in Boston. 'One or two made it out of my neighborhood,' he said. 'Sixteen other guys went down.'" The Times continues, "Mr. Lehane was on a tour to publicize his new story collection, 'Coronado' (HarperCollins), and had made an unusual stop: at the Youthful Offender Program at the Orange County Jail here. The participants had been reading 'Coronado' as part of a class called, in an effort to use language familiar to teenagers, 'Literature n' Living.' … Most of the boys, who are 14 to 17, had been accused of crimes so serious that they were being tried as adults. Some were awaiting trial, others serving sentences of less than a year. Many of the characters in 'Coronado,' are, like the prisoners, young, lost and violent, and the book had been assigned to them by John Richter, the program's coordinator, in an effort to get them to read — anything." The Times adds, "Mr. Richter had tested the boys to make sure they understood the book, and had them write reports, which they were now delivering to Mr. Lehane, whose 2001 novel, 'Mystic River,' was made into a movie by Clint Eastwood."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

President Of National Association Of The Deaf Calls Arrests "Totally Unnecessary." The Washington Post (10/16, B1, De Vise) reports, "The president of the National Association of the Deaf weighed in yesterday on what she called the 'totally unnecessary' arrests Friday night of 133 protesters at Gallaudet University in a dispute with campus administrators, and urged the board of trustees to take command of a situation that 'is out of control.' Bobbie Beth Scoggins, head of the advocacy group, arrived at the Washington campus yesterday afternoon to cheers from scores of students and alumni, who have taken shifts occupying tents around the campus entrance for the past week. They shut down the campus for three days to protest the selection of former university provost Jane K. Fernandes as the school's next president." Scoggins said that "sympathizers around the world had erected more than 70 'tent cities' in solidarity with the Gallaudet protesters, four of whom launched a hunger strike at the start of the weekend." Fernandes defended the arrests as "necessary to regain control of the campus."

Gay Masseur's Business Application Stirs Tensions In Manassas, VA. The Washington Post (10/16, Miroff) reports, "In the past three years, the Manassas City Council has received two applications for home-based massage therapy businesses, and members have approved both. Then Howard Daniel, who is gay, applied." The Post continues, "The backlash against Daniel's request began last month when nearly two dozen people, many of them members of a local church, spoke in opposition to it at a public hearing. When it came time for the city to decide on Daniel's application the next week, council members balked and voted instead to consider changing the city's zoning laws." The Post adds, "The city's response and the community opposition have blindsided Daniel and his supporters, one of whom had an anti-gay message written on his car. … Questions of discrimination are already sensitive in Manassas, which is currently under federal investigation for housing policies that allegedly target Hispanic residents, a violation of the Fair Housing Act. Now the city is again facing a land-use decision loaded with political overtones. At least one council member, Andrew L. Harrover (R), said he has received threats that Daniel's home will be picketed if the council approves his application. … The vast majority of those who have mobilized against Daniel's application do not live on his street or even in his neighborhood. Many are affiliated with Manassas's All Saints Catholic Church, though there is no indication they have organized their opposition through the church."

AT&T-BellSouth Deal Draws Consumer Criticism. USA Today (10/16, Davidson) reports, "Consumer advocates say the new concessions AT&T has offered to close its $80 billion merger with BellSouth don't go far enough to preserve competition. … 'They're a step in the right direction, but they don't resolve the most important competitive problems,' says Gene Kimmelman of Consumers Union. … He also said AT&T's offer smacks of desperation to win approval." USA continues, "At the urging of its two Democratic commissioners, the Federal Communications Commission postponed Friday's scheduled vote on the merger until Nov. 3 to allow time for the public to comment on proposed concessions that AT&T filed Friday. The four commissioners available to vote on the merger are split 2-2 along party lines." USA adds, "AT&T's offer, an attempt to break the stalemate, includes a $10-a-month DSL broadband service for new customers for 30 months. The company also said it would also offer free DSL modems for new broadband subscribers next year. … AT&T's proposal followed a flurry of late-night negotiations Thursday with the FCC's two Democratic commissioners, Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein. Republican FCC Chairman Kevin Martin has recommended the merger's approval with no conditions. Democratic commissioners Friday indicated AT&T's offer represented progress. … The Justice Department last week cleared the deal with no conditions or divestitures, enraging Democrats, who vowed to press for significant requirements."

Oshkosh Truck To Buy JLG Industries For $3 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (10/16, Brat, Hallinan) reports, "Oshkosh Truck Corp. said it will acquire JLG Industries Inc. for about $3 billion, positioning the Oshkosh, Wis., maker of fire, military, concrete and garbage trucks to take better advantage of the global boom in nonresidential construction." The Journal continues, "JLG, of McConnellsburg, Pa., makes aerial-work platforms, booms and related equipment that can lift people and heavy materials several stories. The all-cash deal at $28 per JLG share will create a company with 13,000 employees and $6 billion in annual revenue. Oshkosh will assume about $200 million in debt. Shares of JLG ended unchanged Friday at $20.75 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange." The Journal adds, "While housing construction in the U.S. has slowed, construction of office buildings, warehouses, multistory parking lots and other nonresidential construction has been strong as companies spend cash on expanding factories and offices while interests rates are near historical lows. … The purchase of JLG, which Oshkosh expects to complete in the next 90 days, will be the company's 15th acquisition since 1996."

Volkswagen Would Support MAN's Scania Bid With Restrictions. The Wall Street Journal (10/16, C8, Rauwald) reports, "German car maker Volkswagen AG said it would support MAN AG's attempt to acquire Scania AB for 95.89 billion kronor ($12.93 billion) if the German truck maker manages to acquire shares representing slightly more than 56% voting rights in its Swedish rival." The Journal continues, "Volkswagen, Europe's biggest auto maker by sales and the biggest single shareholder in both MAN and Scania, said it would offer its shares -- representing 34% of Scania's voting rights and 18.7% of its equity -- to MAN in that case. Volkswagen said MAN must also win shares representing at least 71.31% of Scania's capital." The Journal adds, "Volkswagen's supervisory board, the equivalent of a U.S. board of directors, 'is convinced that a solution acceptable to all sides remains the preferred outcome,' the company said in a statement following an extraordinary meeting yesterday. Volkswagen added it won't support a counterbid by Scania for MAN at the present time. .. . MAN said it welcomes 'Volkswagen AG's continued support for its concept to combine MAN and Scania AB and its willingness to tender its shares into a successful merger.' … Scania and Swedish investment company Investor AB, which owns a significant stake in Scania, have rejected the most recent bid, saying it still 'significantly undervalues' the company's prospects. Investor said yesterday it still won't rule out a counterbid by Scania."

EU, Microsoft Seek Common Ground On Vista. The Financial Times (10/16, Buck) reports, "Microsoft and the European Commission appeared to be stepping back from months of conflict over the Vista operating system, after the US software group revealed on Friday that it had made significant changes to its new flagship product ahead of Vista's launch next month." The Times continues, "Although the Brussels-based antitrust regulator stressed that it had not given a 'green light' to Microsoft, Neelie Kroes, the European Union competition commissioner, gave an upbeat assessment." The Times adds, "Microsoft's competitors said they needed more time to assess the changes to Vista. But most of them welcomed the US software giant's announcement that it would amend the operating system in order to ensure that computer users had a choice between using rival software or Microsoft's own products. … The changes focus in particular on internet search, security software and a programme similar to Adobe's PDF reader that lets users create and send fixed documents. Microsoft said it would develop interfaces that would allow rival software to connect better with the new operating system. It would also allow competing software to 'override' Vista's own functions should users install another product providing the same service. .. .Symantec, which had warned that the integration of Microsoft security features into Vista would undermine its business, said Microsoft's concessions gave reason for 'guarded optimism'. … However, Symantec said it was crucial that Microsoft made available details of the new interfaces to rival companies as fast as possible."

Report Warns Growth In US Electricity Demand Outstripping New Resources. The Wall Street Journal (10/16, Smith, 2.03M) reports, "A report by the North American Electric Reliability Council warns demand for electricity is increasing three times as fast as resources are being added in the U.S., a trend that could shake electric-system reliability in the coming decade. In its first report since the organization's duties were expanded by Congress, the grid organization, known as NERC, said U.S. demand will increase by about 20% from 2006 to 2015, outstripping investment in new electrical supply." The Journal says, "Increasingly, it is left to a deregulated market to determine whether and when new resources get built. As the system drifts closer to its physical limits, it is even more important that energy regulators and utilities promote conservation and use of the most energy-efficient equipment, said Rick Sergel, chief executive of [NERC]."

WSJournal Outlines 10 Innovations That Could Reduce Electricity Usage. In an analysis, the Wall Street Journal (10/16, R1, Smith, 2.03M) reports that the electricity "crisis" the US is facing is "a tremendous opportunity." The Journal says, "Energy prices are high, supplies are increasingly tight, and anxiety is growing about climate change. But that dark outlook is driving consumers, utilities and public officials to finally take advantage of innovations that could radically reshape the nation's power consumption without lowering the standard of living." The Journal outlines "10 innovations capable of making a big difference immediately and in coming years." These include: more efficient lighting systems and hardware, advanced sensors, better tools for tracking energy use, higher EPA energy-efficiency standards, more stringent building codes, improved incentives for utilities, variable electricity pricing, rebates for old equipment, and "demand-response" programs.

Board Finds Poor Oversight By BP Caused Texas City Fire. The Wall Street Journal (10/16, A10) reports, "A July 2005 fire at BP PLC's Texas City refinery was caused by poor mechanical-integrity oversight, a U.S. safety board said. The fire occurred four months after an explosion at the refinery killed 15 workers and injured hundreds more." The Journal says, "BP said it agreed with the findings -- disclosed yesterday -- of the Chemical Safety and Hazardous Investigation Board and described a series of steps taken to improve 'positive material identification' at the plant, including an increase in the size of the inspection team from 50 people to more than 200."

The New York Times/AP reports BP "did not have procedures in place that could have prevented a fire in July 2005 at its refinery in Texas City after workers installed the wrong type of pipe, federal investigators said Sunday. The fire at the Resid Hydrotreater Unit, which combines heavy crude oil with hydrogen, caused more than $30 million in damage. One worker suffered minor injuries."

Mexican Bats Find Benefactors In US. The Washington Post (10/16, A8, Connolly) reports from Mexico City, "Shortly before sundown they make their first foray, cruising up to 5,000 feet aboveground in search of mosquitoes, moths and other tasty treats. A few hours later, they return home to rest and feed their young before heading out again around midnight." The Post continues, "By daybreak, when Mexican free-tailed bats finally return to their cave, named Cueva de la Boca, the colony will have traveled as far as 62 miles and gobbled some 12 tons of bugs out of the skies near the U.S. border. And in cornfields from Texas to Iowa, farmers are giving thanks. … Or at least they should be." The Post adds, 'Sure, bats are creepy. They hang upside down, squeal at high decibels and turn up in movies as blood-sucking fiends. Some even spread rabies. But, it turns out, that in the global ecosystem, bats are humanity's allies. … Every night, all night, as humans sleep, the flying mammals work feverishly. They pollinate plants such as the agave, the source of Mexico's iconic tequila. Their excrement, called guano, is a valuable fertilizer. And bats eat up to one-quarter of their body weight in insects every night, making them one of the simplest, safest, most cost-effective forms of pest control available. … Somehow, that message has not reached most people. For decades, intentionally or otherwise, property owners, hikers and sightseers have trampled habitat, dumped garbage and set fires, decimating the bat populations in many parts of the world. … Now, in a unique cross-border alliance, bat lovers have embarked on a multiyear effort to quantify the damage and replenish the bat population of northern Mexico. The project, being spearheaded by the nonprofit Texas-based Bat Conservation International (BCI), includes detailed mapping of hundreds of present and former bat roosts, educational programs for farmers and even purchases of land to protect the most vulnerable colonies."

Growing Green Economy Aims At Mainstream. The Washington Post (10/16, D1, Rosenwald) reports, "Keith Ware dressed naturally to set up his booth at the Green Festival. He wore an organic cotton hooded jacket, organic cotton blue jeans and organic hemp work boots, the soles of which are made from recycled surgical gloves. He was not, however, wearing his organic cotton underwear. … Ware is one of the owners of Eco-Green Living, a Logan Circle store that sells organic and fair-trade products such as teas, hemp boots and even the makeshift floor he was setting up, which was made from Marmoleum -- a combination of linseed oil, wood flour, rosin, jute and limestone. He was an exhibitor over the weekend at the Green Festival, which drew crowds of people to the Washington Convention Center to celebrate light bulbs that last 60,000 hours, investment funds targeting socially responsible companies and paper made from elephant dung by a company called Mr. Ellie Pooh." The Post continues, 'The show, the third in the District, grew from 250 exhibitors in the first year to more than 350. Although some exhibitors were selling products, the chief intention of the show was to develop the industry by connecting the principles and products of green businesses with mainstream customers. … By many accounts, the green business movement is taking off, with the marketplace topping more than $228 billion in the United States and with such companies as Wal-Mart Stores Inc. getting into organic food and General Electric Co. plowing into renewable energy. Levi's is introducing organic cotton jeans. Vanity Fair recently published a green issue. … (W)hat was long a counterculture movement is now embracing one of its sworn enemies -- big business -- as a key component of the cause."

Three Chicago Gang Members Convicted Of Drug Trafficking. The Medill News Service (10/13) reports three members of a Chicago gang "were convicted Thursday, culminating a massive federal probe into a network of drug trafficking on the city's West Side. Troy Martin, Eddie Bell and Patrick Bray were each found guilty by a federal jury of running a highly organized drug ring as members of the Mafia Insane Vice Lords. … The men were arrested in May 2004 as part of 'Operation Day Trader,' a U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration investigation. A total of 48 defendants were arrested on federal conspiracy charges, most of whom have been convicted."

Accused Asian Gang Leader Arrested In Sacramento. KOVR-TV, Sacramento (10/14) reports on its Web site that five people were arrested after they "were caught growing marijuana in plain view in their backyard. Federal agents say one of the suspects arrested is a leader of an Asian gang called Little Rascals, a gang the DEA says is the boldest they've arrested all summer. … According to an affidavit, the leader lived in Elk Grove but ran the operation out of his mother's house in Oak Park. Inside the home, agents say they found 6,000 ecstasy pills, 39 marijuana plants in the backyard of the residence well as 19 boxes of processed marijuana."

Six To Plead Guilty In Texas To Drug-Smuggling. In McAllen, the Monitor (10/14) reports six defendants in a federal drug case "have agreed to plead guilty to smuggling charges, opening the way for prosecutors to go after their 10 co-defendants. … The case dates back to December 2005, when the 16 men were indicted after an almost 10-year Drug Enforcement Administration investigation into cocaine and marijuana smuggling near Peñitas." The Monitor notes that the case involves former McAllen police officer Francisco Meza-Rojas who "led the family drug ring, according to court documents. He and the five other prisoners who escaped the prison in La Villa are still on the loose."

Pennsylvania Man Gets 8-Year Sentence for Role In Crack Ring. The Scranton (PA) Times-Tribune (10/15) reports a Kingston man "was sentenced to more than eight years in prison for his role in a crack cocaine ring that operated in Luzerne and Lancaster counties. Anthony Blaso, 54, of Kingston, pleaded guilty to a drug conspiracy count in July, four months after he was indicted in federal court as a result of an investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and the Wilkes-Barre Police Department."

US Military Pilot Sentenced To Prison In Ecstasy Case. The AP (10/13) reports a U.S. military pilot who "flew a U.S. Air Force jet from New York to Germany to pick up 200,000 pills of Ecstasy was sentenced Friday to 17 1/2 years in prison. U.S. District Judge John G. Koeltl rejected appeals by defense lawyers for leniency for Capt. Franklin Rodriguez of the U.S. Air National Guard, saying the sentence was appropriate for 'a particularly egregious and despicable crime.'"

The Mid-Hudson News (10/14) reports Rodriguez and his co-defendant, Master Sergeant John Fong, "pleaded guilty in May to conspiring to import the drug into the country and conspiring to possess and distribute the drug. The charges were the result of an international investigation into importation of Ecstasy on military aircraft and its distribution in the United States."

Nationwide Marijuana Plant Seizures Outpace Last Year's Count. The San Diego Union-Tribune (10/16, Lee) reports drug agents sniffed out a major marijuana patch at Palomar Mountain State Park a few months ago in the kind of raid that has become all too common on U.S. public lands. What officials initially thought might be a few hundred plants ended up being 15,000. … Initial repairs to such an area can cost taxpayers $10,000 per acre for staff time and a helicopter to haul away garbage, said the Office of National Drug Control Policy. On average, ten acres are fouled for every acre of marijuana planted in forests and on other public lands, the agency said." Federal agents "say that about 4.5 million outdoor marijuana plants have been seized nationwide this year, largely from public lands. That pace is well ahead of the 2005 count."

Rep. McGovern Seeks Leniency For Convicted Drug Dealer In Massachusetts. The Boston Herald (10/16) reports U.S. Rep. James P. McGovern "asked a federal judge in Boston to go easy last week when sentencing a now twice-convicted drug dealer who was once moving up to 13 pounds of coke per month." McGovern "wrote to U.S. District Court Judge F. Dennis Saylor IV asking leniency for Nicholas Police." On Thursday, Saylor "sentenced Police…to the low end of the 8-to-10 years he was facing for pleading guilty to possession of cocaine and marijuana."

FARC Member's Trial To Begin In D.C. The AP (10/16) reports, "The politically charged trial of a top Latin American rebel leader is set to begin in a 3-year-old kidnapping case that has the lives of three Americans hanging in the balance. Opening statements were scheduled for Monday in the U.S. District Court trial of 56-year-old Ricardo Palmera, who is considered the most senior member captured from the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), on charges he provided material support to a terrorist group. … The trial is the latest evidence of a stiffening U.S. stance against FARC, which the U.S. government considers a terrorist organization. … The group funds itself through drug trafficking, extortion and kidnapping."

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Said To Cause Overcrowding, Environmental Problems. Dan Stein, president of the Federation for American Immigration Reform (FAIR), writes in USA Today (10/16, 2.27M), "Overcrowded schools, congested highways, environmental stresses: We are a nation paving over its wildernesses while depending on our enemies for vital resources. Why? Because Americans have been blindsided by a government-mandated mass immigration program that's fueling this nation's runaway population growth. This growth was neither planned nor expected, but we feel the consequences every day." Stein adds, "Our population future is entirely within our power to determine. Just as the government has mandated soaring overcrowding and congestion in the past several decades, it has the power to slow population growth by curtailing immigration and enforcing laws against illegal immigration. … As responsible stewards for future generations, there is an urgency to consider how our decisions today will affect the nation they will inherit — before it's too late."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Snow's Role As GOP Fundraiser Draws Criticism. The New York Times (10/16, Stolberg, 1.21M) reports that "in the six months" since President Bush "enlisted him to resuscitate a White House press operation that was barely breathing," Tony Snow, "a former Fox News television and radio host and a conservative commentator, has reinvented the job with his snappy sound bites and knack for deflecting tough questions with a smile. Now, he is reinventing it yet again, by breaking away from the briefing room to raise money for Republicans, as he did…on Saturday night for Speaker J. Dennis Hastert. … His booking agent is the White House political shop, run by Karl Rove, the president's chief strategist. The White House is not keeping track of how much money Mr. Snow raises. His talks -- Saturday night's was a cross between a one-man show and a religious revival -- have attracted little scrutiny so far, but they are giving a much-needed boost to a party whose midterm fortunes appear increasingly bleak." Yet "even as the Republican establishment revels in his celebrity – 'It's like Mick Jagger at a rock concert,' Mr. Rove said -- Mr. Snow's extracurricular activities are making some veteran Washington hands, including those with strong Republican ties, deeply uneasy." The Times goes on to quote David Gergen ("If he is seen as wearing two hats, reporters as well as the public will inevitably wonder: is he speaking to us now as the traditional press secretary, or is he speaking to us as a political partisan?") and Kenneth Duberstein ("His profile should not be a political profile…but a press profile on behalf of the president") raising concerns about Snow's political activivies.

Mehlman Says GOP Leadership Dealt With Foley Scandal Aggressively. RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman was asked on CNN's Late Edition (10/15) how Republicans will deal with the Foley scandal only a few weeks before the election. Mehlman said, "I think you answer with the truth. The fact is the Speaker and our leadership could not have been more aggressive. The moment they found out about this, they gave Mark Foley the political death penalty. They said, get out of Congress or we're going to throw you out. They called in the FBI and the Department of Justice to investigate. They tried to bring in Louis Freeh to make sure the program was appropriate in the future. I think when people find this out, they're going to appreciate it."

Hastert's Leadership Style, Tenure As Speaker Examined. The Washington Post (10/16, A1, Grunwald, VandeHei, 748K) runs an analysis piece on Speaker Dennis Hastert's record, and describes him as someone "largely unknown outside Washington, routinely underestimated as a powerless figurehead inside Washington," yet a leader who "has helped unify his fractious caucus, promote President Bush's agenda and expand the House's GOP majority." Hastert "is still beloved by his players, which is why he's survived the Foley mess so far. They appreciate how he listens to their concerns, shares credit and works overtime to keep the team together. He schlepped to 42 districts in August to try to maintain the GOP majority; it's no coincidence that his political arm is called the Keep Our Majority PAC." His aides "say he intends to fight to protect his job, and he intends to win. After all, his legacy is at stake on Nov. 7. He'll either be the unbeaten coach, or the coach who lost the big one. Either way, he'll be the speaker who presided over an era of unprecedented partisanship, an era when winning seemed to be the only thing that mattered."

The Washington Post (10/16, A19, Babington, 748K) also says Hastert "shows no sign of resigning," but "the mere suggestion that he might do so raises an intriguing political and constitutional question: Who would replace him while Congress is in recess? The answer, it appears, is on a piece of paper locked away in the House clerk's office. In a little-noticed action taken nearly four years ago, the House amended its rules dealing with the 'continuity of Congress' in emergencies and the succession of speakers. The rule, cited recently in Roll Call, directs the speaker to 'deliver to the Clerk a list of Members in the order in which each shall act as Speaker pro tempore...in the case of a vacancy in the office of Speaker.'" The Post adds, "Perhaps the biggest question, some lawyers say, is whether a House speaker -- full time or pro tempore -- can assume and keep the presidency under any circumstance. A statute, not the Constitution, lists the speaker's place in the line succession."

Blogger's Role In Unfolding Scandal Noted. The Wall Street Journal (10/16, A1, Schatz, 2.03M) reports, "For three days, William 'Wild Bill' Kerr huddled over an old computer, trying to solve a curious mystery. He wanted to figure out the identity of the congressional page who received the salacious instant messages that prompted Florida Rep. Mark Foley to resign Sept. 29, triggering the scandal that's rocking the House of Representatives just weeks before the election." The "conservative blogger said he felt the news media were distorting the story, and he suspected, among other things, that the page in question was over the age of consent. Five days after the Foley news broke, Mr. Kerr thought he had found the former page -- a 21-year-old political operative who, by chance, worked about 10 miles north of Mr. Kerr's two-bedroom apartment here." Kerr "disclosed the results of his investigation Oct. 4, and gained the sort of instant celebrity made possible by the Internet age."

Hitchens Suggests There Was No Crime, No Victim In Foley Scandal. Christopher Hitchens writes in the Wall Street Journal (10/16, 2.03M) that the emails between Foley and the Congressional page "read for all the world like a chat between two dirty-minded adolescent boys. … The case would perhaps be altered somewhat if Mr. Foley had been the boy's teacher, or employer, or even priest. But pages are volunteers who are not on any one person's staff, and cannot be hired or fired by individual politicians. Neither coercion nor bribery was involved, as in the priestly scandals, which were quite often instances of actual rape. And the boy in this case was obviously a very knowing one, whose virginity was somewhere in his past. Indeed, it was Mr. Foley who seemed like the juvenile, or perhaps the case of arrested development. In what sense, then, does this constitute public business? … For a 'peccadillo,' Mark Foley is gone from politics already. And a huge public holiday has been taken from the serious matters that confront the electorate. But before the waters close over this scandal, and before the next one surfaces, I would still like to know what crime was committed in this instance, and who if anyone was the victim."

Congressional Report Finds Widespread Data Loss In 19 Federal Agencies. The Washington Post (10/16, A19, 748K) reports, "Federal workers at 19 agencies have lost personal information affecting thousands of employees and the public. Most of the data were lost or stolen. In a few cases, it was accessed by computer hackers, according to a report released Friday by the House Government Reform Committee." In all, "the committee reported 788 incidents involving the loss or compromise of sensitive information since Jan. 1, 2003. That was in addition to the 'hundreds of security and privacy incidents' at the Department of Veterans Affairs." The report said, "Data loss is a government-wide occurrence. … The vast majority of data losses arose from physical thefts of portable computers, drives and disks or unauthorized use of data by employees."

GSA's New Acquisition Division To Be Rolled Out In Phases. In his "Federal Diary" column in the Washington Post (10/16, D4, 748K), Sthephen Barr writes, "A major new acquisition division is officially up and running at the General Services Administration, but it remains a work in progress." The new Federal Acquisition Service "combines the Federal Technology Service and the Federal Supply Service, which together handle about $56 billion in annual sales. Officials hope that consolidation will improve financial controls; stem revenue losses in the old technology service and make for more efficient purchasing of services, equipment and supplies for federal agencies." James A. Williams, the new FAS commissioner, "said the acquisition service will roll out in phases, in part to allow time to gather more feedback from members of Congress and GSA employees on how best to serve federal agencies. The GSA has put off restructuring 11 regional offices for at least 30 days. … For the long term, the FAS will move to create a strategic plan that fits into the GSA's priorities and gives agencies 'a total view of the GSA' that helps them track where their money is going for purchases of technology and other products, Williams said."

Three Texas Universities Compete For Bush Library. ABC World News (10/15, story 7, 2:20, Harris, 8.78M) reported three Texas universities "are battling to be the site of the future George W. Bush Presidential Library. The White House is expected to announce the winner some time after the midterm elections." Baylor University's Tommye Lou Davis: "It would put us on the map. And so, it is a high stakes game." University of Dallas President Francis Lazarus: "We might seem to be an unlikely candidate for this. But we are a small institution with a global mission." Southern Methodist University, "where Laura Bush went to college and now serves on the board of trustees," is also a contender.

President's Niece Takes Part In World Hunger Event. The Washington Times (10/16, Hunsberger, 88K) reports, "Lauren Bush -- model, Ivy Leaguer and niece of President Bush -- campaigned yesterday afternoon to help end world hunger at a Georgetown University conference on international development." She "told a gathering of about 70 students from area colleges that rich nations need to help developing countries." The Stand Up Against Poverty event "was part of a two-day campaign to set an official Guinness world record for the largest turnout for one cause."

Witness Lists In Congressional Hearings Said To Lead To Increased Spending. The Wall Street Journal (10/16, A14, 2.03M) editorializes, "If Republicans lose control of Congress next month, one big reason will be their record of overspending, especially on earmarks. What explains this GOP fiscal performance? One answer comes from a new analysis by the Cato Institute on the Capitol Hill culture of spending under Republican rule. Examining hearings of 14 Congressional committees, political scientist James Payne found that 1,014 witnesses argued in favor of greater spending while only seven advocated less, an imbalance of 145 to 1. This is worse that a Cuban election." Congressional hearings "have degenerated into a lobbying process in which advocates sing the praises of the spending that their livelihoods depend on, while stroking the egos of the politicians as constructive philanthropists. Members of Congress begin to believe their own stacked juries. It's amazing they stopped spending at $2.7 trillion this year."

OPEC To Hold Emergency Meeting To Discuss Output Cut. The Wall Street Journal (10/16, A2, Daya, Williams, 2.03M) reports, "The Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, hoping to forge an elusive deal to cut oil output and halt a slide in crude-oil prices, said it will hold an emergency meeting in Qatar Thursday." The Journal says, "Oil ministers have declared that OPEC intends to slash output by one million barrels a day, or about 4%, to prop up prices. Behind the scenes, the oil czars have failed to nail down the all-important issue of how to allocate the cuts among the membership." The Journal sees the meeting as "a sign the cartel may be getting closer to putting aside its differences." However, the United Arab Emirates "signaled there isn't a deal yet."

Survey Highlights Consumer Unease With Health Care System. USA Today (10/16, Appleby, 2.27M) reports, "The US health care system -- touted as providing the best medical care in the world -- is becoming more precarious to most Americans, who are rattled by rising costs, questions about quality and fears about the future." A new poll by USA TODAY, ABC News and the Kaiser Family Foundation "found a growing unease in America about the rising cost of health care, confusion about the causes, and a desire for major reform. But it also found a distaste for giving anything up to achieve sweeping changes." USA Today adds Drew Altman, president of the Kaiser Family Foundation, said, "We have always seen strong support for the goal of universal coverage but never seen consensus on how to get there or a willingness to pay the price." That division "was reflected in" the poll. In the survey, "68% said providing coverage for everyone is more important than keeping taxes down. … When survey respondents were asked about possible trade-offs that might come with a universal program, positive responses plummeted."

ABC World News (10/15, story 5, 4:20, Harris, 8.78M) ran a detailed report on US health care costs, opening a

"week-long, comprehensive look at the problems and possible solutions for a system that has left millions of people uninsured, unhappy and unhealthy. As part of this series, ABC News, the Kaiser Family Foundation and 'USA Today,' polled people across the country. Only 44% say they're satisfied with the overall quality of health care, and only 18% are satisfied with the cost." Ex-Oregon Gov. John Kitzhaber, an emergency room physician, "says our health care system is just plain broken." Kitzhaber: "It's a system that sort of lies in the weeds until people are very, very sick and then rushes in with extraordinarily marvelous and expensive high technology to help you recover on the back end." Harris: "It's about a series of choices and Kitzhaber says we're making the wrong ones." Kitzhaber: "Should 95-year-old Grandpa's quadruple bypass surgery be paid at the expense of his six-year-old granddaughter getting immunizations and a routine checkup with her pediatrician?"

Possible Winners, Losers If Democrats Win Congress Examined. Columnist Jeffery H. Birnbaum writes in the Washington Post (10/16, D1, 748K), "Pharmaceutical and oil companies had better beware if Democrats make major gains in the upcoming elections. If Democrats win control of one or both chambers of Congress as many analysts expect, those and other industries could lose a raft of the legislative goodies they've garnered in recent years and also find themselves under congressional investigation. Such are the spoils when power shifts in the federal legislature." He adds, "How can we guess the winners and losers? Just follow the money. … Groups that have given much of their money to Democrats can be considered their true allies and will likely benefit from the items that Democrats push on Capitol Hill. Groups that have been delivering most of their campaign largesse to Republicans will probably see their druthers suffer under a more Democratic-leaning Congress." In addition to oil and drug companies, "other industries that would be wise to watch their backs if Democrats take over include insurers, electric utilities, manufacturers, chemical makers, home builders, general contractors, food processors, railroads and building material producers -- all of which gave 60 percent or more of their contributions to Republicans since 2002, according to the CRP's statistics." Democrats "are likely to play favorites as well. If they win, they will almost surely give high priority to the wishes of labor unions and trial lawyers, which have generally been dismissed by Republicans. The CRP classifies the political action committees of both as either solidly or strongly Democratic. Environmental groups, which work closely with Democrats, would also have a leg up."

"Bunch" Of GOP House Seats Seen As Competitive A Month Before Election Day. U.S. News and World Report (10/23, Gilgoff, 2.03M) reports that "with the ongoing investigation into the Foley scandal, continued bloodshed in Iraq, and Bush's approval numbers tumbling back to their basement levels… a bunch of Republican-held seats have suddenly become competitive less than a month before Election Day. … Whether Democrats wind up winning in these districts will determine whether they can go beyond picking up the 15 seats they need to claim just a bare majority in the House to a landslide victory." Newsweek adds, "In the past 10 days, the authoritative Cook Political Report has moved six GOP-held House seats into the 'competitive' column, bringing the number of vulnerable Republican seats to 43, compared with just nine competitive races in districts held by Democrats. The Rothenberg Political Report, another respected elections newsletter, last week raised the projected number of seats the Democrats will pick up next month from the 15-to-20 range to 18 to 25, its first such recalibration since August."

U.S. News and World Report (10/23, Gilgoff, 2.03M) reports that "more competitive races have forced Republicans to pull money from districts where they hoped to unseat Democratic incumbents. 'Because we've looked beyond the races in play to say "What's the next layer?"...we are in a position...to handle the risk of the increasing number of seats,' Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman tells U.S. News, 'and also...to say, "Now this seat's safe-we don't have to worry about it."' Asked to name a Republican-held seat that has gone from competitive to safe, Mehlman declined."

Mehlman Says Foley Scandal Has Not Had Significant Impact. U.S. News and World Report (10/23, Sullivan, 2.03M) interviews RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman. Asked about polls showing bad results for Republicans going into the November elections, Mehlman said, "Let me first say I do think that we are in a very challenging environment. I think that the situation with [Rep. Mark] Foley has made it even more challenging, but...I have not seen a significant impact in most of the races around the country, and I certainly haven't seen a free fall." Asked how this year's election is different than the 1994 election when Republicans took control of Congress from Democrats, Mehlman said, "First of all, in '94 the Democrats were particularly [vulnerable] to a terrible year because they had a lot of open seats and a lot of those open seats were in Republican presidential districts. There are 20 Republican open seats this year; 17 of the 20 Republican seats this year are Bush-leaning seats, meaning Bush won those districts with an average of 61 percent. The second difference from '94 is the people who are in the toughest races; people like [Connecticut Rep.] Nancy Johnson and [New Mexico Rep.] Heather Wilson and others are very battle tested. Important difference No. 3 that I think is going to be relevant this year is that Republicans had a positive agenda they could be for, and voters in '94 embraced many of the concepts behind that positive agenda. You don't see that at all this year."

Pelosi Has Raised Over $50 Million This Cycle. U.S. News and World Report (10/23, Bedard, 2.03M) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column that House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi "has raised over $50 million this two-year election cycle and over $100 million since getting the top House Democratic post four years ago."

Democrats See Chance To Redefine Battleground For 2008 Presidential Race. U.S. News and World Report (10/23, Walsh, 2.03M) reports that the Democratic Party "sees an opportunity not only to score big wins on November 7 but also to redefine the battlegrounds for the 2008 presidential race." U.S. News adds, "With the Democrats trying to pick up 15 seats to take control of the House and six in the Senate, they are looking to the West, where a half-dozen House races and the Montana Senate race could help determine the new lineup. Colorado, Arizona, New Mexico, and Nevada are the main flash points. All four states have undergone seismic demographic and political shifts. From 2001 to 2005, Nevada was the nation's fastest-growing state. Arizona was second, Colorado eighth, and New Mexico 16th. … 'We intend to contest Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado, and Nevada as a unit next time in the presidential because we think we can win there,' Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean told US News. Dean's theory is that, with a combined total of 29 electoral votes, those four states would make it unnecessary for the Democrats to win Florida, with 27 electoral votes, which they have lost in the last two down-to-the-wire presidential elections."

Dean Denies Democrats Would Raise Taxes.

DNC Chairman Howard Dean was asked on CNN's Late Edition (10/15) about Republican warnings that Democrats will raise taxes if they take control of Congress. Dean said, "That's nonsense. We have no interest in doing that. In fact, 80 percent of Americans have seen their income go down. The reason the economy doesn't work for the president is only his friends have benefited from increased earnings and corporate earnings and so forth. … Initially, I think what we'll do is raise the minimum wage, which the president refused to do without giving tax breaks to his contributors. We're not going to be the party of tax breaks to oil companies and insurance companies. We're going to be the part of middle class tax fairness. That does not include any increases of taxes on middle- class Americans of any kind. You know, we always see the Republicans coming out -- your country's going to be blown up if the Democrats take over; your taxes are going to go up. They're desperate. The truth is we believe that we ought to increase the pay of average middle class Americans and working class Americans. We believe we ought to do something about their health care. And we also believe there ought to be real ethics reform in Congress, which the Republicans refused to do."

Meanwhile, also on CNN's Late Edition (10/15), RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman said, "I'm confident we're going to maintain our majorities in the House and the Senate. And here's why. What the American people are going to vote on -- they want the economy; wonder where the economy is. Democrats have said that they will raise taxes, across- the-board tax increases." Asked about Dean's claim that Democrats will not raise taxes, Mehlman said, "That's what he says. But the guy that writes the tax laws, a guy named Charlie Rangel, the week they got out of town, said across-the-board tax increases. Nancy Pelosi, who'd be speaker, has a record of being in favor of across-the-board tax increases."

Krugman Says Party "All That Matters" In This Year's Elections. In his New York Times (10/16, 1.21M) column, Paul Krugman writes, "If the Democrats gain control of either house, no matter how narrowly, the American political landscape will be transformed. If they fail, no matter how narrowly, it will be seen, correctly, as a great victory for the hard right. The fact is that this is a one-letter election. D or R, that's all that matters. It's hard to think of an election in which the personal qualities of the people running in a given district or state have mattered less."

GOP Said To Be Writing Off DeWine As It Redirects Funds. The New York Times (10/16, Nagourney, 1.21M) reports, "Senior Republican leaders have concluded that Senator Mike DeWine of Ohio, a pivotal state in this year's fierce midterm election battles, is likely to be heading for defeat and are moving to reduce financial support for his race and divert party money to other embattled Republican senators, party officials said." The decision "to effectively write off Mr. DeWine's seat, after a series of internal Republican polls showed him falling behind his Democratic challenger, is part of a fluid series of choices by top leaders in both parties as they set the strategic framework of the campaign's final three weeks, signaling, by where they are spending television money and other resources, the Senate and House races where they believe they have the best chances of success." Republicans "are now pinning their hopes of holding the Senate on three states -- Missouri, Tennessee and, with Ohio off the table, probably Virginia -- while trying to hold on to the House by pouring money into districts where Republicans have a strong historical or registration advantage, party officials said Sunday. Republicans also said they would run advertisements in New Jersey this week to test the vulnerability of Senator Robert Menendez, one of the few Democrats who appear endangered." The Times also reports, "In one sign of the shifting political environment, as of this weekend, national Republicans were running advertisements in 29 districts; of those, 26 are held by Republicans and 3 by Democrats, though Republicans plan to begin running advertisements this week against an Illinois Democrat, Representative Melissa Bean. National Democrats are on the air in 30 districts, and defending Democrats in just 3 races." Republicans "are no longer running advertisements in three districts where they once thought they had a chance to take over Democratic-held seats -- in South Carolina, West Virginia and Ohio -- as well as a district in Arizona now held by a Republican. The party has not broadcast any advertising in four days on behalf of Representative Chris Chocola, one of three Indiana Republicans who polls suggest are headed for defeat, though Republican officials said that does not mean they have written off Mr. Chocola's seat."

Pennsylvania Senate Race Said To Hold Important Symbolic Value For Both Sides. The Los Angeles Times (10/16, Hook, 918K) reports Sen. Rick Santorum, "an outspoken advocate of banning same-sex marriage, restricting abortion, and other social conservative causes, is considered this year's most-endangered senator. It is a four-alarm fire for conservatives, who are bringing water buckets from all corners of the political world." The Times adds, "Across Pennsylvania, pastors are preparing to stuff voter guides into their Sunday bulletins. In Washington, D.C., Paul Weyrich, a national conservative leader, hosted a conference call to give a pep talk to Republicans in Pennsylvania. In England, some Santorum fans are planning to cross the Atlantic to help campaign." Santorum "is not just a key link between the Republican Party and Christian conservatives. He is also one of President Bush's most unapologetic allies in Congress and a member of the Senate GOP leadership. And he is the apotheosis of a younger generation of Republicans…that transformed the party in the 1990s into a more confrontational, ideological political force." The Times adds, "If 2006 turns into the electoral romp for Democrats that many analysts now are predicting, a loss by Santorum would be a signifier of the end of that Republican revolution. f Democrats are unable to defeat Santorum, they are unlikely to win a majority in the Senate, which Republicans control 55-45."

Kennedy, Klobuchar Clash On Iraq. The AP (10/16, Frommer) reports, "Candidates in Minnesota's closely watched Senate race clashed Sunday on Iraq and tax policy, with the Republican defending his vote to authorize the war in Iraq. 'You can't really play Tivo and rewind,' said Rep. Mark Kennedy." During a debate on NBC's "Meet the Press," he was asked "whether he would still vote for the war knowing that Saddam Hussein did not have weapons of mass destruction. 'We acted on the information we knew at the time. I stand by my vote.'" Democrat Amy Klobuchar, the Hennepin County attorney, "said it was time to have Iraqis take more control of their country and start bringing U.S. troops home. 'You cannot solve a problem that you don't admit exists, and that is what's going on here with the congressman,' she said. 'This war has basically devolved into a civil war.'"

The Minneapolis Star Tribune (10/16, Hotakainen, 398K) reports Kennedy "said the war will require the United States 'to make adjustments,'" but "he suggested it would be impossible to come up with a diplomatic solution: 'You can't negotiate with people that are ruthless and glory in killing innocent women and children.'" Klobuchar "told the stories of a mother in Mahnomen, Minn., who can't sleep because her child is going on his second tour of duty in Iraq and of a father in western Minnesota who cries when questions are asked about Iraq because he lost his son. 'These are real people in the real world who are looking for solutions,' she said."

Kennedy said on NBC's Meet the Press (10/15) that the US has "seen more challenges than we expected" in Iraq. But "if you look at what's happened, we have trained 300,000 Iraqi troops. We have a government that is a unity government. This is the number one issue in this race, and there are stark differences between my opponent, Ms. Klobuchar, and myself. She says it's a distraction. I think that it is one of the central fronts in the war on terror. Osama bin Laden and Zarqawi says that as well. She has set out a specific timetable for bringing our troops home that would tell the terrorists when they can take over an oil-rich country as a sanctuary for terrorists. And I believe we ought to be bringing our troops home as soon as we can after we're sure the terrorists can't win. And she's also come out against a bill funding body armor for our troops that a majority of Democrats join me in supporting. We have no higher priority than to support our troops in time of war, and we have to win this war on terror."

Klobuchar, also on NBC's Meet the Press (10/15), said, "The congressman is talking about body armor, and of course I support body armor for our troops. I support winning this war on terror by being smart. I supported the Patriot Act. But I will say this: the best way that we can protect our troops is to get this policy right. And I believe that that means changing course in Iraq. We need to transition to Iraqi governance; we need to send the clear message that they have to take control of their own government. And that means no permanent military bases. The congressman and I differ on this."

Ford Says He Would Have Voted Against Iraq War If He Knew What He Knows Now. Tennessee Democratic US Senate candidate Rep. Harold Ford was asked on ABC's This Week (10/15) about his vote in favor of the Iraq war. Ford said, "Naturally, if I knew then what I know now, I wouldn't have voted for it. At one point, I didn't think that President Bush would have even brought the resolution, but after hearing Vice President Cheney and others over the last few weeks indicate that they would have gone forward with the war in Iraq even knowing what they know now, it raises serious questions about not only judgment but sanity." Ford added, "Why would you go forward with an effort in Iraq knowing that they didn't have weapons of mass destruction, knowing that our focus should have remained on bin Laden?"

Ford was also asked on ABC's This Week (10/15) about his decision to film an ad in a church. Ford said, "I say I grew up in that church. I was baptized in that church. And the kind of attacks that we're taking in this campaign have been so fierce and so unrelenting that I've relied on my faith a whole lot in this campaign. So it seemed pretty natural to me." Ford added, "I just don't believe that, from looking at this politically, that Democrats ought to cede any ground to any Republican when it comes to morality and faith."

Corker Denies Bush Is Dragging His Campaign Down. Tennessee Republican US Senate candidate Bob Corker was asked on ABC's This Week (10/15) if the recent cash infusion from the RNC to his campaign is a sign his effort is ailing. Corker said, "It's just a big race. I think the national environment is what it is, and I think people throughout the country have a lot of concerns that make the water a little choppy." Asked if President Bush is dragging his campaign down, Corker said, "No, no, I don't know. He's been the state for us twice. Certainly, you know, we appreciate that. He's helped us raise money. Laura Bush was in the state just the last few days. Again, I think it's more of a national climate of concern. And I think people on both sides of the aisle have those concerns."

Bush, Bill Clinton To Host Competing Fundraisers In Virginia Senate Race. The Washington Times (10/16, 88K) reports, "President Bush and former President Bill Clinton will host competing fundraisers in Virginia on Thursday for their favored candidates in the US Senate race." Bush "will rally Republicans at an event for Sen. George Allen at the Science Museum of Virginia in Richmond. Mr. Clinton will headline a soiree for Democratic challenger James H. Webb Jr. at the McLean home of former Sen. Charles S. Robb. Mr. Allen unseated Mr. Robb in 2000. "

Nelson, GOP Challenger Trade Charges In Final Debate. The Lincoln Journal Star (10/16, Walton) reports, "Sen. Ben Nelson and Republican challenger Pete Ricketts came out swinging Sunday in a debate that attracted an overflow crowd of more than 200 on a sunny afternoon in the Panhandle. It didn't take long to establish the tenor of their third and final direct confrontation." In an opening statement, "Nelson repeated his claims that Ricketts supports enactment of a national sales tax, an end to farm payments, privatization of Social Security, amnesty for illegal immigrants and opposes an increase in the federal minimum wage. All those positions may be good for Wall Street, the Democratic senator said, but they're not good for Main Street in Nebraska." Ricketts' opening remarks "took the form of a bare-knuckles response." Nelson, he said, "has benefited from 'a revolving door career in the public and private sectors (and) cashed in' on his public service experience as governor by acting as a paid lobbyist for a brief period before he was elected to the Senate." The Star adds, "Introducing a new allegation into a Senate race that has overflowed with them, Ricketts said Nelson 'sits on the board of a company that contaminates groundwater in Nebraska,' namely Behlen Manufacturing in Columbus."

The AP (10/16) reports Ricketts also "said Democratic incumbent Sen. Ben Nelson was remiss by not pushing for drought relief as part of the last Farm Bill." But "Nelson said in Sunday's debate in Scottsbluff that Republicans were the ones stopping the payments."

Stabenow Seeks To Link Bouchard To Bush In First Debate. The AP (10/16, Martin) reports, "Democratic US Sen. Debbie Stabenow and Republican challenger Mike Bouchard sparred over issues ranging from the economy to the Iraq war on Sunday as they met in their first debate." Bouchard, the Oakland County sheriff, "said Stabenow has been ineffective and has flip-flopped on several issues. 'She says one thing here and does another thing in Washington,' he said." He also "criticized Stabenow's record on the economy, noting that Michigan has lost thousands of jobs in recent years." Stabenow "said Bouchard would support the 'failed policies' of the Bush administration. … On the Iraq war, Stabenow said it's now time for the Iraqi police and military to 'step up so we can transition out.'"

The Detroit News (10/16) says the candidates "occasionally exchanged sharp accusations as they sparred on subjects ranging from Iraq to Social Security in a Sunday debate at WGVU-TV." The debate was recorded in studio on Sunday morning for viewing on public television stations across the state at 8 PM.

Economy Seen As Key Issue In Michigan Campaigns. The Wall Street Journal (10/16, A4, Cooper, 2.03M) reports from Michigan, "Economic anxiety hangs heavy over the midterm elections in this cradle of the American auto industry. That has meant trouble for the re-election campaign of Democratic Gov. Jennifer Granholm." The Michigan governor's race "serves as a reminder that, for all the attention to scandal and Iraq, the economy remains a factor, particularly in the Midwest, that can sting incumbents of both parties."

Record Number Of Women Could Be Elected To Senate This November. USA Today (10/16, Nichols, 2.27M) reports, "The door to the women's club in the traditionally male-dominated Senate appears to be inching wider. If polls hold true, there will be a record number of women in the Senate next year, up from the current all-time high of 14 -- nine Democrats and five Republicans. … Six female incumbents up for re-election Nov. 7 are leading their challengers, according to the most recent polls. Democrats Dianne Feinstein of California, Debbie Stabenow of Michigan, Maria Cantwell of Washington and Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York hold double-digit leads, as do Republicans Olympia Snowe of Maine and Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas." Polls also "show two more women could join the Senate: In Minnesota, Democrat Amy Klobuchar leads Republican Rep. Mark Kennedy 49%-41%, according to a Mason-Dixon poll from late September. In Missouri, Democrat Claire McCaskill narrowly leads Republican Sen. James Talent, 44%-41%, according to a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken Sept. 27 to Oct. 1."

Republicans Face High Hurdles In Race For DeLay's Old Seat. USA Today/AP (10/16, Stinebaker) reports, "Voting Republican here wasn't difficult when Tom DeLay's name was on the ballot. With DeLay out of the race and the GOP unable by law to substitute a name on the ballot, voters must write in the Republican candidate, Houston City Councilwoman Shelley Sekula Gibbs. That could prove to be such a chore that Democrats might walk away with a seat that has long been in the GOP's hands." The Democratic candidate "is Nick Lampson, 61, a former congressman who has outraised, outspent and campaigned longer than the Republicans."

"Atmospherics" In Northeast Said To Give Democrats Edge In Battle For Congress. Ronald Brownstein writes in the Los Angeles Times (10/16, 918K), "The political equivalent of a nor'easter is bearing down on Republicans from New England through Pennsylvania. With President Bush's approval ratings collapsing across the Northeast, the region presents Democrats an unusually rich concentration of opportunities to capture Republican-held House and Senate seats in the November elections. " The campaign's "atmospherics give Democrats the chance to establish in the region an equivalent to what Republicans have built in the South: an overwhelming regional advantage that anchors their bids for House and Senate majorities. Indeed, if Democrats win most of the House races in play in the Northeast, they will be virtually assured of the net gain of 15 seats nationwide that they need to control the chamber. On the plus side for the GOP, many of the targeted Republicans are strong candidates." Connecticut Rep. Rob Simmons "is an example. He prepared for heavy political weather by diligently promoting local interests, taking generally moderate positions on social issues and seizing chances to show independence from Bush. Simmons and many of the other at-risk Republicans also are fiercely attacking their Democratic opponents."

Republican Lingle Expected To Win Easy Reelection In Democratic Hawaii. The Washington Times (10/16, Pala, 88K) profiles Hawaii Gov. Linda Lingle, who according to many "would be a liberal Democrat" on the mainland. But "in a state that hadn't elected a Republican governor in 40 years, she is expected to be re-elected by such a wide margin that Hawaii's leading Democrats preferred to campaign for other jobs." University of Hawaii political scientist Ira Rohter said, "Lingle is the future of the Republican Party. I think eventually the party will move back to the center, and people like Lingle will take over." The University of Virginia's Larry Sabato "agrees. 'Candidates who succeed despite being from the heavily minority party on average are stronger and with greater talents than those nominated by the majority party,' he said. 'Lingle is a perfect example. Hawaii is such a Democratic bastion that it's amazing any Republican was ever elected statewide, and that she's a heavy favorite for re-election is even more amazing.'"

Bill Clinton Takes Aggressive Message To Campaign Trail. ABC World News (10/15, story 4, 2:10, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "The war figured prominently this weekend as former President Bill Clinton, who has been emerging as his party's most aggressive spokesperson, traveled to Iowa to give a fiery speech attacking the Bush Administration." ABC (Marlantes) added, "With midterm elections just three weeks away, Democrats are playing on Republican turf, boosted by the Mark Foley scandal and worsening conditions in Iraq. ... In the battle for the Senate, Democrats are making serious runs at red states, like Montana, Ohio, Missouri and Virginia. In Tennessee, Democratic Congressman Harold Ford is in a dead heat with Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker, surprising even the candidate. ... Whether Republicans can match the enthusiasm of Democrats…" Clinton: "People are sick of this partisanship. They're sick of the gridlock. They're sick of the selfishness. They're sick of the abuse. They're sick of nothing going on. And they're coming to us in droves." Marlantes: "…may well determine who wins in November."

Clinton's Iowa Stop Carries 2008 Undertones. The Washington Post (10/16, A4, Balz, 748K) says that while Clinton came to Iowa "to rally Democrats three weeks before critical midterm elections," his visit "may have served another purpose as well. Alone among prospective Democratic presidential candidates for 2008, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) has not set foot in the state all year, and the futures market in Clinton political stock here has been suffering." Iowa Democrats said Sen. Clinton's "standing reflects more than her absence. They say there is general unease within the party about her ability to win a general election. Beyond that, some Democrats are troubled by her support for the war in Iraq long after other Democratic politicians...had renounced their votes for the congressional resolution that authorized President Bush to launch the invasion."

The Washington Times (10/16, Pfeiffer, 88K) also says "few doubted that the former president was present as a surrogate" for Sen. Clinton. The ex-president did work in a joking pitch on behalf of his wife. "'I am under no illusions as to why I'm here,' he said. 'You were so desperate for a Democrat with any name recognition at all who isn't running for president that you resorted to the chief caseworker to the junior senator from New York.'"

Hillary Clinton Apologizes To McCain Over Aide's Comments. The Washington Times (10/16, Pierce, 88K) reports, "Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton called Sen. John McCain on Saturday to personally apologize and denounce comments an adviser of hers reportedly made that slammed the Republican senator over his time in captivity in North Vietnam, the New York Post reports." The move "was sparked by a column in the New York Times in which Maureen Dowd quoted an anonymous adviser talking about Mr. McCain's criticism of the Clintons over their North Korea position. The adviser said Team Clinton thought Mr. McCain, Arizona Republican, was doing the White House's dirty work by criticizing the Clintons and ended up 'looking similar to the way he did on those captive tapes from Hanoi, where he recited the names of his crewmates.'" That "was a reference to an unsubstantiated rumor used to malign Mr. McCain, a Vietnam war hero, as off-kilter during the 2000 Republican presidential primary."

2008 Democratic Hopefuls Move To Seize Mantle As The "Anti-Hillary." Newsweek (10/23, Darman, 3.12M) reports in its "Periscope" column that former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner "shocked everyone -- including some of his closest aides -- when he announced he wouldn't seek the presidency in 2008. … After Hillary Clinton, Warner had assembled the largest campaign apparatus of any Dem and secured some of the party's top talent, including media consultant Jim Margolis and strategist Jim Jordan. Aides had been talking up his fund-raising prowess and grass-roots network. But intimates knew that Warner had grown increasingly unsure about the prospect of running since returning from a family vacation to Italy this past summer." Newsweek adds, "Top Dem contenders -- including Clinton -- called to reach out (read: suck up) to Warner after his announcement. Evan Bayh and John Kerry were on the phone with Warner donors within hours; they and others, including John Edwards (and perhaps even Barack Obama and Al Gore), will now move to seize Warner's mantle as the electable anti-Hillary. But Clinton herself may have gained the most from Warner's withdrawal."

Obama Described As A "Liberal," But Not A "Screechy Partisan." In its cover story, headlined "Why Obama Could Be The Next President," Time (10/23, Klein, 4.03M) reports that Sen. Barack Obama "has become an American political phenomenon in what seems about a nanosecond." Obama is "a liberal, but not a screechy partisan. Indeed, he seems obsessively eager to find common ground with conservatives." Time adds, "The question of when Obama -- who has not yet served two years in the U.S. Senate -- will run for President is omnipresent. That he will eventually run, and win, is assumed by almost everyone who comes to watch him speak." Asked if he will think about running for President in 2008 after the 2006 election is over, Obama said, "When the election is over and my book tour is done, I will think about how I can be most useful to the country and how I can reconcile that with being a good dad and a good husband," adding, "I haven't completely decided or unraveled that puzzle yet."

Kerry Says He Deserves Another Chance At Presidency. The AP (10/15) reports Sen. John Kerry "says he deserves a second chance if he decides to take another crack at becoming president." He pointed out that John McCain got "kicked around South Carolina by the same president because he wasn't patriotic enough as a prisoner of war" during the 2000 GOP primaries, and "he's now their leading candidate for president. Richard Nixon seemed to get kicked around pretty badly both running for president and governor, turned around and came back and got elected president."

Berkeley Scholar Urges "Progressives" To Run Positive Campaigns In 2008. In a New York Times (10/16, 1.21M) op-ed, Kevin Sweeney of the University of California Berkeley's Haas School of Business writes, "At this point in the fall campaign, unabashed negativity clogs every media outlet. The stench of foul political advertising is everywhere, and one senses that little will change: Americans once again will hold their noses and vote. For this round, there really isn't much to be done. But looking to the 2008 presidential race, there is still time to find a new way of campaigning -- specifically, for progressive candidates to consider a fresh approach to running for office. Why progressives? Because it's in their interest: pervasive negativity takes a far greater toll on progressive causes than on conservative ones. ... To level the playing field, and restore clarity to progressive values, I propose 'the forward-looking campaign.' The rules are simple. Never mention the opponent. Don't talk about the opponent's policies. Don't question the opponent's character. ... Rather than engaging the opposition, the forward-looking candidate will engage the American people in a conversation about our future."

Mallaby Accuses Bayh Of "Sellout" To Steel Lobby. In his Washington Post (10/16, A21, 748K) column, Sebastian Mallaby writes, "With Mark Warner out of the 2008 Demstakes, the chief anti-Hillary centrist is Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana. This is a depressing commentary on the state of the Democratic Party. Bayh may have cleared his schedule to woo Warner supporters on Thursday. But he has yet to prove himself a real contender -- and he may not be a real centrist, either. Two weeks ago Bayh circulated a preposterous letter to his Senate colleagues. It urged them to oppose what Bayh called 'documented unfair trade' in a type of steel that's used in vehicles. It noted the Commerce Department's finding that lifting the tariff on this steel would lead to dumping by foreign producers. That would hurt U.S. steelmakers, the letter continued; so when the fate of the tariff is considered at a sunset review tomorrow, it should on no account be lifted. This is not a policy that protects workers, as Bayh's letter pretended. It's a sellout to a self-serving lobby. It would help the steel guys at the expense of the car guys, even though the car guys are hurting more and they employ more workers."

"Top Bushies" Like Gingrich For President In 2008. U.S. News and World Report (10/23, Bedard, 2.03M) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column, "Top Bushies tell us that they think" former House Speaker Newt Gingrich "would make a great president. Gingrich thinks big, they say, and represents the old Reagan-style of smaller-government conservatism. As for his past marital infidelity, they think it's a nothing-burger, especially if he faces Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, whose hubby had his own problems she'd rather forget."

Decline Of Election Day Festivities Seen As One Reason For Lower Turnout. The Wall Street Journal (10/16, B1, Crossen, 2.03M) writes that "in the past few decades, less than 40% of eligible voters in the U.S. have bothered to cast ballots in midterm elections. Your forebears would be ashamed. In late-19th-century midterm elections, turnout ranged from 65% to 78%. For presidential elections, almost 80% of the nation's eligible -- rich and poor, educated and illiterate -- voted." In the "early 20th century, turnout began falling precipitously. ... A century ago, a raft of new state laws, supported by leaders across the political spectrum from conservatives to progressives, transformed the idea and act of voting so radically that hundreds of thousands of people dropped out of the political system." A 19th-century voter "could decide to vote on the spur of the moment, pick up a simple ballot from party headquarters and drop it at the poll on Election Day, where his like-minded neighbors would give him a cheer and perhaps a beer. No preregistration was required, no taxes, no proof of residency, literacy or even citizenship. If, like most people then, he was a party man, his vote might earn him a reward. ... Election day was rowdy and festive, a thrilling climax to a political campaign that featured bonfires, barbecues, parades, torchlight rallies and passionate oratory. Politics were social and recreational at a time when there wasn't much other public entertainment."

Strassel Sees Lessons For GOP In Florida And Ohio. In her Wall Street Journal (10/16, A15, 2.03M) column, Kimberly Strassel writes that in Ohio, "Ken Blackwell is trailing his Democratic competitor, Ted Strickland, by double digits," while in Florida, "Charlie Crist is leading his Democratic competitor, Jim Davis, by double digits. ... Their respective failure and success is not ideological: Messrs. Blackwell and Crist are both running on the same agenda of tax cuts, fiscal responsibility and broad government reform. This, instead, is a story of the state parties behind them. In Florida, Republicans have spent the past eight years keeping their promises to voters; in Ohio the GOP forgot what 'promise' meant somewhere in the '90s. The tale of these two GOPs offers broader lessons for congressional Republicans, who are facing a rout this fall." If voters "are unhappy with Republicans, it's because the party hasn't lived up to its own principles. In the Capitol, in Ohio, and in plenty of places between and beyond, the party that promised to reform government has become the party of government."

Administration Says Study Of Iraqi Civilian Deaths Was Timed To Hurt GOP. Newsweek (10/23, 3.12M) reports in its "Periscope" column, "Iraqi doctors who helped compile the latest survey on civilian fatalities since 2003 came close to becoming statistics themselves. The survey, conducted jointly by Johns Hopkins, MIT and Baghdad's Al Mustansiriya University, said 600,000 Iraqis have died violently since just before the U.S. invasion (31 percent killed by Coalition troops; the rest in sectarian violence). President George W. Bush recently put the figure at 30,000; other estimates have ranged up to 300,000." The survey figure, "disputed by some researchers as too high (the Iraqi Health Ministry itself cites 150,000 dead), represents about 2.5 percent of Iraq's population -- more than 15,000 fatalities a month. … Administration officials said the study, published in the medical journal The Lancet, was timed to hurt the GOP in the midterm election."

NYTimes Criticizes Candidate For Refusing Debates. The New York Times (10/16, 1.21M) writes in an editorial, "This year in New York, when it comes to debates, the magic number seems to be two. Senator Hillary Clinton, who refused to debate her primary opponent at all, has agreed to two debates with John Spencer, the Republican former mayor of Yonkers. The Democratic front-runner for governor, Eliot Spitzer, agreed to two debates with the Republican candidate, John Faso. The Democratic candidate to succeed Mr. Spitzer as attorney general, Andrew Cuomo, agreed to appear at two debates with Jeanine Pirro, the Republican former Westchester County district attorney, but seems likely to sit out a third already agreed to by Ms. Pirro. We'd like to see more." The Times adds, "The real disappointment this year, however, is the Democratic state comptroller, Alan Hevesi, who is refusing debates altogether."

Authors Say Critics Of Religious Right Soft On "Religious Left." In a USA Today (10/16, 2.27M) op-ed, "In Defense of the Religious Right" author Patrick Hynes and "In Defense of Hypocrisy" author Jeremy Lott write, "The religious right has been demonized for pursuing a political agenda aligned with its beliefs. When the religious left acts in kind, shouldn't the same scrutiny be applied to its progressive push? ... In our political tradition, most evangelicals and other conservative Christians today are really moderates. They want a government that is non-sectarian without being hostile to organized religion and people of faith. That's a whole lot closer to what the Founders had in mind than the officially godless public square advocated by the American Civil Liberties Union. ... Critics are out of line for lambasting the religious right for advocating their beliefs, and they'd be just as wrong blasting the religious left. Yet for liberal and secular pundits, this has been a one-way street. It's time to give the 'Theocracy!' catcalls a rest."

NYTimes Says Discretion Of Religious Institutions Has Gone Too Far. The New York Times (10/16, 1.21M) editorializes, "Religious institutions should be protected from excessive intrusion by government. Judges should not tell churches who they have to hire as ministers, or meddle in doctrinal disputes. But under pressure from politically influential religious groups, Congress, the White House, and federal and state courts have expanded this principle beyond all reason. It is increasingly being applied to people, buildings and programs only tangentially related to religion. In its expanded form, this principle amounts to an enormous subsidy for religion, in some cases violating the establishment clause of the First Amendment."

Bush Declares Emergency In Snow-Hit New York. NBC Nightly News (10/15, story 7, 0:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "The President late today issued a state of emergency for parts of New York following the record early snow storm there. The two feet of snow that fell in western New York still has officials scrambling to return power to some 300,000 residents. Schools will be closed tomorrow and it could take most of the week for electricity to be restored."

No Deaths Reported In Major Hawaii Earthquake. NBC Nightly News (10/15, lead story, 3:00, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) led with the "major earthquake that shook the Big Island. ... The epicenter was near the town of Kailua-Kona, damaging buildings, knocking out power, even trapping some people in elevators. Remarkably, authorities say no deaths have been reported." ABC World News (10/15, lead story, 2:00, Harris, 8.78M) also led with the earthquake.

Ex-President Ford Spends Fourth Night In Hospital. ABC World News (10/15, story 6, 0:20, Harris, 8.78M) reported ex-President Gerald Ford "is spending a fourth night in the hospital tonight. Mr. Ford, who is 93 years old, was admitted to a hospital near his home in California on Thursday for tests. It is his fourth time in the hospital this year."

Evidence Said To Suggest Administration Was Manipulating North Korea Intelligence. In its cover story, Newsweek (10/23, Hirsh, Liu, Wehrfritz, 3.12M) reports, "There is some evidence that the Bush administration was seeking to manipulate intelligence on North Korea. During a visit to Pyongyang by lead negotiator James Kelly in October 2002, he presented what U.S. officials described as 'proof' that the North had a secret uranium-enrichment program, undercutting Clintonite claims that Kim was adhering to a pledge not to advance his nuclear program. Bush officials later said the North Koreans had confessed. But diplomats now say that was a translation error. (Kelly could not be reached for comment.) While Kim was clearly violating the spirit of his '94 agreement by secretly importing centrifuge equipment, US intelligence sources tell NEWSWEEK that their monitors in the region have never detected telltale emissions from any centrifuges."

North Korean Nuke Test Pressures Neighbors To Consider Going Nuclear. U.S. News and World Report (10/23, Omestad, 2.03M) reports, "Last week's announced test explosion of an atomic bomb deep inside a North Korean mountain tunnel heralds an ominous new era in northeast Asia. … If the seismic event detected around the world is confirmed as a nuclear blast…the impoverished, hunger-ridden North will have managed to join the elite global club of declared nuclear powers. In the amoral logic of nuclear weapons, that may well confer more staying power to the hard-line regime. And it will put more pressure on its neighbors-especially Japan and South Korea-to eventually consider going nuclear."

Time (10/23, Powell, 4.03M) reports, "As crude as the North Korean blast was, it punctuated a scary fact: the rules that governed the nuclear road during the cold war and its immediate aftermath have become irrelevant, replaced by the law of the jungle -- every state, rogue or otherwise, for itself. The risk now, says former Clinton Administration Defense Department official Graham Allison, is the emergence of a more dangerous nuclear age. … What we have now is not a tight club of nuclear powers with interlocking interests and an appreciation for the brutal doctrine of 'mutually assured destruction' but an unpredictable host of potential Bomb throwers: a Stalinist Bomb out of unstable North Korea; a Shi'ite Bomb out of Iran; a Sunni Bomb out of Pakistan; and, down the road, possibly out of Egypt and Saudi Arabia as well; and, of course, an al-Qaeda Bomb out of nowhere. Israel is a nuclear power already. And Turkey may just decide it had better be too. Even Japan and South Korea could eventually move toward the Bomb, if they feel the US nuclear umbrella begins to fray in East Asia."

In its cover story, Newsweek (10/23, Hirsh, Liu, Wehrfritz, 3.12M) reports, "The gravest danger going forward is proliferation to like-minded regimes, especially to Iran. Despite the lack of any common goal…the two countries are closer to being an actual 'axis' than they were when Bush launched the phrase in January 2002. And if Pyongyang is seen as getting away with its nuclear test, some Iranian officials indicate they may raise their own demands for a nuclear program. That's partly why [Secretary of State Condoleezza] Rice is traveling to Asia and Russia in a new diplomatic offensive this week: she will link North Korea and Iran together once again, arguing that as nuclear offenders they should be made outcasts, the new slavers of the 21st century."

North Korean Test Could Unravel System Of Global Nuclear Controls. U.S. News and World Report (10/23, Omestad, 2.03M) reports, "If North Korea's regime can survive the forthcoming sanctions, the lesson for suspected nuclear wannabes like Iran could be that a breakout is manageable. North Korea could begin the unraveling of the entire system of global nuclear controls. Another worry: Will a cash-strapped North sell nuclear materials to another country or a terrorist group? With that in mind, the Bush administration wants to improve technical capabilities to recognize the 'fingerprint' of any bomb from North Korea."

Rice, Bolton Defend North Korea Sanctions Plan. NBC Nightly News (10/15, story 5, 2:15, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "The showdown with North Korea over nuclear weapons: With UN sanctions now in place, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will head to China looking for help in making those sanctions stick." NBC (Jordan) added, "The Bush Administration believes that those sanctions will be enforced but already it's getting some advice on how to make sure that does happen. Top White House officials took to the airwaves to tout the UN Security Council's vote punishing North Korea." John Bolton, US Ambassador to the UN (from "Meet The Press"): "The guts of the resolution are sweeping sanctions against North Korea's nuclear, chemical, and biological weapons programs and their ballistic missile program." Jordan: "But they also warned that the sanctions won't work unless China, North Korea's neighbor and ally, enforces them." Bolton (from "This Week"): "China itself now has an obligation to make sure that it complies with the resolution. And it has full national authority on its side of the border to conduct any inspections it wants." Jordan: "China says it won't inspect cargo entering or leaving North Korea for military contraband, a key part of the resolution, out of fear that destabilize the government of Kim Jong Il and send a tidal wave of refugees into China. But today, the Secretary of State was upbeat." Secretary Rice (from "Face The Nation"): "I think that you're going to find China carrying out its responsibilities, undoubtedly carrying it out in a way that it believes will not enhance conflict."

ABC World News (10/15, story 2, 2:20, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "The United Nations has put in place tough, unprecedented sanctions designed to punish North Korea for its apparent test of a nuclear weapon one week ago. Now, as North Korea remains defiant, the priority for the White House is to make sure those sanctions are actually enforced." ABC

(Yang) added, "As President Bush returned to the White House from Camp David this afternoon, his top advisors were savoring this weekend's unanimous vote at the United Nations imposing tough economic sanctions on North Korea." And the "incoming UN Secretary-General told ABC News a meeting with North Korean leader Kim Jong-Il would be a 'good opportunity,' but only as part of regional talks including China, Russia, Japan and South Korea." The Washington Times (10/16, DeBose, 88K) reports Rice and Bolton "said they expected China to enforce sanctions unanimously passed by the U.N. Security Council to curtail North Korea's pursuit of nuclear weapons."

Bolton said on NBC's Meet the Press (10/15), "I think President Bush has made it very clear that he wants to have a peaceful and diplomatic solution to the problem posed by North Korea's continuing pursuit of nuclear weapons and delivery systems. That's part of the reason why we've pushed for these very strong sanctions in the Security Council, to deprive North Korea of the ability to continue its nuclear weapons and other programs of weapons of mass destruction." And on CNN's Late Edition (10/15), Bolton said, "When we introduced our text for the council to consider on Monday, it didn't include at that point authorization to use force. So that was never part of our plan for this resolution, which was to impose sanctions largely against North Korea's programs of weapons of mass destruction."

Rice was asked on CBS' Face the Nation (10/15) how the UN resolution will be enforced. Rice said, "It is a mandatory resolution under Chapter 7. And it is a 15-0 vote. And that is a remarkable evolution, particularly for China, which has had a very close relationship with North Korea. And I just think it shows how really angry the world is with North Korea for doing this and how concerned. It will be enforced because member states have an obligation to enforce it. I think there are some matters that will need to be worked out." Rice said on Fox News Sunday (10/15), "I understand that people are concerned about how it might work so that it doesn't enhance tensions in the region, and we're perfectly willing to have those conversations, but China signed on to this resolution. It voted for this resolution. It is a Chapter 7 mandatory resolution, and so I'm quite certain that China is going to live up to its responsibilities. But you cannot underestimate how big a blow it is to North Korea to have all of the neighbors now, including what has been its strongest supporter, China, fully united behind sanctions against its nuclear program."

The Wall Street Journal (10/16, King, Ramstad, 2.03M) reports Rice "will head to Asia tomorrow to try to enlist Chinese and South Korean help in further isolating the North, while reassuring Japan that its alliance with the U.S. is stronger than ever." A "fundamental disagreement remains between China, Russia and South Korea and other countries, such as the U.S. and Japan, over how tough to be on the North and its leader, Kim Jong Il. For one thing, neighbors such as South Korea and China worry they'll pay the price of a refugee crisis if the Kim regime collapses. Some are already resisting key terms of the U.N. sanction."

USA Today (10/16, 2.27M) reports Rice said the sanctions "might not be strong enough to persuade North Korea to return to negotiations on halting its nuclear program. 'There may be other steps that will be necessary, given North Korea's behavior,' she said. The U.N. sanctions were not tough enough for Japan. It imposed penalties of its own, including a ban on all North Korean imports. Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said Japan could take further action."

The Financial Times (10/16, Kirchgaessner, Fifield) reports the US "said on Sunday it expected China to play a decisive role in enforcing sanctions against North Korea, brushing aside suggestions that Beijing was not committed to a United Nations resolution against its reclusive ally."

The Washington Post (10/16, A15, Kessler, 748K) reports, "China's unwillingness to act against its longtime ally raises the stakes" for Rice's "diplomatic mission to Northeast Asia later this week. Ever since the current nuclear crisis with North Korea began in 2002, the Bush administration has relied heavily on China to use its influence with North Korea's leaders. But Beijing's caution has frequently disappointed U.S. officials."

The New York Times (10/16, Onishi, 1.21M) reports, "A day after the Council unanimously passed the resolution, following nearly a week of intensive diplomatic negotiations, the South Korean government said it would still pursue economic projects with North Korea, including an industrial zone and tourist resort in the North. Those projects are not explicitly covered by the Security Council resolution, but they are an important source of hard currency for the North."

Bolton Says China Is Obliged To Comply With UN Resolution. Bolton said on ABC's This Week (10/15) that China "has an obligation to make sure it complies with the resolution, and it has full national authority on its side of the border to conduct any inspections it wants. We'll see what actually comes out of Beijing, perhaps when Secretary Rice is there next week. But let's be clear, China voted in favor of that provision." Bolton added, "I think that China has got a heavy responsibility here, and I must say, you know, this test by the North Koreans had to have been humiliating to China. After all of the efforts they have made over the years to protect North Korea from international approbation, for the North Koreans in the face of all that to test had to get quite a reaction in Beijing, and I think we're still seeing that play out." Bolton said on NBC's Meet the Press (10/15) that China "voted in favor of this resolution, which is under Chapter 7 of the UN charter, and therefore binding on them. So I don't think there's any reason to believe that they're not going to abide by the terms of the resolution. And the guts of the resolution are sweeping sanctions against North Korea's nuclear, chemical and biological weapons programs and their ballistic missile program." The AP (10/15, Klug) reports on Bolton's comments on China.

UN's Ban Says North Korean Response "Very Worrisome." The Washington Post (10/16, Weymouth, 748K) discussed the North Korea situation with UN Secretary General-Designate Ban Ki Moon, who said "North Korea has declared very defiantly that if the Security Council adopts any sanctions, they will regard this as a declaration of war. This is very worrisome and shows total disrespect of the United Nations. ... I think that I would be in a much better position than any other previous secretary general -- as I come from Korea and have experience. I will try to coordinate with the concerned parties. If necessary, I will take my own initiative, which will include visiting North Korea and meeting with North Korean leaders." USA Today (10/16, Slavin, 2.27M) profiles Ban.

Warner Says Bush, Bolton, Rice Did A "Wonderful Job" On UN Resolution. Sen. John Warner said on CBS' Face the Nation (10/15) that President Bush "and his team of Rice and Bolton did a wonderful job here. First place, it's unanimous. All came together. That has enormous symbolism all through Asia that everybody came together on this and stood. Now, as to the provisions, she's going over to work them out. But that question you asked about China and its reluctance on the border, and here's my answer to it. China is seeking world recognition, trying to emerge as a power and a strong voice. This is their test. China supplies over 60 percent of the energy and food to North Korea. They have got tremendous leverage through that. South Korea itself has got a program called open sunshine and so forth. They're trading. Those two nations should be out in the lead, and I think the president and the secretary have struck a correct balance."

Kerry, Levin, Hagel Criticize UN Resolution. Sen. John Kerry said on Fox News Sunday (10/15), "These sanctions are not the bold, tough sanctions that the secretary talked about. China walked out of there and said we voted for it, but we're not going to enforce the cross-border mechanism, it's too dangerous for our region. So you have sanctions that are just, by statement of those involved, not going to do the job." Asked what he would do differently, Kerry said, "I would do precisely what I said for the last five years consistently, which is engage in bilateral, face-to-face negotiations with North Korea, make it absolutely clear to North Korea that we are not intending to invade and have a regime change, and work on the entire set of issues that are outstanding since the armistice with regard to the north."

Sen. Carl Levin said on CNN's Late Edition (10/15) that Bolton "thinks the UN resolution is a strong resolution. I'm afraid it's not. I wish it were. But the Chinese already said that they're not going to enforce inspections against goods going into North Korea without total Chinese support. There's no way a sanction regime can work. And then, near the end, he said that, well, we have no problem sitting down with the North Koreans, just one-on-one; well, we've done that. I really have got to tell you, I am utterly amazed to hear our UN ambassador say that, when just a few months ago, the President repeated what he has said over and over again. And here's the way the president the way put it. He said 'One thing I'm not going to let us do is get caught in the trap of sitting at a table alone with the North Koreans.' Now, it's incredible to me that our ambassador would make the representation that he did on your show."

Sen. Chuck Hagel said on CNN's Late Edition (10/15), "We do need to engage the North Koreans, as we need to engage the Iranians and the Syrians. A UN sanctions resolution is fine. It is limited. As Carl said, it is weak. We heard on your program about 15 minutes ago what the Chinese ambassador said. Essentially he said we're not interested in enforcing that resolution. And China is the most important country in dealing with the North Koreans, with that sanction, because they share a 900-mile border. But the United States must, now, find a resolution to this issue. We're not going to resolve the issue with North Korea through a sanction."

Nunn Says Sanctions Are "Timely" And "Substantive." Former Sen. Sam Nunn said on CBS' Face

the Nation (10/15), "I think the sanctions are timely and I believe they're substantive. And I believe the fact that there was unanimous agreement here is enormously important. … I also think we ought to continue to have the goal of getting rid of all nuclear weapons on the Korean peninsula. I believe that China is the key, as has already been observed here. I think it would be a real breakthrough if the United States and China and South Korea all got on the same wavelength for a change. We have not been approaching this with any kind of unity for the last three or four years. And that has been, I think, a very detrimental aspect of trying to deal with North Korea."

US Uses North Korea Sanctions To Warn Iran. The AP (10/15, Klug) says the US "used new U.N. sanctions against North Korea to warn Iran, another country with nuclear ambitions." UN Ambassador John Bolton said Iran "should pay attention to Saturday's U.N. resolution against North Korea for its claimed nuclear test last week."

The New York Times (10/16, Weisman, 1.21M) reports the Bush Administration "appears to have made some headway in using new American legal tools to cut off both North Korea and Iran from the international financial system. The American campaign to use its own financial regulations to put pressure on North Korea and Iran has been a mix of implicit threats backed by explicit action, American officials and banking experts say." Over the past year, US officials "have met with many private banks overseas to warn them of the risk of doing business with certain Iranian and North Korean trading companies and businesses that the United States says have been tied to terrorist groups or to the spread of nuclear materials."

Chinese Public Reportedly Angered By North Korean Test. USA Today (10/16, MacLeod, 2.27M) reports that by "claiming to test a nuclear device, North Korea has set off a wave of anger among ordinary Chinese, who appear split about whether blame lies with North Korea or the United States. In the streets and online, Chinese responded to last week's announcement out of Pyongyang with fear. Many said a nuclear-armed North Korea meant less security for China and East Asia. They called into question China's historic role as North Korea's ally and patron. Others suggested North Korea is right to arm itself in response to U.S. and Japanese threats against it."

Princeton Scholar Says Cash Cutoff Only Way To Get Kim To Back Down. In a Washington Post (10/16, A21, 748K), op-ed, Aaron L. Friedberg of Princeton University's Woodrow Wilson School writes, "Though the hour is late and the odds long, there is still a chance that North Korean dictator Kim Jong Il can be persuaded to give up his nuclear arsenal." Kim "is a cynical realist and will not exchange his nuclear capabilities for empty acts of diplomatic deference or what he would doubtless regard as mere scraps of paper." Kim is a "cunning and rational strategist with one overriding objective: ensuring his own survival by maintaining an absolute grip on power. The only way to move him is by confronting him with a stark choice -- turn over existing nuclear weapons, dismantle production facilities and submit to rigorous international inspections, or face a steadily rising risk of overthrow and untimely death. This demand can be sweetened with promises of aid and peace pacts, but in the end Kim needs to be presented with an offer he cannot refuse. ... Choking off the flow of dollars to Pyongyang would do more than cramp Kim's lavish lifestyle; it would threaten his grip on power."

Olmert Says Prisoner Release Demand Preventing Talks With Abbas. The AP (10/16, Lavie) reports Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "said a planned summit with [Palestinian President] Mahmoud Abbas has been put on hold because of [his] insistence that Israel release large numbers of Palestinian prisoners." The AP calls that condition "the latest setback for U.S.-led efforts to restart peace talks." Tel Aviv "insists that before it frees any of the estimated 8,000 Palestinians it is holding, a soldier captured in June by Hamas-linked militants in a cross-border raid must be returned." However, one Palestinian lawmaker who is close to Abbas said preparations remain on track." The AP also notes, "disagreements over prisoners and a summit are not the main impediments to diplomatic progress. Internal Palestinian and Israeli political turmoil and control of the Palestinian government by the extremist Islamic group Hamas are larger obstacles in the way of US efforts toward peace talks, which have been stalled for six years."

Police Recommend Rape Charge Against Israeli President. The AP (10/16, Federman) reports, "Police recommended Sunday that Israeli President Moshe Katsav be charged with rape, sexual assault and fraud, the most serious charges ever to face an Israeli leader." The recommendation "came at a meeting between police investigators and Attorney General Meni Mazuz. The final decision on whether to put the president on trial is up to Mazuz." Katsav "has denied all wrongdoing."

The New York Times (10/16, Myre, 1.21M) reports, "Although the case has received widespread coverage in Israel, any charges against Mr. Katsav are not likely to have broader political ramifications. Israel's president is expected to serve as a unifying force and set a moral tone, but his position is more symbolic than substantive."

Darfur Refugees Say Peacekeepers Not Protecting Them. The Washington Post/AP (10/16, A15, De Montesquiou) reports, "Refugees living in camps scattered across this region of western Sudan say an African Union peacekeeping mission has done little to protect them, even as rising violence is driving away crucial humanitarian aid. … As they often must, the peacekeepers explained to camp delegates that they were in Darfur only to monitor the violence and had no mandate to fight it."

WPost Says Arab Deployment Could Have Positive Effect On Darfur Crisis. The Washington Post (10/16, A20, 748K) editorializes, "Americans, Europeans and Africans have all tried to bring about a political settlement between Sudan's government and Darfur's rebels. These various efforts have combined to slow the killing, though they have failed to halt it. But the Western and African efforts stand in stark contrast to the performance of Sudan's Arab neighbors, which have so far done next to nothing. Recently the Arab League asserted that this might change. … Depending on the details of its design, an Arab force could be an acceptable alternative." The Post adds, "It's hard to see how Sudan's government could resist an Arab and Muslim peacekeeping force by calling it a threat to Islam. Arab leaders have a good chance of deploying their proposed force if they press for it seriously. So the important question will be: Are the Arabs in fact serious?"

Ecuadorian Tycoon Leads Presidential Race Ahead Of Runoff. The Wall Street Journal (10/16, DeCordoba, 2.03M) reports wealthy banana magnate Alvaro Noboa "had 27% of the vote" in Ecuador's presidential election, while Rafael Correa, "an admirer of [Venezuelan President Hugo] Chavez," had 22%. Although the vote count was only half complete, exit polls predicted a Noboa victory of several points. "The results mark a setback for Mr. Chavez, who was hoping an outright win by his political ally would extend his influence in the Andean region." The Journal notes, "Analysts said the results could give the pro-U.S., pro-markets Mr. Noboa, who has run twice before and lost races for the presidency, the edge to win the second round of the vote, scheduled for Nov 26." The winner of that election will become Ecuador's eighth president since 1996.

The New York Times (10/16, Romero, 1.21M) adds Noboa's "strong showing came as something of a surprise. In the final days of the campaign, [he] said he would limit political ties to Venezuela and fiercely criticized Mr. Correa's positions. He has also said he is strongly in favor of negotiating a trade agreement with the United States." The Washington Post (10/16, A15, Forero, 748K) and Los Angeles Times (10/16, Kraul, 918K), among other newspapers, run similar reports this morning.

British Communities Minister Backs Firing Woman For Wearing Veil. The Washington Post/AP (10/16, A17, Wagner) reports British Minister of State for Communities and Local Government Phil Woolas "has joined an increasingly bitter debate about the rights of Muslim women to veil their faces, saying a teaching assistant should be fired for insisting on wearing one in school." Woolas "was quoted by the Sunday Mirror newspaper as demanding that Aishah Azmi, a Muslim, be fired for refusing to remove her veil at work. 'She should be sacked. She has put herself in a position where she can't do her job,' Woolas said." The AP notes, "The debate on the veils began this month when" House of Commons Leader Jack Straw "said Muslim women visiting his office should remove them," and later the Conservative Party "weighed in, with one of the party's top officials accusing Muslim leaders of encouraging a 'voluntary apartheid' that could help spawn homegrown terrorism." Recently, Prime Minister Tony Blair "praised Straw for raising the issue 'in a measured and considered way,' and he urged Britons to engage the topic without 'becoming hysterical.'"

Video Suggests Chinese Troops Were Not Threatened By Tibetan Refugees. The New York Times (10/16, Kahn, 1.21M) reports, "A Romanian videotape that appears to show Chinese security forces shooting two Tibetan refugees in the Himalayas contradicts Beijing's claim that the refugees were shot when soldiers acted in self-defense." While Beijing has "acknowledged" the shootings, state media claimed "the soldiers acted only after about 70 refugees seeking to enter Nepal illegally from China attacked border troops." The Times notes, "The Sept. 30 incident was first reported by mountaineers in Nepal and was circulated by human rights groups, including the International Campaign for Tibet and Human Rights in China." Human rights groups provided witnesses who claim "that those who had been fired upon included monks, women and children and that the person who had been killed was a 25-year-old Tibetan Buddhist nun." The Chinese Foreign Ministry has "vowed to investigate." The Times adds, "The video does not offer a comprehensive account. It was shot from a long distance — the narrator says the cameraman was more than half a mile away — and only a few faces are clearly identifiable. But it does suggest that the shootings were not in direct response to an attack on soldiers."

Prominent Chinese Human Rights Activist Charged With Subversion. The New York Times (10/16, Kahn, 1.21M) notes Chinese authorities "have charged a prominent human rights lawyer with inciting subversion, part of a crackdown on people who have sought to use China's nascent legal system to limit the power of the state." According to his lawyer, Gao Zhisheng "was taken into custody in mid-August and was formally arrested Sept. 21, but the police only recently made clear the nature of the charge." Gao's lawyer "said the police had not allowed him to visit [him] because they said his case involved state secrets." The Times says an eventual indictment of Gao "could be one of the highest-profile prosecutions of an internationally recognized dissident in recent years." Gao "represented displaced homeowners, victims of official corruption and religious rights advocates, including members of the Falun Gong sect," and recently "has become one of the most outspoken dissidents within China, writing frequent essays and polemics posted on the Internet that have sharply criticized the authorities and have predicted that the governing Communist Party will collapse because of corruption and abuse of power."

WSJournal Defends Trade With China. The Wall Street Journal (10/16, 2.03M) editorializes, "Everyone seems to agree that China's leverage will be crucial if the world is going to contain North Korea's nuclear threat. Which is one more reason to congratulate Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson, who recently prevented a U.S.-China blowup by persuading Chuck Schumer and Lindsey Graham to drop a Senate vote on their 27.5% tariff bill against China." Sens. Schumer and Graham are "so very wrong to consider the trade deficit with China a threat to U.S. prosperity," because the "$200 billion trade deficit with China is itself a meaningless hobgoblin, mattering far less than the volume of trade." Although imports of Chinese goods "have more than doubled (up 155%) since 2000," exports to China "have climbed even faster, tripling since 2000," proving, the Times says, that, "if China is adopting currency policies to repel U.S. goods, they aren't working too well." The United States has "gained" a "surge in low-priced, high quality consumer products," including "apparel, footwear, consumer electronics, computer equipment, and so on -- all of which Americans have bought voluntarily. Arguably the biggest beneficiary of China's emergence on the world trading stage has been America's poor, who have new access to bargain-priced consumer goods." Saying that China has not held "the yuan artificially low relative to the dollar," the Times says "this is not a 'manipulation' of its exchange rate so much as it is a contracting out of its monetary system to the U.S. Federal Reserve Board." The Times notes the "greatest Chinese danger to the U.S. economy" is China's "undeveloped and politically controlled financial system," and the Administration "should be urging Beijing to privatize its banking sector, capital markets and state owned enterprises." The Times concludes, "The U.S. wants and should expect Beijing's cooperation on nuclear proliferation and North Korea; it shouldn't waste its influence on such non-problems as expanding two-way trade."

Venezuela's Bid For Security Council Seat Generates Commentary. In his column in the Washington Post (10/16, A21, 748K), Jackson Diehl says of Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez's bid for a non-permanent seat on the UN Security Council, "There's a fair chance he'll lose." A failure by Venezuela or Guatemala to garner 122 votes in the General Assembly on the first ballot will likely lead to the election of a third candidate. "If so it will be a wounding rebuff for Chavez following his Bush-as-devil tirade before the assembly last month, and one that could hurt him in another vote, if it is free and fair: his bid for reelection as president in December." A loss in today's UN ballot "would save the Bush administration from embarrassment and spare the Security Council a nuisance factor. Still, there won't be much to celebrate." Diehl says the fact that Chavez "could even come close" to winning "is testimony to how low U.S. prestige has sunk around the world. More specifically, it's a measure of how twisted U.S. relations with Latin America have become -- and also, how fragile the appeal of democratic values is in that region." Several Latin American countries are making clear "that they value Venezuela's investment in their economies more than preventing nuclear proliferation…; that solidarity with a neighbor matters more than solidarity with other democracies (probably the only votes for Venezuela in the free world will come from Latin America and the Caribbean); that their governments prefer a weaker United States to a chastened Hugo Chavez." In addition, Diehl says, the vote "underlines the continuing fecklessness of the Bush administration's approach to Latin America. There is its overreliance on faithful but small allies in Central America and its inability to come to terms with the region's giant, Brazil. There is its heavy-handed lobbying, which prompted Guatemala's foreign minister to say that he wished Washington 'would not promote our cause so much.' Most disturbing, there is the inability to win support from a nominally close ally such as Chile, even against an autocratic demagogue. Chavez may lose the U.N. vote, but in the contest for Latin America, the United States isn't winning."

Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (10/16, 2.03M) editorializes, "To understand why so many Americans dislike the U.N., consider that Venezuela, of all countries, stands a chance today of being elected" to the Security Council today. "The world's democracies in North and Central America, Europe and Asia are lining up behind Guatemala. In Latin America, Colombia and Mexico are also backing Guatemala, while Argentina and Brazil are supporting Venezuela," and "the left-of-center government in Chile is on the fence, no doubt alarmed by Mr. Chávez but also fearful of crossing him." The Journal concludes, "If Mr. Chávez wins, we'll know that most U.N. members prefer anti-American posturing to a credible Security Council."

NYTimes Lauds Selection Of Pamuk For Literature Nobel. In an editorial, the New York Times (10/16, 1.21M) says Turkish novelist Orhan Pamuk's Nobel Prize in Literature "is richly deserved. It was awarded for a body of work, fiction and nonfiction, that is driven by the conscience of imagination as well as the conscience of memory." While "Islamists and Turkish nationalists tend to think of Mr. Pamuk as a literary provocateur, especially for his brief but candid remarks about the Armenian genocide quoted in a Swiss magazine last year," the Times says Pamuk "was speaking the truth. For the sake of art and conscience, he has resisted any effort to quiet his literary voice." The choice of Pamuk "will be a popular one," and "his prize is also a reminder of how often the Nobel has been given to a writer whose work exposes the tension between the state and the artist. We read Mr. Pamuk's books as they should be read — for the imaginative and linguistic pleasure in them — seldom remembering that every artist's freedom to speak is our freedom, too. This prize helps us remember that."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Attorney Stewart Faces Sentencing In Terror Case. The New York Times (10/16, Preston) reports, "Lynne F. Stewart, the firebrand lawyer known for defending unsavory criminals, now faces the possibility of living out her life like many of them, in maximum-security lockdown in a federal prison. … Today, 20 months after she was convicted on terror charges, Ms. Stewart and two co-defendants who were convicted of conspiring with her will be sentenced in Federal District Court in Manhattan. Prosecutors, arguing that Ms. Stewart repeatedly flouted the law to aid the violent designs of an imprisoned terrorist client, have asked Judge John G. Koeltl to condemn her to 30 years in prison. … That would be a life sentence for Ms. Stewart, who turned 67 last week. Long an abrasive advocate of anti-government causes, these days she is not defiant. She is mournful about what she said were her failures as a lawyer." The Times adds, "Her dread of prison deepened unexpectedly, Ms. Stewart said, during the long period after a jury found her guilty on Feb. 10, 2005, of providing material aid to terrorism. She has recently recovered from breast cancer, but fears it will return in prison. … And if the judge comes down hard, she could be held in solitary confinement with limited visits, the same conditions as Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman, the terrorist she was convicted of aiding."

The New York Sun (10/16, Goldstein) reports that Stewart "and her allies are pinning their hopes for leniency on a strategy that argues she became so emotionally involved in the sheik's case that she acted irrationally — a strategy that is underpinned by a sealed letter to the court from a psychiatrist." The Sun continues, "A psychiatric report submitted to the federal judge in Manhattan who will decide the sentence, John Koeltl, claims that several emotional events in Stewart's life suggest her actions were motivated by 'human factors of her client and his situation' and not by politics, according to portions of the psychiatric report. … The psychiatrist, Steven Teich, points to 11 emotional events that he claims prompted her to want to take action on Abdel Rahman's behalf, Stewart's attorneys say. Among the events that make Dr.Teich's list are her experiences seeing Abdel Rahman incarcerated and the 1995 suicide of a drug defendant named Dominick Maldonado, whom Stewart had once represented. … While the evaluation by Dr. Teich is filed under seal, Stewart's attorneys quote portions of it at length in public legal papers."

Specter's Role In Crafting Detainee Bill Agreement Disputed. The Washington Post (10/16, A19, Smith, 748K) reports, "The last-minute maneuvering before the Sept. 28 vote [on the detainee bill] remains a hot topic of debate among lobbyists, lawmakers and staff members. They are wondering if [GOP Sen. Arlen] Specter, as several Judiciary Committee staff members privately asserted at the time, was pressured into discarding a less extreme and more politically palatable amendment at the Bush administration's request, in favor of an alternative more likely to be defeated. Specter says that he was not ... Questions about Specter's role in the last-minute maneuvering arose in part because he had taken a maverick position before -- and then backed President Bush's policy on the floor or in his votes."

WPost Weighs In On Treason Charges Against Gadahn. The Washington Post (10/16, A20, 748K) editorializes on the treason charges against Adam Gadahn. The "first such charge in decades marks a significant change of course. Instead of causing him to disappear into military custody, as it did with Mr. Hamdi, the government is following a road explicitly laid out in the Constitution. Broadly speaking, this is a constructive development. Unlike the murky terrain governing the holding of American citizens as enemy combatants, treason is defined in the Constitution. So there's no doubt as to the government's authority to pursue its case or the propriety of doing so. … Yet treason charges could come to pose civil liberties concerns of their own. The Constitution cannot, by definition, be unconstitutional -- yet its definition of treason is so broad and vague that, were it merely written in statute, it would probably be so."

FBI Believes High-Level Al Qaeda Suspect Could Be In UK. The (UK) Sun (10/16) reports, "An al-Qaeda general believed to be plotting dirty bomb attacks on seven US cities could be in Britain, FBI sources said yesterday. Adnan El Shukrijumah, who has a £2.5million bounty on his head, is suspected of planning a spectacular attack using bombs that spread radioactive waste. The FBI are investigating the 31-year-old Saudi-born scientist's UK links," and "a US source said: 'He has travelled extensively in the last seven years, and we believe this includes the UK.'"

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Coast Guard's Great Lakes Antiterrorism Plan Sparks Controversy. The New York Times (10/16, Davey, 1.21M) reports, "Even in autumn, the cold, silent expanse of Lake Michigan defines this town, where pleasure boats glide into harbor, fishermen wait patiently for salmon and tourists peer up at the lighthouse." But "the United States Coast Guard has a new mission for the waters off of these quiet shores. For the first time, Coast Guard officials want to mount machine guns routinely on their cutters and small boats here and around all five of the Great Lakes as part of a program addressing the threats of terrorism after Sept. 11." Also, "for the first time in memory, Coast Guard members plan to use a stretch of water at least five miles off this Michigan shore -- and 33 other offshore spots near cities like Cleveland; Rochester; Milwaukee; Duluth, Minn.; and Gary, Ind. -- as permanent, live fire shooting zones for training on their new 7.62 mm weapons, which can blast as many as 650 rounds a minute and send fire more than 4,000 yards." The Times adds, "The notion is so unusual that it prompted United States diplomats to negotiate with Canadian authorities in order to agree that it would not violate a 189-year-old treaty, signed after the War of 1812, limiting arms on the Great Lakes."

DOJ_NMG_0080589

Long-Serving DHS Official Leaving Agency At "Critical Time." In its web-only "Washington Wire" column, the Wall Street Journal (10/15, Block, 2.03M) reported Ambassador Cresencio 'Cris' Arcos, who had been among "the last remaining senior-level political officials left from Tom Ridge's" time at DHS, "has stepped down." Arcos's "departure comes at a critical time for DHS which is coming under growing criticism for plans to build 700 miles of fencing along the US/Mexico border as a way to crack down on illegal immigration." He "is going into semiretirement and will work part time as a consultant."

WAR NEWS:

Baker Commission To Recommend "Significant Changes" To US Iraq Strategy. The Los Angeles Times (10/16, McManus, 918K) reports the Baker Commission "backed by President Bush that is exploring U.S. options in Iraq intends to propose significant changes in the administration's strategy by early next year. ... Two options under consideration would represent reversals of U.S. policy: withdrawing American troops in phases, and bringing neighboring Iran and Syria into a joint effort to stop the fighting." One participant said the 10-member commission has agreed "it's not going to be 'stay the course.' ... The bottom line is, [current U.S. policy] isn't working. ... There's got to be another way." The Times says if the panel "recommends overhauling Bush's approach to Iraq, it could give a boost not only to critics of current policy but also to officials in the administration who have argued for broad changes."

Hagel Seconds Warner's Iraq Assessment. NBC Nightly News (10/15, story 4, 0:20, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "Today a powerful Republican senator is joining the Republican chairman of the Senate Armed Service Committee in calling for a new strategy in Iraq. Sen. Chuck Hagel said he agrees with Sen. John Warner's assessment that Iraq appears to be 'drifting sideways.' Warner advocates a change of course if the Iraqi government fails to restore order in the next few months." Hagel, on CNN's Late Edition (10/15), said, "We are going to have to find a new strategy. ... The future of Iraq is going to be determined by the Iraqi people. It will not be determined here in Washington. ... The American people are not going to continue to support, sustain a policy that puts American troops in the middle of a civil war." The AP (10/15, Pickler) says Hagel and Warner "are part of the growing list of Republicans who are speaking out against President Bush's current plan for Iraq as U.S. casualties rise."

Ford Questions Administration "Sanity" On Iraq. Bloomberg (10/15, Elsibai) reports Rep. Harold Ford, "engaged in a close battle for an open Senate seat in Tennessee, questioned the 'sanity' of the Bush administration's policy on Iraq." On ABC's "This Week," he said, "After hearing Vice President Cheney and others over the last few weeks indicate that they would have gone forward with the war in Iraq even knowing what they know now, it raises serious questions about not only judgment but sanity."

Levin Says Phased Redeployment Of US Troops Should Begin In Next Few Months. Sen. Carl Levin said on CNN's Late Edition (10/15) that "either the insurgency or the sectarian violence requires a political solution, and that we've got to put pressure on the Iraqis to take over their own country. If they're going to have a civil war, they're going to have to do it without us, and what the leaders, our uniformed leaders in Iraq, really tell us is that we've got to find a way to put some pressure on the Iraqis to make these tough decisions. ... We've got to focus Iraqi leadership attention on this by telling them we need to begin a phased redeployment of American troops from Iraq within the next few months."

Five Americans Killed In Iraq, Bringing This Month's Toll To 53. The New York Times (10/16, Semple, 1.21M) reports, "Two marines were killed by insurgents in Anbar Province on Sunday, the American military command said, and three American soldiers died a day earlier in a bombing in southern Baghdad, bringing the total of American troop deaths in Iraq this month to at least 53, an extraordinarily high midmonth tally." At the current rate, "October is on track to be the third-deadliest month of the entire conflict for the military, according to Iraq Coalition Casualty Count, an independent Web site that tracks war-related casualties. The two most deadly months coincided with major American offensives against entrenched guerrilla fighters." The number of wounded troops, "a figure that usually parallels the number of fatalities, has also increased drastically. From Sept. 28 to Oct. 11, 427 American troops were wounded, one of the worst two-week stretches of the war, according to Iraq Coalition Casualty Count."

Iraq Violence Continues With Four Car Bombings In Kirkuk. ABC World News (10/15, story 3, 2:15, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "One year ago tonight in Iraq, they were celebrating a national election, ratifying a new constitution that seemed to offer a way out of war. But on this anniversary, there is no celebrating. Instead, today, the Prime Minister cancelled a scheduled national reconciliation conference amid another spasm of religious violence." The AP (10/15, Bodeen) reports the national reconciliation conference was "indefinitely postponed" as a" two-day spree of sectarian revenge killings and insurgent bombings left at least 86 Iraqis dead."

NBC Nightly News (10/15, story 3, 2:25, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) said October "has been an especially bloody month. Fifty-three Americans have been killed and there's been an upsurge in sectarian violence. Today four car bombs exploded in quick succession in the northern city of Kirkuk." NBC (Arraf) added, "This was some of the worst violence in weeks, just one of the suicide bombs that ripped through Kirkuk's streets. ... In cities like Kirkuk and Baquba in the Sunni Triangle, US forces thought it was calm enough earlier this year to hand control over to the Iraqi army. But that was before a wave of violence sparked by an attack on one of the holiest Shiite shrines. ... The Kirkuk violence and other attacks in capped a weekend in which more than 80 people were killed, including a US Marine and four soldiers. No one immediately claimed responsibility for any of the violence but al Qaeda has said it would increase attacks on foreigners during the holy month of Ramadan."

The Los Angeles Times (10/16, Daragahi, 918K) says in its lead that "months of bloodshed have threatened the loosen the bonds holding together Iraq's fractious government, with tensions between political blocs spilling out in recent days in fiery sectarian rhetoric as well as fighting that left at least 130 people dead nationwide." The Times says October is "on pace to be the deadliest for U.S. troops in the country since January 2005."

Maliki Says Forced Disarmament Of Militias Not Imminent. USA Today (10/16, Jervis, 2.27M) reports Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki told USA Today his government "will not force militias to disarm until later this year or early next year, despite escalating violence in Baghdad fueled by death squads and religious warfare." His remarks "point to a growing gap between the U.S. and Iraqi governments over how to handle growing sectarian violence."

Militants Declare New State In Sunni Part Of Iraq. The Washington Times/AP (10/16, Bodeen) reports, "A militant network that includes al Qaeda in Iraq declared in a video yesterday that it had established an Islamic state in six provinces where Sunni Muslims are dominant." The announcement by the Mujahedeen Shura Council "appeared mainly symbolic, since no Iraqi insurgent group has the strength or authority to act as a rival government and none controls territory. It underscored, however, the weakness of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government and its inability to bring Iraq's deeply divided politicians together."

The Financial Times (10/16, Negus) reports a video posted on the Internet in the name of the Mutayibeen Coalition, "one of Iraq's largest insurgent groups," called for the "creation of a separate Sunni Islamic state in the country. If authentic, it could indicate a shift in strategy for parts of the Sunni Arab insurgency."

US Helps Rebuild Iraqi Air Force. The Washington Times (10/16, Axe, 88K) reports, "A team of U.S. Air Force personnel at this sprawling British base in southern Iraq is working to rebuild an air force that the U.S. military spent more than a decade destroying. Former test pilot Lt. Col. Kelly Latimer and her team of five pilots and maintainers are partnered with 70 Squadron of the reborn Iraqi air force." The Times notes that, after devoting flights exclusively to training the Iraqis, "the unit can [now] dedicate more efforts to patrolling vital oil and power facilities and supporting the Basra-based Iraqi army's 10th Division and the tiny Iraqi navy based at nearby Umm Qasr."

Pace Says Terrorists Have "100 Year Plan" For Fighting US. Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Peter Pace spoke with reporters at a Christian Science Monitor (10/16, Cook, 58K) lunch Thursday, and offered "a passionate argument for the US military's mission in Iraq, stressed the nation's capacity to handle a threat from North Korea, and defended his performance as America's top military officer." His "polished performance was in contrast to the controversy surrounding remarks by Britain's army chief, Gen. Richard Dannatt, who said Thursday that British troops should be withdrawn from Iraq 'soon.'" Pace "said the enemy has 'a 100 year plan according to the map they published about a year and half ago. So anybody looking for a quick win in the war on terrorism probably hasn't read the enemy's published intent.'"

Soldier's Refusal To Deploy Roils Japanese American Community. The Los Angeles Times (10/16, Watanabe, 918K) reports on Japanese American reaction to the case of Ehren Watada, "an Army first lieutenant who earlier this year became the first commissioned officer to refuse deployment to Iraq, calling the war illegal and immoral." Watada's case "has stirred national debate over the legality of the Iraq war and a soldier's duty versus conscience. But in the Japanese American community, the case has struck a particular nerve, echoing conflicts of another war six decades ago." The case resonates within the community because "debate lingers over how Japanese Americans responded after Japan's attack on Pearl Harbor in 1941." Various Japanese Americans expressing their opinions are quoted.

Fallen Eskimo Guardsman Is Buried In Alaska. The New York Times (10/16, Leduff, 1.21M) reports on the late Staff Sgt. Billy Brown, who "is believed to be the first Eskimo killed because of this war. He was 54. Sergeant Brown, an Alaska national guardsman, never got to a battlefield. He was killed when a tractor-trailer slammed into the back of his Humvee late in July while he was on training maneuvers at Camp Shelby in Mississippi." The Times states, "For this war, 670 Guard members have been called up from rural Alaska, its largest foreign deployment ever. The Alaska Guard estimates that one-third of its members are Eskimo, so most likely a third of those deployed are indigenous men." The Times describes the impact on and incipient doubts about the war in Brown's hometown of Barrow, Alaska.

Dannatt's Remarks Spur National Debate In Britain. The Christian Science Monitor (10/16, Rice-Oxley, LaFranchi, 58K) reports, "A vigorous debate about how quickly Britain can pull out of Iraq has erupted following an unprecedented intervention from the head of the British armed forces." General Dannatt reportedly fears "that the formidable demands on the British army in both Iraq and Afghanistan are stretching the force to its limits." Experts "say the general, appointed only in August, was voicing the fears and frustrations of soldiers and officers alike who face an increasingly fraught mission with no end in sight"; "blogs and Internet postings have found British soldiers overwhelmingly applauded their commander. One on-line poll found 76 percent thought he had been 'absolutely right' to speak out."

British Scholar Sees UK Civil-Military Crisis. In a commentary for the Washington Times (10/16, 88K), military scholar Paul Moorcraft writes of Gen. Richard Dannatt's statement, "The United Kingdom is facing its biggest crisis in civil-military relations since the Second World War. ... The British Army is running out of soldiers, equipment and patience, though not fighting spirit. The British military establishment fears it is reinforcing failure in Iraq." Moorcraft argues, "Tony Blair is a lame-duck prime minister. He may be too weak to sack his forthright general. A behind-the-scenes forced resignation, especially if it were seen to be a result of US pressure, would trigger more unrest in the armed forces, perhaps even a joint demarche by other commanders. ... But Gen. Dannatt's frankness may be dangerous. Civilian control of the military is a cornerstone of Western democracy. ... [Dannatt] is risking the top job for the army he loves."

Prominent Journalists' Recent Books Critiquing Iraq War Reviewed. In the Washington Post (10/16, C1, 748K), Howard Kurtz examines the recent "series of books about the Iraq war" that "has exposed deep flaws in its planning and execution, made the Bush administration appear dysfunctional at times and generated enormous news coverage. All are by journalists with access to daily or weekly outlets. The bestsellers include 'Fiasco' by The Washington Post's Thomas Ricks; 'Cobra II' by Michael Gordon of the New York Times and former Timesman Bernard Trainor; 'Hubris' by Newsweek's Michael Isikoff and the Nation's David Corn; and now 'State of Denial' by The Post's Bob Woodward. Even President Bush observed last week that 'somebody ought to add up the number of pages that have been written about my administration.'"

Canadian Death Toll In Afghanistan Now 42. The New York Times (10/16, Gall, 1.21M) reports, "Two Canadian soldiers in the NATO force were killed and three were wounded in an ambush in southern Afghanistan on Saturday afternoon, and an Afghan provincial council member was assassinated Sunday on his way to work, officials said. ... The Canadians were killed when their convoy came under fire by rocket-propelled grenades and gunfire in Kandahar Province, forcing their unit to call in airstrikes, according to a NATO news release. Forty-two Canadian soldiers have been killed in Afghanistan this year."

Italian Reporter, Assistant Kidnapped In Afghanistan. The Wall Street Journal/AP (10/16) reports, "An Italian freelance photographer and his assistant were abducted in southern Afghanistan, an official said Sunday. Gabriele Torsello and his Afghan translator were abducted by armed men on Saturday as they were driving from Lashkar Gah, the capital of the southern Helmand province, toward neighboring Kandahar." Helmands and Kandahar "have been the scene of the most intense fighting between Taliban and NATO troops this year, the worst upsurge in violence in the country since the U.S.-led invasion in 2001 that ousted the Taliban regime from power."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

UnitedHealth CEO Ousted Amid Options Probe. The New York Times (10/16, Dash, Freudenheim) reports, "Dr. William W. McGuire, a medical entrepreneur who built the UnitedHealth Group into a colossus in its field, was forced to resign from the company yesterday and to give up a portion of the $1.1 billion he holds in harshly criticized stock options." The Times continues, "UnitedHealth, one of the nation's two largest health insurers, also dismissed its general counsel and a member of its board in what amounted to a sweeping overhaul of its governance practices and leadership ranks. The options that Dr. McGuire had been granted over the years have led to criminal and civil investigations and public disapproval." The Times adds, "In a sweeping report released yesterday that was highly critical of management, a law firm hired by UnitedHealth to investigate the timing of stock options concluded that the company was riddled with poor controls and conflicts of interest. The report, which the company posted on its Web site, found that UnitedHealth had backdated options to maximize employees' compensation. … The company said yesterday that the disputed options would be repriced from the lowest share price for the years in question to the highest prices, scaling back the earnings of Dr. McGuire and others. The company did not say precisely how much its executives would give up. … The developments are the most dramatic to date since federal regulators started looking into the widespread practice of backdating stock options. More than 100 companies have come under scrutiny over the unlikely coincidence of stock options being granted again and again to senior executives on dates when the company's share price was low, a tactic that guaranteed the maximum profit when the options were turned into cash."

The AP (10/22, Freed) reports the company "said McGuire will step down immediately as chairman and as a director. It said that McGuire would continue as chief executive until Dec. 1 at the latest and that he would 'assist in an orderly transition to new leadership.'" The company "named Stephen Hemsley, currently president and chief operating officer, to be the new chief executive. It also installed Richard Burke, the founding chief executive of UnitedHealth's predecessor company, as chairman."

The Los Angeles Times (10/16, Girion) notes that the announcement "came in the wake of a board-commissioned investigation that found that stock option grants were "likely backdated" to allow insiders to maximize financial gains." An investigation "by a law firm hired by UnitedHealth's board concluded that 1.5 million options — most of which were granted to McGuire as a part of his 1999 compensation package — were 'likely backdated.' The results of that investigation — given to board members last week and made public Sunday — were viewed as creating pressure on McGuire to leave." Yet, "because the investigation had been underway for more than six months, there was a sense among investors until only recently that McGuire would survive the scandal, said Sheryl Skolnick, an analyst at CRT Capital in Stanford, Conn."

The Wall Street Journal (10/16, A1, Bandler, Forelle) reports, "The probe's findings, released yesterday, provided a detailed picture of how stock-option backdating worked at the company, offering glimpses of cronyism and a culture in which vast sums of compensation were handed out with few controls or written records. Among the troublesome option grants detailed in the report was a massive 1999 award to Dr. McGuire that ranks among the most lucrative ever." UnitedHealth "also is being investigated by the Securities and Exchange Commission, by federal prosecutors in New York, and by the Minnesota attorney general."

UnitedHealth To Face Investor Scrutiny. The Wall Street Journal (10/16, Fuhrmans) reports, "With William McGuire forced out from the helm of UnitedHealth, investors will start sorting out whether the company's management team can get it back on track without the man who built it. Despite the obvious challenges ahead, some investors and analysts say it can." UnitedHealth "has one critical factor working in its favor: It is known for its deep bench of management talent. … Against that backdrop, investors need to decide whether to sell the stock because the company could struggle without Dr. McGuire's leadership, or to buy it because the uncertainty about the stock-options scandal is closer to being resolved."

Smaller Firms Take On Accounting Giants. The Washington Post (10/16, D1, Hart) reports, "For more than a decade, many smaller Washington-based accounting and consulting firms have aligned themselves with one of four larger networks that represent mid-size regional firms. Now one of those networks has gone a step further: banding its member firms together to act as one company." The Post continues, "The network, called Baker Tilly USA, opens for business today, combining 22 mid-size accounting firms from around the country, including Beers & Cutler PLLC locally. The alliance plans to offer tax, audit and consulting services to capture more of the accounting market, a strategy other accounting networks plan to adopt over the next year." The Post adds, "The dissolution of accounting giant Arthur Andersen in the Enron scandal, and the more stringent internal accounting controls required by the Sarbanes-Oxley law, created more demand for the Big Four -- Deloitte & Touche LLP, Ernst & Young LLP, KPMG LLP and PricewaterhouseCoopers LLP -- particularly from the nation's largest public companies. .. .Second- and third-tier accounting firms often found it difficult to move up the accounting ranks because larger clients typically require industry-specific skills and global reach, which many regional firms do not have."

SEC To Relax Margin Rules. The Financial Times (10/16, Grant) reports, "The US is set to relax margin rules in force since after the Wall Street crash of 1929 with the approval of a system that will cut securities trading costs and pave the way for 'multi-asset' trading across equities, options and futures." The Times continues, "The move removes a key barrier to the competitiveness of the US capital markets as similar margin rules already exist in Europe, attracting increasing numbers of hedge funds to London. … It comes as many US exchanges are trying to expand the mix of their businesses towards a combination of equities, options and futures." The Times adds, "This is in response to demand from hedge funds and other traders who increasingly prefer to trade such assets simultaneously. … The Securities and Exchange Commission's staff has approved an application by the New York Stock Exchange for a new type of 'portfolio margining' account that calculates margin based on the types of assets held in the account and the interplay between them. … It will provide an alternative to the 'Reg T' margining system, under which the Federal Reserve and NYSE set margins for stock trading at up to 50 per cent."

Regulators Rethinking Hedge Fund Rules. The Financial Times (10/16, Grant) reports, "Top US policymakers believe fresh regulation of hedge funds may be needed to avoid a catastrophic hedge fund failure and that relying on banks and other counterparties to manage their exposure to the booming industry may no longer be enough." The Times continues, "The development marks a shift in thinking on hedge fund oversight since a US court in June struck down a rule that hedge fund managers register with the Securities and Exchange Commission. … Hedge funds have since been in regulatory limbo." The Times adds, "The $6bn losses at hedge fund Amaranth have thrust into the spotlight concerns over the systemic risks associated with the $1,500bn industry. … Since the collapse of Long Term Capital Management in 1998, the President's Working Group on Financial Markets – made up of the Federal Reserve, Treasury, SEC and Commodity Futures Trading Commission – has believed that counterparty risk management is the best way to guard against risks to the financial system posed by hedge funds. … Ben Bernanke, US Federal Reserve chairman, in May expressed scepticism about giving regulators more oversight over hedge funds, saying that allowing hedge funds and trading partners to manage risk in the sector made 'economic sense'. … However, one senior official close to the group said the explosive growth of such funds, the leverage available and the increasing exposure of pension fund money to them had cast doubt on that approach. … Speaking on condition of anonymity, he said: 'It's an unavoidable question that you ought to look comprehensively at how this framework is working . . . Is counterparty risk management still the right approach?'"

Hedge Funds Draw Insider-Trading Scrutiny. The New York Times (10/16, Anderson) reports, "In early March, executives from Movie Gallery, a big movie rental chain, held a private conference call for their lenders to talk about how disastrous 2005 had been for the company. A string of Hollywood flops had kept customers away. More people were recording movies from television instead of renting them from a store. The executives said they needed more time to fix the problems, which included more than $1 billion in debt." The Times continues, "Most of the roughly 200 lenders were not bankers, but hedge funds. And what they heard was supposed to be confidential: it was inside information, as valuable to investors as a tip about an imminent takeover. … During the next two days, though, Movie Gallery's shares were heavily traded, and its stock plummeted 25 percent. … A coincidence? Regulators are not so sure. The Securities and Exchange Commission is now looking into whether any of the hedge funds on the private call with Movie Gallery took their inside knowledge of the company's struggles and traded on it. Movie Gallery announced earnings results to the public nearly two weeks after the private conference call." The Times adds, "The Movie Gallery case provides a window onto the growing power of hedge funds in financial markets, and raises questions about their role in how information flows on Wall Street. Hedge funds have become a dominant force in the New York and London stock exchanges, and now account for roughly half of all trading in those markets. But they also have recently become major players in the more opaque debt market, which includes bonds as well as loans, and is more than one and a half times as big as the stock market. … The power shift in the loan market has prompted the trade association for lenders to develop new guidelines, to be announced today, governing how confidential and material — meaning potentially market-moving — nonpublic information is used."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ To Launch Initiative Seeking Causes Of Violent Crime Increase. USA Today (10/16, Johnson) reports, "Teams of federal investigators looking to curb increases in murder and robbery will visit several U.S. cities in order to pinpoint the root causes of community violence, the Justice Department is expected to announce today." USA continues, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales plans to outline the initiative in an appearance at the annual meeting of the nation's police chiefs in Boston, the Justice Department said." USA adds, "The Justice review comes after the Police Executive Research Forum, a national police advocacy group, reported last week that murder, robbery and assault offenses had increased substantially in a cross-section of cities during the first six months of 2006. … Last month, the FBI's national crime report for 2005 also revealed a nearly 2% increase in the nation's murder rate after a two-decade low in 2004." USA notes, "The federal program will dispatch investigators to several cities during the next few weeks to look at possible causes of increased violence, according to an outline of the initiative provided by the Justice Department. The department didn't identify the cities."

Abramoff Associate Met White House Officials 12 Times In 2003 And 2004. The Financial Times (10/16, Kirchgaessner) reports, "A lobbyist associated with Jack Abramoff, the convicted former 'superlobbyist', met White House officials on 12 occasions in 2003 and 2004 on behalf of an association that represented PartyGaming and other online gaming websites, according to billing records released by Congress." White House officials' "meetings with Shawn Vasell, a former associate of Mr Abramoff, were documented by the latter's former lobbying firm, Greenberg Traurig. The documents were released following a broader investigation into contacts between Mr Abramoff's team and the Bush administration by the House committee on government reform." The Times adds, "A spokesman for Mr Abramoff, who pleaded guilty to corruption charges this year, declined to comment."

Mehlman Denies Involvement In State Department Official's Firing. The Financial Times (10/16, Kirchgaessner) reports RNC Chair Ken Mehlman "was on Sunday put on the defensive about his alleged role in the ousting of a State Department official in 2001 who was a political foe of Jack Abramoff." Mehlman "said he did not recall the specifics of the removal of Allen Stayman, who supported changes to labour laws on the Northern Mariana Islands, an important client of Mr Abramoff, but said it was 'not true' he had the authority to fire anyone in his former role as political director at the White House." The Times quotes one of the released Abramoff emails saying, "Mehlman said he would get him [Stayman] fired." Stayman, now on the minority staff of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, had been the Director of the Office of Compact Negotiations and also served as the Department of the Interior's Deputy Assistant Secretary for Insular Affairs.

Mehlman was asked on CNN's Late Edition (10/15) about a report that an official at the State Department was fired because Jack Abramoff came to him "and basically said, fire this guy; he's not allowing the policies in the Northern Mariana Islands that Abramoff and his clients wanted." Mehlman said, "It is not true. And I'm not sure that those e-mails suggested that. First of all, I did not have the authority, as the political director, to fire anybody. It wasn't my decision."

Tampa Gambino Trial Begins Today. The St. Petersburg Times (10/16, Weimar) reports, "Not so very long ago, Tampa was an underworld hub, a place where mobsters ran illegal gambling operations out of Ybor City coffee shops and killed the people who got in their way. Those days are over, thanks largely to a crackdown by law enforcement in the 1970s and '80s. But experts say the Mafia never really left Tampa: It just changed form. Starting today , four men alleged to be members of the Gambino crime family will go on trial in U.S. District Court in Tampa on charges of racketeering and extortion. Prosecutors said the crew, headed by Ronald 'Ronnie One Arm' Trucchio, committed a string of crimes from New York to Miami, including murder, robbery and extortion." The Times adds that today, "mobile groups of crime associates called 'crews' migrate to Florida and work independently, making payments to heads of families in New York or New Jersey."

The Tampa Tribune (10/15, Silvestrini) reported, "Lorraine Lamendola's terrifying tale of hiding from mobsters by crawling around on the floor of her darkened house is at the heart of what the federal government says was a brutal struggle to control the valet parking business in Tampa. While members of the Gambino crime family…carried out murders, armed robberies and drug sales in New York, New Jersey and Florida, mobsters used extortion to gain dominance over valet revenue at hospitals, restaurants and nightclubs in the Tampa area, federal authorities allege." The Tribune noted, "Documents filed in the federal criminal case and the county civil case paint a picture of a violent struggle over the lucrative business of parking cars in the Tampa Bay area."

Internet Investigators Fight Rising Threat Of Child Predators. In a story about the rising threat of Internet child predators, the Miami Herald (10/14, Veciana-Suarez, 310K) noted, "About 18 months ago, the FBI's Miami division launched a separate Crimes Against Children Squad. The squad includes about 10 undercover investigators who mostly work online. … Since the squad began, FBI agents have arrested or identified 82 suspects for a range of sex crimes against children, said Judy Orihuela, the FBI's Miami spokeswoman." The Herald added, "The squad, which serves the Keys through Palm Beach County, also works with public schools to teach children how to stay safe. But police, like other experts, say it's ultimately up to the parents. 'We don't advocate for parents to try to keep their kids offline,' said Supervisory Special Agent Terri Patterson. 'That's unhealthy. The kids have to spend time online. Their parents just have to monitor it.'"

Bikers Raise Funds For Amish School Families. NBC Nightly News (10/15, story 11, 1:45, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, " In Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, it's a weekend of healing as neighbors reach out to neighbors following the deadly Amish school shooting there. And in the wake of the violence, a new story is unfolding, one of community compassion and grace. Today, more than a thousand bikers turned on the power of their engines to help families. ... An act of kindness raising nearly $30,000 today to benefit families whose children were shot in an Amish school two weeks ago."

Former Duke Students Say Rape Accusation Ruined Lives. The New York Times (10/16, Wilson) reports, "In their first news interviews, three former Duke University students told the CBS News program '60 Minutes' that they were falsely accused of raping a woman hired to dance at a lacrosse team party last March." The Times continues, "One of the men has graduated from Duke, while the other two, who were sophomores, have been suspended from the university pending the outcome of the case, they said on the program, which was shown yesterday. They are free on $100,000 bail while awaiting a trial expected to start next spring. … 'This woman has destroyed everything I worked for in my life,' said the student who graduated, David F. Evans, 23, of Annapolis, Md. 'And, worst of all, she's split apart a community and a nation on facts that just didn't happen and a lie that should have never been told.'" The Times adds, "Also appearing on the show was James E. Coleman Jr., a professor at Duke's law school who criticized the prosecutor in the case and accused him of misconduct. Mr. Coleman, who led a university review of the men's lacrosse program after the party, said of Michael B. Nifong, the Durham County district attorney, 'I think in this case, it appears that this prosecutor has set out to develop whatever evidence he could to convict people he already concluded were guilty.' … In June, Mr. Coleman said Mr. Nifong should ask the state attorney general to appoint a special prosecutor and remove himself from the case. Mr. Coleman said Mr. Nifong 'pandered to the community' and set up an improper photo lineup to identify suspects. … In a telephone interview last night, Mr. Coleman said, 'He has forgotten about his obligation to protect the innocent, and in my view, that's prosecutorial misconduct.' … Mr. Nifong did not return telephone calls and e-mail messages yesterday. The accuser, a student at North Carolina Central University, could not be contacted."

Author Offers Hope To Imprisoned Teens. The New York Times (10/16, Smith) reports, "On a recent weekday afternoon (in Orlando, FL), Dennis Lehane, the best-selling crime writer, stood in front of 17 imprisoned teenagers, trying to establish his street credentials. He grew up in a violent neighborhood, he told them, Dorchester, in Boston. 'One or two made it out of my neighborhood,' he said. 'Sixteen other guys went down.'" The Times continues, "Mr. Lehane was on a tour to publicize his new story collection, 'Coronado' (HarperCollins), and had made an unusual stop: at the Youthful Offender Program at the Orange County Jail here. The participants had been reading 'Coronado' as part of a class called, in an effort to use language familiar to teenagers, 'Literature n' Living.' … Most of the boys, who are 14 to 17, had been accused of crimes so serious that they were being tried as adults. Some were awaiting trial, others serving sentences of less than a year. Many of the characters in 'Coronado,' are, like the prisoners, young, lost and violent, and the book had been assigned to them by John Richter, the program's coordinator, in an effort to get them to read — anything." The Times adds, "Mr. Richter had tested the boys to make sure they understood the book, and had them write reports, which they were now delivering to Mr. Lehane, whose 2001 novel, 'Mystic River,' was made into a movie by Clint Eastwood."

President Of National Association Of The Deaf Calls Arrests "Totally Unnecessary." The Washington Post (10/16, B1, De Vise) reports, "The president of the National Association of the Deaf weighed in yesterday on what she called the 'totally unnecessary' arrests Friday night of 133 protesters at Gallaudet University in a dispute with campus administrators, and urged the board of trustees to take command of a situation that 'is out of control.' Bobbie Beth Scoggins, head of the advocacy group, arrived at the Washington campus yesterday afternoon to cheers from scores of students and alumni, who have taken shifts occupying tents around the campus entrance for the past week. They shut down the campus for three days to protest the selection of former university provost Jane K. Fernandes as the school's next president." Scoggins said that "sympathizers around the world had erected more than 70 'tent cities' in solidarity with the Gallaudet protesters, four of whom launched a hunger strike at the start of the weekend." Fernandes defended the arrests as "necessary to regain control of the campus."

Gay Masseur's Business Application Stirs Tensions In Manassas, VA. The Washington Post (10/16, Miroff) reports, "In the past three years, the Manassas City Council has received two applications for home-based massage therapy businesses, and members have approved both. Then Howard Daniel, who is gay, applied." The Post continues, "The backlash against Daniel's request began last month when nearly two dozen people, many of them members of a local church, spoke in opposition to it at a public hearing. When it came time for the city to decide on Daniel's application the next week, council members balked and voted instead to consider changing the city's zoning laws." The Post adds, "The city's response and the community opposition have blindsided Daniel and his supporters, one of whom had an anti-gay message written on his car. … Questions of discrimination are already sensitive in Manassas, which is currently under federal investigation for housing policies that allegedly target Hispanic residents, a violation of the Fair Housing Act. Now the city is again facing a land-use decision loaded with political overtones. At least one council member, Andrew L. Harrover (R), said he has received threats that Daniel's home will be picketed if the council approves his application. … The vast majority of those who have mobilized against Daniel's application do not live on his street or even in his neighborhood. Many are affiliated with Manassas's All Saints Catholic Church, though there is no indication they have organized their opposition through the church."

AT&T-BellSouth Deal Draws Consumer Criticism. USA Today (10/16, Davidson) reports, "Consumer advocates say the new concessions AT&T has offered to close its $80 billion merger with BellSouth don't go far enough to preserve competition. … 'They're a step in the right direction, but they don't resolve the most important competitive problems,' says Gene Kimmelman of Consumers Union. … He also said AT&T's offer smacks of desperation to win approval." USA continues, "At the urging of its two Democratic commissioners, the Federal Communications Commission postponed Friday's scheduled vote on the merger until Nov. 3 to allow time for the public to comment on proposed concessions that AT&T filed Friday. The four commissioners available to vote on the merger are split 2-2 along party lines." USA adds, "AT&T's offer, an attempt to break the stalemate, includes a $10-a-month DSL broadband service for new customers for 30 months. The company also said it would also offer free DSL modems for new broadband subscribers next year. … AT&T's proposal followed a flurry of late-night negotiations Thursday with the FCC's two Democratic commissioners, Michael Copps and Jonathan Adelstein. Republican FCC Chairman Kevin Martin has recommended the merger's approval with no conditions. Democratic commissioners Friday indicated AT&T's offer represented progress. … The Justice Department last week cleared the deal with no conditions or divestitures, enraging Democrats, who vowed to press for significant requirements."

Oshkosh Truck To Buy JLG Industries For $3 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (10/16, Brat, Hallinan) reports, "Oshkosh Truck Corp. said it will acquire JLG Industries Inc. for about $3 billion, positioning the Oshkosh, Wis., maker of fire, military, concrete and garbage trucks to take better advantage of the global boom in nonresidential construction." The Journal continues, "JLG, of McConnellsburg, Pa., makes aerial-work platforms, booms and related equipment that can lift people and heavy materials several stories. The all-cash deal at $28 per JLG share will create a company with 13,000 employees and $6 billion in annual revenue. Oshkosh will assume about $200 million in debt. Shares of JLG ended unchanged Friday at $20.75 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange." The Journal adds, "While housing construction in the U.S. has slowed, construction of office buildings, warehouses, multistory parking lots and other nonresidential construction has been strong as companies spend cash on expanding factories and offices while interests rates are near historical lows. … The purchase of JLG, which Oshkosh expects to complete in the next 90 days, will be the company's 15th acquisition since 1996."

Volkswagen Would Support MAN's Scania Bid With Restrictions. The Wall Street Journal (10/16, C8, Rauwald) reports, "German car maker Volkswagen AG said it would support MAN AG's attempt to acquire Scania AB for 95.89 billion kronor ($12.93 billion) if the German truck maker manages to acquire shares representing slightly more than 56% voting rights in its Swedish rival." The Journal continues, "Volkswagen, Europe's biggest auto maker by sales and the biggest single shareholder in both MAN and Scania, said it would offer its shares -- representing 34% of Scania's voting rights and 18.7% of its equity -- to MAN in that case. Volkswagen said MAN must also win shares representing at least 71.31% of Scania's capital." The Journal adds, "Volkswagen's supervisory board, the equivalent of a U.S. board of directors, 'is convinced that a solution acceptable to all sides remains the preferred outcome,' the company said in a statement following an extraordinary meeting yesterday. Volkswagen added it won't support a counterbid by Scania for MAN at the present time. .. . MAN said it welcomes 'Volkswagen AG's continued support for its concept to combine MAN and Scania AB and its willingness to tender its shares into a successful merger.' … Scania and Swedish investment company Investor AB, which owns a significant stake in Scania, have rejected the most recent bid, saying it still 'significantly undervalues' the company's prospects. Investor said yesterday it still won't rule out a counterbid by Scania."

EU, Microsoft Seek Common Ground On Vista. The Financial Times (10/16, Buck) reports, "Microsoft and the European Commission appeared to be stepping back from months of conflict over the Vista operating system, after the US software group revealed on Friday that it had made significant changes to its new flagship product ahead of Vista's launch next month." The Times continues, "Although the Brussels-based antitrust regulator stressed that it had not given a 'green light' to Microsoft, Neelie Kroes, the European Union competition commissioner, gave an upbeat assessment." The Times adds, "Microsoft's competitors said they needed more time to assess the changes to Vista. But most of them welcomed the US software giant's announcement that it would amend the operating system in order to ensure that computer users had a choice between using rival software or Microsoft's own products. … The changes focus in particular on internet search, security software and a programme similar to Adobe's PDF reader that lets users create and send fixed documents. Microsoft said it would develop interfaces that would allow rival software to connect better with the new operating system. It would also allow competing software to 'override' Vista's own functions should users install another product providing the same service. .. .Symantec, which had warned that the integration of Microsoft security features into Vista would undermine its business, said Microsoft's concessions gave reason for 'guarded optimism'. … However, Symantec said it was crucial that Microsoft made available details of the new interfaces to rival companies as fast as possible."

Report Warns Growth In US Electricity Demand Outstripping New Resources. The Wall Street Journal (10/16, Smith, 2.03M) reports, "A report by the North American Electric Reliability Council warns demand for electricity is increasing three times as fast as resources are being added in the U.S., a trend that could shake electric-system reliability in the coming decade. In its first report since the organization's duties were expanded by Congress, the grid organization, known as NERC, said U.S. demand will increase by about 20% from 2006 to 2015, outstripping investment in new electrical supply." The Journal says, "Increasingly, it is left to a deregulated market to determine whether and when new resources get built. As the system drifts closer to its physical limits, it is even more important that energy regulators and utilities promote conservation and use of the most energy-efficient equipment, said Rick Sergel, chief executive of [NERC]."

WSJournal Outlines 10 Innovations That Could Reduce Electricity Usage. In an analysis, the Wall Street Journal (10/16, R1, Smith, 2.03M) reports that the electricity "crisis" the US is facing is "a tremendous opportunity." The Journal says, "Energy prices are high, supplies are increasingly tight, and anxiety is growing about climate change. But that dark outlook is driving consumers, utilities and public officials to finally take advantage of innovations that could radically reshape the nation's power consumption without lowering the standard of living." The Journal outlines "10 innovations capable of making a big difference immediately and in coming years." These include: more efficient lighting systems and hardware, advanced sensors, better tools for tracking energy use, higher EPA energy-efficiency standards, more stringent building codes, improved incentives for utilities, variable electricity pricing, rebates for old equipment, and "demand-response" programs.

Board Finds Poor Oversight By BP Caused Texas City Fire. The Wall Street Journal (10/16, A10) reports, "A July 2005 fire at BP PLC's Texas City refinery was caused by poor mechanical-integrity oversight, a U.S. safety board said. The fire occurred four months after an explosion at the refinery killed 15 workers and injured hundreds more." The Journal says, "BP said it agreed with the findings -- disclosed yesterday -- of the Chemical Safety and Hazardous Investigation Board and described a series of steps taken to improve 'positive material identification' at the plant, including an increase in the size of the inspection team from 50 people to more than 200."

The New York Times/AP reports BP "did not have procedures in place that could have prevented a fire in July 2005 at its refinery in Texas City after workers installed the wrong type of pipe, federal investigators said Sunday. The fire at the Resid Hydrotreater Unit, which combines heavy crude oil with hydrogen, caused more than $30 million in damage. One worker suffered minor injuries."

Mexican Bats Find Benefactors In US. The Washington Post (10/16, A8, Connolly) reports from Mexico City, "Shortly before sundown they make their first foray, cruising up to 5,000 feet aboveground in search of mosquitoes, moths and other tasty treats. A few hours later, they return home to rest and feed their young before heading out again around midnight." The Post continues, "By daybreak, when Mexican free-tailed bats finally return to their cave, named Cueva de la Boca, the colony will have traveled as far as 62 miles and gobbled some 12 tons of bugs out of the skies near the U.S. border. And in cornfields from Texas to Iowa, farmers are giving thanks. … Or at least they should be." The Post adds, 'Sure, bats are creepy. They hang upside down, squeal at high decibels and turn up in movies as blood-sucking fiends. Some even spread rabies. But, it turns out, that in the global ecosystem, bats are humanity's allies. … Every night, all night, as humans sleep, the flying mammals work feverishly. They pollinate plants such as the agave, the source of Mexico's iconic tequila. Their excrement, called guano, is a valuable fertilizer. And bats eat up to one-quarter of their body weight in insects every night, making them one of the simplest, safest, most cost-effective forms of pest control available. … Somehow, that message has not reached most people. For decades, intentionally or otherwise, property owners, hikers and sightseers have trampled habitat, dumped garbage and set fires, decimating the bat populations in many parts of the world. … Now, in a unique cross-border alliance, bat lovers have embarked on a multiyear effort to quantify the damage and replenish the bat population of northern Mexico. The project, being spearheaded by the nonprofit Texas-based Bat Conservation International (BCI), includes detailed mapping of hundreds of present and former bat roosts, educational programs for farmers and even purchases of land to protect the most vulnerable colonies."

Growing Green Economy Aims At Mainstream. The Washington Post (10/16, D1, Rosenwald) reports, "Keith Ware dressed naturally to set up his booth at the Green Festival. He wore an organic cotton hooded jacket, organic cotton blue jeans and organic hemp work boots, the soles of which are made from recycled surgical gloves. He was not, however, wearing his organic cotton underwear. … Ware is one of the owners of Eco-Green Living, a Logan Circle store that sells organic and fair-trade products such as teas, hemp boots and even the makeshift floor he was setting up, which was made from Marmoleum -- a combination of linseed oil, wood flour, rosin, jute and limestone. He was an exhibitor over the weekend at the Green Festival, which drew crowds of people to the Washington Convention Center to celebrate light bulbs that last 60,000 hours, investment funds targeting socially responsible companies and paper made from elephant dung by a company called Mr. Ellie Pooh." The Post continues, 'The show, the third in the District, grew from 250 exhibitors in the first year to more than 350. Although some exhibitors were selling products, the chief intention of the show was to develop the industry by connecting the principles and products of green businesses with mainstream customers. … By many accounts, the green business movement is taking off, with the marketplace topping more than $228 billion in the United States and with such companies as Wal-Mart Stores Inc. getting into organic food and General Electric Co. plowing into renewable energy. Levi's is introducing organic cotton jeans. Vanity Fair recently published a green issue. … (W)hat was long a counterculture movement is now embracing one of its sworn enemies -- big business -- as a key component of the cause."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Three Chicago Gang Members Convicted Of Drug Trafficking. The Medill News Service (10/13) reports three members of a Chicago gang "were convicted Thursday, culminating a massive federal probe into a network of drug trafficking on the city's West Side. Troy Martin, Eddie Bell and Patrick Bray were each found guilty by a federal jury of running a highly organized drug ring as members of the Mafia Insane Vice Lords. … The men were arrested in May 2004 as part of 'Operation Day Trader,' a U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration investigation. A total of 48 defendants were arrested on federal conspiracy charges, most of whom have been convicted."

Accused Asian Gang Leader Arrested In Sacramento. KOVR-TV, Sacramento (10/14) reports on its Web site that five people were arrested after they "were caught growing marijuana in plain view in their backyard. Federal agents say one of the suspects arrested is a leader of an Asian gang called Little Rascals, a gang the DEA says is the boldest they've arrested all summer. … According to an affidavit, the leader lived in Elk Grove but ran the operation out of his mother's house in Oak Park. Inside the home, agents say they found 6,000 ecstasy pills, 39 marijuana plants in the backyard of the residence well as 19 boxes of processed marijuana."

Six To Plead Guilty In Texas To Drug-Smuggling. In McAllen, the Monitor (10/14) reports six defendants in a federal drug case "have agreed to plead guilty to smuggling charges, opening the way for prosecutors to go after their 10 co-defendants. … The case dates back to December 2005, when the 16 men were indicted after an almost 10-year Drug Enforcement Administration investigation into cocaine and marijuana smuggling near Peñitas." The Monitor notes that the case involves former McAllen police officer Francisco Meza-Rojas who "led the family drug ring, according to court documents. He and the five other prisoners who escaped the prison in La Villa are still on the loose."

Pennsylvania Man Gets 8-Year Sentence for Role In Crack Ring. The Scranton (PA) Times-Tribune (10/15) reports a Kingston man "was sentenced to more than eight years in prison for his role in a crack cocaine ring that operated in Luzerne and Lancaster counties. Anthony Blaso, 54, of Kingston, pleaded guilty to a drug conspiracy count in July, four months after he was indicted in federal court as a result of an investigation by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and the Wilkes-Barre Police Department."

US Military Pilot Sentenced To Prison In Ecstasy Case. The AP (10/13) reports a U.S. military pilot who "flew a U.S. Air Force jet from New York to Germany to pick up 200,000 pills of Ecstasy was sentenced Friday to 17 1/2 years in prison. U.S. District Judge John G. Koeltl rejected appeals by defense lawyers for leniency for Capt. Franklin Rodriguez of the U.S. Air National Guard, saying the sentence was appropriate for 'a particularly egregious and despicable crime.'"

The Mid-Hudson News (10/14) reports Rodriguez and his co-defendant, Master Sergeant John Fong, "pleaded guilty in May to conspiring to import the drug into the country and conspiring to possess and distribute the drug. The charges were the result of an international investigation into importation of Ecstasy on military aircraft and its distribution in the United States."

Nationwide Marijuana Plant Seizures Outpace Last Year's Count. The San Diego Union-Tribune (10/16, Lee) reports drug agents sniffed out a major marijuana patch at Palomar Mountain State Park a few months ago in the kind of raid that has become all too common on U.S. public lands. What officials initially thought might be a few hundred plants ended up being 15,000. … Initial repairs to such an area can cost taxpayers $10,000 per acre for staff time and a helicopter to haul away garbage, said the Office of National Drug Control Policy. On average, ten acres are fouled for every acre of marijuana planted in forests and on other public lands, the agency said." Federal agents "say that about 4.5 million outdoor marijuana plants have been seized nationwide this year, largely from public lands. That pace is well ahead of the 2005 count."

Rep. McGovern Seeks Leniency For Convicted Drug Dealer In Massachusetts. The Boston Herald (10/16) reports U.S. Rep. James P. McGovern "asked a federal judge in Boston to go easy last week when sentencing a now twice-convicted drug dealer who was once moving up to 13 pounds of coke per month." McGovern "wrote to U.S. District Court Judge F. Dennis Saylor IV asking leniency for Nicholas Police." On Thursday, Saylor "sentenced Police…to the low end of the 8-to-10 years he was facing for pleading guilty to possession of cocaine and marijuana."

FARC Member's Trial To Begin In D.C. The AP (10/16) reports, "The politically charged trial of a top Latin American rebel leader is set to begin in a 3-year-old kidnapping case that has the lives of three Americans hanging in the balance. Opening statements were scheduled for Monday in the U.S. District Court trial of 56-year-old Ricardo Palmera, who is considered the most senior member captured from the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), on charges he provided material support to a terrorist group. … The trial is the latest evidence of a stiffening U.S. stance against FARC, which the U.S. government considers a terrorist organization. … The group funds itself through drug trafficking, extortion and kidnapping."

IMMIGRATION:

Immigration Said To Cause Overcrowding, Environmental Problems. Dan Stein, president of the Federation for American Immigration Reform (FAIR), writes in USA Today (10/16, 2.27M), "Overcrowded schools, congested highways, environmental stresses: We are a nation paving over its wildernesses while depending on our enemies for vital resources. Why? Because Americans have been blindsided by a government-mandated mass immigration program that's fueling this nation's runaway population growth. This growth was neither planned nor expected, but we feel the consequences every day." Stein adds, "Our population future is entirely within our power to determine. Just as the government has mandated soaring overcrowding and congestion in the past several decades, it has the power to slow population growth by curtailing immigration and enforcing laws against illegal immigration. … As responsible stewards for future generations, there is an urgency to consider how our decisions today will affect the nation they will inherit — before it's too late."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Snow's Role As GOP Fundraiser Draws Criticism. The New York Times (10/16, Stolberg, 1.21M) reports that "in the six months" since President Bush "enlisted him to resuscitate a White House press operation that was barely breathing," Tony Snow, "a former Fox News television and radio host and a conservative commentator, has reinvented the job with his snappy sound bites and knack for deflecting tough questions with a smile. Now, he is reinventing it yet again, by breaking away from the briefing room to raise money for Republicans, as he did…on Saturday night for Speaker J. Dennis Hastert. … His booking agent is the White House political shop, run by Karl Rove, the president's chief strategist. The White House is not keeping track of how much money Mr. Snow raises. His talks -- Saturday night's was a cross between a one-man show and a religious revival -- have attracted little scrutiny so far, but they are giving a much-needed boost to a party whose midterm fortunes appear increasingly bleak." Yet "even as the Republican establishment revels in his celebrity – 'It's like Mick Jagger at a rock concert,' Mr. Rove said -- Mr. Snow's extracurricular activities are making some veteran Washington hands, including those with strong Republican ties, deeply uneasy." The Times goes on to quote David Gergen ("If he is seen as wearing two hats, reporters as well as the public will inevitably wonder: is he speaking to us now as the traditional press secretary, or is he speaking to us as a political partisan?") and Kenneth Duberstein ("His profile should not be a political profile…but a press profile on behalf of the president") raising concerns about Snow's political activivies.

Mehlman Says GOP Leadership Dealt With Foley Scandal Aggressively. RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman was asked on CNN's Late Edition (10/15) how Republicans will deal with the Foley scandal only a few weeks before the election. Mehlman said, "I think you answer with the truth. The fact is the Speaker and our leadership could not have been more aggressive. The moment they found out about this, they gave Mark Foley the political death penalty. They said, get out of Congress or we're going to throw you out. They called in the FBI and the Department of Justice to investigate. They tried to bring in Louis Freeh to make sure the program was appropriate in the future. I think when people find this out, they're going to appreciate it."

Hastert's Leadership Style, Tenure As Speaker Examined. The Washington Post (10/16, A1, Grunwald, VandeHei, 748K) runs an analysis piece on Speaker Dennis Hastert's record, and describes him as someone "largely unknown outside Washington, routinely underestimated as a powerless figurehead inside Washington," yet a leader who "has helped unify his fractious caucus, promote President Bush's agenda and expand the House's GOP majority." Hastert "is still beloved by his players, which is why he's survived the Foley mess so far. They appreciate how he listens to their concerns, shares credit and works overtime to keep the team together. He schlepped to 42 districts in August to try to maintain the GOP majority; it's no coincidence that his political arm is called the Keep Our Majority PAC." His aides "say he intends to fight to protect his job, and he intends to win. After all, his legacy is at stake on Nov. 7. He'll either be the unbeaten coach, or the coach who lost the big one. Either way, he'll be the speaker who presided over an era of unprecedented partisanship, an era when winning seemed to be the only thing that mattered."

The Washington Post (10/16, A19, Babington, 748K) also says Hastert "shows no sign of resigning," but "the mere suggestion that he might do so raises an intriguing political and constitutional question: Who would replace him while Congress is in recess? The answer, it appears, is on a piece of paper locked away in the House clerk's office. In a little-noticed action taken nearly four years ago, the House amended its rules dealing with the 'continuity of Congress' in emergencies and the succession of speakers. The rule, cited recently in Roll Call, directs the speaker to 'deliver to the Clerk a list of Members in the order in which each shall act as Speaker pro tempore...in the case of a vacancy in the office of Speaker.'" The Post adds, "Perhaps the biggest question, some lawyers say, is whether a House speaker -- full time or pro tempore -- can assume and keep the presidency under any circumstance. A statute, not the Constitution, lists the speaker's place in the line succession."

Blogger's Role In Unfolding Scandal Noted. The Wall Street Journal (10/16, A1, Schatz, 2.03M) reports, "For three days, William 'Wild Bill' Kerr huddled over an old computer, trying to solve a curious mystery. He wanted to figure out the identity of the congressional page who received the salacious instant messages that prompted Florida Rep. Mark Foley to resign Sept. 29, triggering the scandal that's rocking the House of Representatives just weeks before the election." The "conservative blogger said he felt the news media were distorting the story, and he suspected, among other things, that the page in question was over the age of consent. Five days after the Foley news broke, Mr. Kerr thought he had found the former page -- a 21-year-old political operative who, by chance, worked about 10 miles north of Mr. Kerr's two-bedroom apartment here." Kerr "disclosed the results of his investigation Oct. 4, and gained the sort of instant celebrity made possible by the Internet age."

Hitchens Suggests There Was No Crime, No Victim In Foley Scandal. Christopher Hitchens writes in the Wall Street Journal (10/16, 2.03M) that the emails between Foley and the Congressional page "read for all the world like a chat between two dirty-minded adolescent boys. … The case would perhaps be altered somewhat if Mr. Foley had been the boy's teacher, or employer, or even priest. But pages are volunteers who are not on any one person's staff, and cannot be hired or fired by individual politicians. Neither coercion nor bribery was involved, as in the priestly scandals, which were quite often instances of actual rape. And the boy in this case was obviously a very knowing one, whose virginity was somewhere in his past. Indeed, it was Mr. Foley who seemed like the juvenile, or perhaps the case of arrested development. In what sense, then, does this constitute public business? … For a 'peccadillo,' Mark Foley is gone from politics already. And a huge public holiday has been taken from the serious matters that confront the electorate. But before the waters close over this scandal, and before the next one surfaces, I would still like to know what crime was committed in this instance, and who if anyone was the victim."

Congressional Report Finds Widespread Data Loss In 19 Federal Agencies. The Washington Post (10/16, A19, 748K) reports, "Federal workers at 19 agencies have lost personal information affecting thousands of employees and the public. Most of the data were lost or stolen. In a few cases, it was accessed by computer hackers, according to a report released Friday by the House Government Reform Committee." In all, "the committee reported 788 incidents involving the loss or compromise of sensitive information since Jan. 1, 2003. That was in addition to the 'hundreds of security and privacy incidents' at the Department of Veterans Affairs." The report said, "Data loss is a government-wide occurrence. … The vast majority of data losses arose from physical thefts of portable computers, drives and disks or unauthorized use of data by employees."

GSA's New Acquisition Division To Be Rolled Out In Phases. In his "Federal Diary" column in the

Washington Post (10/16, D4, 748K), Sthephen Barr writes, "A major new acquisition division is officially up and running at the General Services Administration, but it remains a work in progress." The new Federal Acquisition Service "combines the Federal Technology Service and the Federal Supply Service, which together handle about $56 billion in annual sales. Officials hope that consolidation will improve financial controls; stem revenue losses in the old technology service and make for more efficient purchasing of services, equipment and supplies for federal agencies." James A. Williams, the new FAS commissioner, "said the acquisition service will roll out in phases, in part to allow time to gather more feedback from members of Congress and GSA employees on how best to serve federal agencies. The GSA has put off restructuring 11 regional offices for at least 30 days. … For the long term, the FAS will move to create a strategic plan that fits into the GSA's priorities and gives agencies 'a total view of the GSA' that helps them track where their money is going for purchases of technology and other products, Williams said."

Three Texas Universities Compete For Bush Library. ABC World News (10/15, story 7, 2:20, Harris, 8.78M) reported three Texas universities "are battling to be the site of the future George W. Bush Presidential Library. The White House is expected to announce the winner some time after the midterm elections." Baylor University's Tommye Lou Davis: "It would put us on the map. And so, it is a high stakes game." University of Dallas President Francis Lazarus: "We might seem to be an unlikely candidate for this. But we are a small institution with a global mission." Southern Methodist University, "where Laura Bush went to college and now serves on the board of trustees," is also a contender.

President's Niece Takes Part In World Hunger Event. The Washington Times (10/16, Hunsberger, 88K) reports, "Lauren Bush -- model, Ivy Leaguer and niece of President Bush -- campaigned yesterday afternoon to help end world hunger at a Georgetown University conference on international development." She "told a gathering of about 70 students from area colleges that rich nations need to help developing countries." The Stand Up Against Poverty event "was part of a two-day campaign to set an official Guinness world record for the largest turnout for one cause."

Witness Lists In Congressional Hearings Said To Lead To Increased Spending. The Wall Street Journal (10/16, A14, 2.03M) editorializes, "If Republicans lose control of Congress next month, one big reason will be their record of overspending, especially on earmarks. What explains this GOP fiscal performance? One answer comes from a new analysis by the Cato Institute on the Capitol Hill culture of spending under Republican rule. Examining hearings of 14 Congressional committees, political scientist James Payne found that 1,014 witnesses argued in favor of greater spending while only seven advocated less, an imbalance of 145 to 1. This is worse that a Cuban election." Congressional hearings "have degenerated into a lobbying process in which advocates sing the praises of the spending that their livelihoods depend on, while stroking the egos of the politicians as constructive philanthropists. Members of Congress begin to believe their own stacked juries. It's amazing they stopped spending at $2.7 trillion this year."

OPEC To Hold Emergency Meeting To Discuss Output Cut. The Wall Street Journal (10/16, A2, Daya, Williams, 2.03M) reports, "The Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, hoping to forge an elusive deal to cut oil output and halt a slide in crude-oil prices, said it will hold an emergency meeting in Qatar Thursday." The Journal says, "Oil ministers have declared that OPEC intends to slash output by one million barrels a day, or about 4%, to prop up prices. Behind the scenes, the oil czars have failed to nail down the all-important issue of how to allocate the cuts among the membership." The Journal sees the meeting as "a sign the cartel may be getting closer to putting aside its differences." However, the United Arab Emirates "signaled there isn't a deal yet."

Survey Highlights Consumer Unease With Health Care System. USA Today (10/16, Appleby, 2.27M) reports, "The US health care system -- touted as providing the best medical care in the world -- is becoming more precarious to most Americans, who are rattled by rising costs, questions about quality and fears about the future." A new poll by USA TODAY, ABC News and the Kaiser Family Foundation "found a growing unease in America about the rising cost of health care, confusion about the causes, and a desire for major reform. But it also found a distaste for giving anything up to achieve sweeping changes." USA Today adds Drew Altman, president of the Kaiser Family Foundation, said, "We have always seen strong support for the goal of universal coverage but never seen consensus on how to get there or a willingness to pay the price." That division "was reflected in" the poll. In the survey, "68% said providing coverage for everyone is more important than keeping taxes down. … When survey respondents were asked about possible trade-offs that might come with a universal program, positive responses plummeted."

ABC World News (10/15, story 5, 4:20, Harris, 8.78M) ran a detailed report on US health care costs, opening a

"week-long, comprehensive look at the problems and possible solutions for a system that has left millions of people uninsured, unhappy and unhealthy. As part of this series, ABC News, the Kaiser Family Foundation and 'USA Today,' polled people across the country. Only 44% say they're satisfied with the overall quality of health care, and only 18% are satisfied with the cost." Ex-Oregon Gov. John Kitzhaber, an emergency room physician, "says our health care system is just plain broken." Kitzhaber: "It's a system that sort of lies in the weeds until people are very, very sick and then rushes in with extraordinarily marvelous and expensive high technology to help you recover on the back end." Harris: "It's about a series of choices and Kitzhaber says we're making the wrong ones." Kitzhaber: "Should 95-year-old Grandpa's quadruple bypass surgery be paid at the expense of his six-year-old granddaughter getting immunizations and a routine checkup with her pediatrician?"

Possible Winners, Losers If Democrats Win Congress Examined. Columnist Jeffery H. Birnbaum writes in the Washington Post (10/16, D1, 748K), "Pharmaceutical and oil companies had better beware if Democrats make major gains in the upcoming elections. If Democrats win control of one or both chambers of Congress as many analysts expect, those and other industries could lose a raft of the legislative goodies they've garnered in recent years and also find themselves under congressional investigation. Such are the spoils when power shifts in the federal legislature." He adds, "How can we guess the winners and losers? Just follow the money. … Groups that have given much of their money to Democrats can be considered their true allies and will likely benefit from the items that Democrats push on Capitol Hill. Groups that have been delivering most of their campaign largesse to Republicans will probably see their druthers suffer under a more Democratic-leaning Congress." In addition to oil and drug companies, "other industries that would be wise to watch their backs if Democrats take over include insurers, electric utilities, manufacturers, chemical makers, home builders, general contractors, food processors, railroads and building material producers -- all of which gave 60 percent or more of their contributions to Republicans since 2002, according to the CRP's statistics." Democrats "are likely to play favorites as well. If they win, they will almost surely give high priority to the wishes of labor unions and trial lawyers, which have generally been dismissed by Republicans. The CRP classifies the political action committees of both as either solidly or strongly Democratic. Environmental groups, which work closely with Democrats, would also have a leg up."

"Bunch" Of GOP House Seats Seen As Competitive A Month Before Election Day. U.S. News and World Report (10/23, Gilgoff, 2.03M) reports that "with the ongoing investigation into the Foley scandal, continued bloodshed in Iraq, and Bush's approval numbers tumbling back to their basement levels… a bunch of Republican-held seats have suddenly become competitive less than a month before Election Day. … Whether Democrats wind up winning in these districts will determine whether they can go beyond picking up the 15 seats they need to claim just a bare majority in the House to a landslide victory." Newsweek adds, "In the past 10 days, the authoritative Cook Political Report has moved six GOP-held House seats into the 'competitive' column, bringing the number of vulnerable Republican seats to 43, compared with just nine competitive races in districts held by Democrats. The Rothenberg Political Report, another respected elections newsletter, last week raised the projected number of seats the Democrats will pick up next month from the 15-to-20 range to 18 to 25, its first such recalibration since August."

U.S. News and World Report (10/23, Gilgoff, 2.03M) reports that "more competitive races have forced Republicans to pull money from districts where they hoped to unseat Democratic incumbents. 'Because we've looked beyond the races in play to say "What's the next layer?"...we are in a position...to handle the risk of the increasing number of seats,' Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman tells U.S. News, 'and also...to say, "Now this seat's safe-we don't have to worry about it."' Asked to name a Republican-held seat that has gone from competitive to safe, Mehlman declined."

Mehlman Says Foley Scandal Has Not Had Significant Impact. U.S. News and World Report (10/23, Sullivan, 2.03M) interviews RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman. Asked about polls showing bad results for Republicans going into the November elections, Mehlman said, "Let me first say I do think that we are in a very challenging environment. I think that the situation with [Rep. Mark] Foley has made it even more challenging, but...I have not seen a significant impact in most of the races around the country, and I certainly haven't seen a free fall." Asked how this year's election is different than the 1994 election when Republicans took control of Congress from Democrats, Mehlman said, "First of all, in '94 the Democrats were particularly [vulnerable] to a terrible year because they had a lot of open seats and a lot of those open seats were in Republican presidential districts. There are 20 Republican open seats this year; 17 of the 20 Republican seats this year are Bush-leaning seats, meaning Bush won those districts with an average of 61 percent. The second difference from '94 is the people who are in the toughest races; people like [Connecticut Rep.] Nancy Johnson and [New Mexico Rep.] Heather Wilson and others are very battle tested. Important difference No. 3 that I think is going to be relevant this year is that Republicans had a positive agenda they could be for, and voters in '94 embraced many of the concepts behind that positive agenda. You don't see that at all this year."

Pelosi Has Raised Over $50 Million This Cycle. U.S. News and World Report (10/23, Bedard, 2.03M) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column that House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi "has raised over $50 million this two-year election cycle and over $100 million since getting the top House Democratic post four years ago."

Democrats See Chance To Redefine Battleground For 2008 Presidential Race. U.S. News and World Report (10/23, Walsh, 2.03M) reports that the Democratic Party "sees an opportunity not only to score big wins on November 7 but also to redefine the battlegrounds for the 2008 presidential race." U.S. News adds, "With the Democrats trying to pick up 15 seats to take control of the House and six in the Senate, they are looking to the West, where a half-dozen House races and the Montana Senate race could help determine the new lineup. Colorado, Arizona, New Mexico, and Nevada are the main flash points. All four states have undergone seismic demographic and political shifts. From 2001 to 2005, Nevada was the nation's fastest-growing state. Arizona was second, Colorado eighth, and New Mexico 16th. … 'We intend to contest Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado, and Nevada as a unit next time in the presidential because we think we can win there,' Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean told US News. Dean's theory is that, with a combined total of 29 electoral votes, those four states would make it unnecessary for the Democrats to win Florida, with 27 electoral votes, which they have lost in the last two down-to-the-wire presidential elections."

Dean Denies Democrats Would Raise Taxes. DNC Chairman Howard Dean was asked on CNN's Late Edition (10/15) about Republican warnings that Democrats will raise taxes if they take control of Congress. Dean said, "That's nonsense. We have no interest in doing that. In fact, 80 percent of Americans have seen their income go down. The reason the economy doesn't work for the president is only his friends have benefited from increased earnings and corporate earnings and so forth. … Initially, I think what we'll do is raise the minimum wage, which the president refused to do without giving tax breaks to his contributors. We're not going to be the party of tax breaks to oil companies and insurance companies. We're going to be the part of middle class tax fairness. That does not include any increases of taxes on middle- class Americans of any kind. You know, we always see the Republicans coming out -- your country's going to be blown up if the Democrats take over; your taxes are going to go up. They're desperate. The truth is we believe that we ought to increase the pay of average middle class Americans and working class Americans. We believe we ought to do something about their health care. And we also believe there ought to be real ethics reform in Congress, which the Republicans refused to do."

Meanwhile, also on CNN's Late Edition (10/15), RNC Chairman Ken Mehlman said, "I'm confident we're going to maintain our majorities in the House and the Senate. And here's why. What the American people are going to vote on -- they want the economy; wonder where the economy is. Democrats have said that they will raise taxes, across- the-board tax increases." Asked about Dean's claim that Democrats will not raise taxes, Mehlman said, "That's what he says. But the guy that writes the tax laws, a guy named Charlie Rangel, the week they got out of town, said across-the-board tax increases. Nancy Pelosi, who'd be speaker, has a record of being in favor of across-the-board tax increases."

Krugman Says Party "All That Matters" In This Year's Elections. In his New York Times (10/16, 1.21M) column, Paul Krugman writes, "If the Democrats gain control of either house, no matter how narrowly, the American political landscape will be transformed. If they fail, no matter how narrowly, it will be seen, correctly, as a great victory for the hard right. The fact is that this is a one-letter election. D or R, that's all that matters. It's hard to think of an election in which the personal qualities of the people running in a given district or state have mattered less."

GOP Said To Be Writing Off DeWine As It Redirects Funds. The New York Times (10/16, Nagourney, 1.21M) reports, "Senior Republican leaders have concluded that Senator Mike DeWine of Ohio, a pivotal state in this year's fierce midterm election battles, is likely to be heading for defeat and are moving to reduce financial support for his race and divert party money to other embattled Republican senators, party officials said." The decision "to effectively write off Mr. DeWine's seat, after a series of internal Republican polls showed him falling behind his Democratic challenger, is part of a fluid series of choices by top leaders in both parties as they set the strategic framework of the campaign's final three weeks, signaling, by where they are spending television money and other resources, the Senate and House races where they believe they have the best chances of success." Republicans "are now pinning their hopes of holding the Senate on three states -- Missouri, Tennessee and, with Ohio off the table, probably Virginia -- while trying to hold on to the House by pouring money into districts where Republicans have a strong historical or registration advantage, party officials said Sunday. Republicans also said they would run advertisements in New Jersey this week to test the vulnerability of Senator Robert Menendez, one of the few Democrats who appear endangered." The Times also reports, "In one sign of the shifting political environment, as of this weekend, national Republicans were running advertisements in 29 districts; of those, 26 are held by Republicans and 3 by Democrats, though Republicans plan to begin running advertisements this week against an Illinois Democrat, Representative Melissa Bean. National Democrats are on the air in 30 districts, and defending Democrats in just 3 races." Republicans "are no longer running advertisements in three districts where they once thought they had a chance to take over Democratic-held seats -- in South Carolina, West Virginia and Ohio -- as well as a district in Arizona now held by a Republican. The party has not broadcast any advertising in four days on behalf of Representative Chris Chocola, one of three Indiana Republicans who polls suggest are headed for defeat, though Republican officials said that does not mean they have written off Mr. Chocola's seat."

Pennsylvania Senate Race Said To Hold Important Symbolic Value For Both Sides. The Los Angeles Times (10/16, Hook, 918K) reports Sen. Rick Santorum, "an outspoken advocate of banning same-sex marriage, restricting abortion, and other social conservative causes, is considered this year's most-endangered senator. It is a four-alarm fire for conservatives, who are bringing water buckets from all corners of the political world." The Times adds, "Across Pennsylvania, pastors are preparing to stuff voter guides into their Sunday bulletins. In Washington, D.C., Paul Weyrich, a national conservative leader, hosted a conference call to give a pep talk to Republicans in Pennsylvania. In England, some Santorum fans are planning to cross the Atlantic to help campaign." Santorum "is not just a key link between the Republican Party and Christian conservatives. He is also one of President Bush's most unapologetic allies in Congress and a member of the Senate GOP leadership. And he is the apotheosis of a younger generation of Republicans…that transformed the party in the 1990s into a more confrontational, ideological political force." The Times adds, "If 2006 turns into the electoral romp for Democrats that many analysts now are predicting, a loss by Santorum would be a signifier of the end of that Republican revolution. f Democrats are unable to defeat Santorum, they are unlikely to win a majority in the Senate, which Republicans control 55-45."

Kennedy, Klobuchar Clash On Iraq. The AP (10/16, Frommer) reports, "Candidates in Minnesota's closely watched Senate race clashed Sunday on Iraq and tax policy, with the Republican defending his vote to authorize the war in Iraq. 'You can't really play Tivo and rewind,' said Rep. Mark Kennedy." During a debate on NBC's "Meet the Press," he was asked "whether he would still vote for the war knowing that Saddam Hussein did not have weapons of mass destruction. 'We acted on the information we knew at the time. I stand by my vote.'" Democrat Amy Klobuchar, the Hennepin County attorney, "said it was time to have Iraqis take more control of their country and start bringing U.S. troops home. 'You cannot solve a problem that you don't admit exists, and that is what's going on here with the congressman,' she said. 'This war has basically devolved into a civil war.'"

The Minneapolis Star Tribune (10/16, Hotakainen, 398K) reports Kennedy "said the war will require the United States 'to make adjustments,'" but "he suggested it would be impossible to come up with a diplomatic solution: 'You can't negotiate with people that are ruthless and glory in killing innocent women and children.'" Klobuchar "told the stories of a mother in Mahnomen, Minn., who can't sleep because her child is going on his second tour of duty in Iraq and of a father in western Minnesota who cries when questions are asked about Iraq because he lost his son. 'These are real people in the real world who are looking for solutions,' she said."

Kennedy said on NBC's Meet the Press (10/15) that the US has "seen more challenges than we expected" in Iraq. But "if you look at what's happened, we have trained 300,000 Iraqi troops. We have a government that is a unity government. This is the number one issue in this race, and there are stark differences between my opponent, Ms. Klobuchar, and myself. She says it's a distraction. I think that it is one of the central fronts in the war on terror. Osama bin Laden and Zarqawi says that as well. She has set out a specific timetable for bringing our troops home that would tell the terrorists when they can take over an oil-rich country as a sanctuary for terrorists. And I believe we ought to be bringing our troops home as soon as we can after we're sure the terrorists can't win. And she's also come out against a bill funding body armor for our troops that a majority of Democrats join me in supporting. We have no higher priority than to support our troops in time of war, and we have to win this war on terror."

Klobuchar, also on NBC's Meet the Press (10/15), said, "The congressman is talking about body armor, and of course I support body armor for our troops. I support winning this war on terror by being smart. I supported the Patriot Act. But I will say this: the best way that we can protect our troops is to get this policy right. And I believe that that means changing course in Iraq. We need to transition to Iraqi governance; we need to send the clear message that they have to take control of their own government. And that means no permanent military bases. The congressman and I differ on this."

Ford Says He Would Have Voted Against Iraq War If He Knew What He Knows Now. Tennessee Democratic US Senate candidate Rep. Harold Ford was asked on ABC's This Week (10/15) about his vote in favor of the Iraq war. Ford said, "Naturally, if I knew then what I know now, I wouldn't have voted for it. At one point, I didn't think that President Bush would have even brought the resolution, but after hearing Vice President Cheney and others over the last few weeks indicate that they would have gone forward with the war in Iraq even knowing what they know now, it raises serious questions about not only judgment but sanity." Ford added, "Why would you go forward with an effort in Iraq knowing that they didn't have weapons of mass destruction, knowing that our focus should have remained on bin Laden?"

Ford was also asked on ABC's This Week (10/15) about his decision to film an ad in a church. Ford said, "I say I grew up in that church. I was baptized in that church. And the kind of attacks that we're taking in this campaign have been so fierce and so unrelenting that I've relied on my faith a whole lot in this campaign. So it seemed pretty natural to me." Ford added, "I just don't believe that, from looking at this politically, that Democrats ought to cede any ground to any Republican when it comes to morality and faith."

Corker Denies Bush Is Dragging His Campaign Down. Tennessee Republican US Senate candidate Bob Corker was asked on ABC's This Week (10/15) if the recent cash infusion from the RNC to his campaign is a sign his effort is ailing. Corker said, "It's just a big race. I think the national environment is what it is, and I think people throughout the country have a lot of concerns that make the water a little choppy." Asked if President Bush is dragging his campaign down, Corker said, "No, no, I don't know. He's been the state for us twice. Certainly, you know, we appreciate that. He's helped us raise money. Laura Bush was in the state just the last few days. Again, I think it's more of a national climate of concern. And I think people on both sides of the aisle have those concerns."

Bush, Bill Clinton To Host Competing Fundraisers In Virginia Senate Race. The Washington Times (10/16, 88K) reports, "President Bush and former President Bill Clinton will host competing fundraisers in Virginia on Thursday for their favored candidates in the US Senate race." Bush "will rally Republicans at an event for Sen. George Allen at the Science Museum of Virginia in Richmond. Mr. Clinton will headline a soiree for Democratic challenger James H. Webb Jr. at the McLean home of former Sen. Charles S. Robb. Mr. Allen unseated Mr. Robb in 2000. "

Nelson, GOP Challenger Trade Charges In Final Debate. The Lincoln Journal Star (10/16, Walton) reports, "Sen. Ben Nelson and Republican challenger Pete Ricketts came out swinging Sunday in a debate that attracted an overflow crowd of more than 200 on a sunny afternoon in the Panhandle. It didn't take long to establish the tenor of their third and final direct confrontation." In an opening statement, "Nelson repeated his claims that Ricketts supports enactment of a national sales tax, an end to farm payments, privatization of Social Security, amnesty for illegal immigrants and opposes an increase in the federal minimum wage. All those positions may be good for Wall Street, the Democratic senator said, but they're not good for Main Street in Nebraska." Ricketts' opening remarks "took the form of a bare-knuckles response." Nelson, he said, "has benefited from 'a revolving door career in the public and private sectors (and) cashed in' on his public service experience as governor by acting as a paid lobbyist for a brief period before he was elected to the Senate." The Star adds, "Introducing a new allegation into a Senate race that has overflowed with them, Ricketts said Nelson 'sits on the board of a company that contaminates groundwater in Nebraska,' namely Behlen Manufacturing in Columbus."

The AP (10/16) reports Ricketts also "said Democratic incumbent Sen. Ben Nelson was remiss by not pushing for drought relief as part of the last Farm Bill." But "Nelson said in Sunday's debate in Scottsbluff that Republicans were the ones stopping the payments."

Stabenow Seeks To Link Bouchard To Bush In First Debate. The AP (10/16, Martin) reports, "Democratic US Sen. Debbie Stabenow and Republican challenger Mike Bouchard sparred over issues ranging from the economy to the Iraq war on Sunday as they met in their first debate." Bouchard, the Oakland County sheriff, "said Stabenow has been ineffective and has flip-flopped on several issues. 'She says one thing here and does another thing in Washington,' he said." He also "criticized Stabenow's record on the economy, noting that Michigan has lost thousands of jobs in recent years." Stabenow "said Bouchard would support the 'failed policies' of the Bush administration. … On the Iraq war, Stabenow said it's now time for the Iraqi police and military to 'step up so we can transition out.'"

The Detroit News (10/16) says the candidates "occasionally exchanged sharp accusations as they sparred on subjects ranging from Iraq to Social Security in a Sunday debate at WGVU-TV." The debate was recorded in studio on Sunday morning for viewing on public television stations across the state at 8 PM.

Economy Seen As Key Issue In Michigan Campaigns. The Wall Street Journal (10/16, A4, Cooper, 2.03M) reports from Michigan, "Economic anxiety hangs heavy over the midterm elections in this cradle of the American auto industry. That has meant trouble for the re-election campaign of Democratic Gov. Jennifer Granholm." The Michigan governor's race "serves as a reminder that, for all the attention to scandal and Iraq, the economy remains a factor, particularly in the Midwest, that can sting incumbents of both parties."

Record Number Of Women Could Be Elected To Senate This November. USA Today (10/16, Nichols, 2.27M) reports, "The door to the women's club in the traditionally male-dominated Senate appears to be inching wider. If polls hold true, there will be a record number of women in the Senate next year, up from the current all-time high of 14 -- nine Democrats and five Republicans. … Six female incumbents up for re-election Nov. 7 are leading their challengers, according to the most recent polls. Democrats Dianne Feinstein of California, Debbie Stabenow of Michigan, Maria Cantwell of Washington and Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York hold double-digit leads, as do Republicans Olympia Snowe of Maine and Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas." Polls also "show two more women could join the Senate: In Minnesota, Democrat Amy Klobuchar leads Republican Rep. Mark Kennedy 49%-41%, according to a Mason-Dixon poll from late September. In Missouri, Democrat Claire McCaskill narrowly leads Republican Sen. James Talent, 44%-41%, according to a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken Sept. 27 to Oct. 1."

Republicans Face High Hurdles In Race For DeLay's Old Seat. USA Today/AP (10/16, Stinebaker) reports, "Voting Republican here wasn't difficult when Tom DeLay's name was on the ballot. With DeLay out of the race and the GOP unable by law to substitute a name on the ballot, voters must write in the Republican candidate, Houston City Councilwoman Shelley Sekula Gibbs. That could prove to be such a chore that Democrats might walk away with a seat that has long been in the GOP's hands." The Democratic candidate "is Nick Lampson, 61, a former congressman who has outraised, outspent and campaigned longer than the Republicans."

"Atmospherics" In Northeast Said To Give Democrats Edge In Battle For Congress. Ronald Brownstein writes in the Los Angeles Times (10/16, 918K), "The political equivalent of a nor'easter is bearing down on Republicans from New England through Pennsylvania. With President Bush's approval ratings collapsing across the Northeast, the region presents Democrats an unusually rich concentration of opportunities to capture Republican-held House and Senate seats in the November elections. " The campaign's "atmospherics give Democrats the chance to establish in the region an equivalent to what Republicans have built in the South: an overwhelming regional advantage that anchors their bids for House and Senate majorities. Indeed, if Democrats win most of the House races in play in the Northeast, they will be virtually assured of the net gain of 15 seats nationwide that they need to control the chamber. On the plus side for the GOP, many of the targeted Republicans are strong candidates." Connecticut Rep. Rob Simmons "is an example. He prepared for heavy political weather by diligently promoting local interests, taking generally moderate positions on social issues and seizing chances to show independence from Bush. Simmons and many of the other at-risk Republicans also are fiercely attacking their Democratic opponents."

Republican Lingle Expected To Win Easy Reelection In Democratic Hawaii. The Washington Times (10/16, Pala, 88K) profiles Hawaii Gov. Linda Lingle, who according to many "would be a liberal Democrat" on the mainland. But "in a state that hadn't elected a Republican governor in 40 years, she is expected to be re-elected by such a wide margin that Hawaii's leading Democrats preferred to campaign for other jobs." University of Hawaii political scientist Ira Rohter said, "Lingle is the future of the Republican Party. I think eventually the party will move back to the center, and people like Lingle will take over." The University of Virginia's Larry Sabato "agrees. 'Candidates who succeed despite being from the heavily minority party on average are stronger and with greater talents than those nominated by the majority party,' he said. 'Lingle is a perfect example. Hawaii is such a Democratic bastion that it's amazing any Republican was ever elected statewide, and that she's a heavy favorite for re-election is even more amazing.'"

Bill Clinton Takes Aggressive Message To Campaign Trail. ABC World News (10/15, story 4, 2:10, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "The war figured prominently this weekend as former President Bill Clinton, who has been emerging as his party's most aggressive spokesperson, traveled to Iowa to give a fiery speech attacking the Bush Administration." ABC (Marlantes) added, "With midterm elections just three weeks away, Democrats are playing on Republican turf, boosted by the Mark Foley scandal and worsening conditions in Iraq. ... In the battle for the Senate, Democrats are making serious runs at red states, like Montana, Ohio, Missouri and Virginia. In Tennessee, Democratic Congressman Harold Ford is in a dead heat with Chattanooga Mayor Bob Corker, surprising even the candidate. ... Whether Republicans can match the enthusiasm of Democrats…" Clinton: "People are sick of this partisanship. They're sick of the gridlock. They're sick of the selfishness. They're sick of the abuse. They're sick of nothing going on. And they're coming to us in droves." Marlantes: "…may well determine who wins in November."

Clinton's Iowa Stop Carries 2008 Undertones. The Washington Post (10/16, A4, Balz, 748K) says that while

Clinton came to Iowa "to rally Democrats three weeks before critical midterm elections," his visit "may have served another purpose as well. Alone among prospective Democratic presidential candidates for 2008, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) has not set foot in the state all year, and the futures market in Clinton political stock here has been suffering." Iowa Democrats said Sen. Clinton's "standing reflects more than her absence. They say there is general unease within the party about her ability to win a general election. Beyond that, some Democrats are troubled by her support for the war in Iraq long after other Democratic politicians...had renounced their votes for the congressional resolution that authorized President Bush to launch the invasion."

The Washington Times (10/16, Pfeiffer, 88K) also says "few doubted that the former president was present as a surrogate" for Sen. Clinton. The ex-president did work in a joking pitch on behalf of his wife. "'I am under no illusions as to why I'm here,' he said. 'You were so desperate for a Democrat with any name recognition at all who isn't running for president that you resorted to the chief caseworker to the junior senator from New York.'"

Hillary Clinton Apologizes To McCain Over Aide's Comments. The Washington Times (10/16, Pierce, 88K) reports, "Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton called Sen. John McCain on Saturday to personally apologize and denounce comments an adviser of hers reportedly made that slammed the Republican senator over his time in captivity in North Vietnam, the New York Post reports." The move "was sparked by a column in the New York Times in which Maureen Dowd quoted an anonymous adviser talking about Mr. McCain's criticism of the Clintons over their North Korea position. The adviser said Team Clinton thought Mr. McCain, Arizona Republican, was doing the White House's dirty work by criticizing the Clintons and ended up 'looking similar to the way he did on those captive tapes from Hanoi, where he recited the names of his crewmates.'" That "was a reference to an unsubstantiated rumor used to malign Mr. McCain, a Vietnam war hero, as off-kilter during the 2000 Republican presidential primary."

2008 Democratic Hopefuls Move To Seize Mantle As The "Anti-Hillary." Newsweek (10/23, Darman, 3.12M) reports in its "Periscope" column that former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner "shocked everyone -- including some of his closest aides -- when he announced he wouldn't seek the presidency in 2008. … After Hillary Clinton, Warner had assembled the largest campaign apparatus of any Dem and secured some of the party's top talent, including media consultant Jim Margolis and strategist Jim Jordan. Aides had been talking up his fund-raising prowess and grass-roots network. But intimates knew that Warner had grown increasingly unsure about the prospect of running since returning from a family vacation to Italy this past summer." Newsweek adds, "Top Dem contenders -- including Clinton -- called to reach out (read: suck up) to Warner after his announcement. Evan Bayh and John Kerry were on the phone with Warner donors within hours; they and others, including John Edwards (and perhaps even Barack Obama and Al Gore), will now move to seize Warner's mantle as the electable anti-Hillary. But Clinton herself may have gained the most from Warner's withdrawal."

Obama Described As A "Liberal," But Not A "Screechy Partisan." In its cover story, headlined "Why Obama Could Be The Next President," Time (10/23, Klein, 4.03M) reports that Sen. Barack Obama "has become an American political phenomenon in what seems about a nanosecond." Obama is "a liberal, but not a screechy partisan. Indeed, he seems obsessively eager to find common ground with conservatives." Time adds, "The question of when Obama -- who has not yet served two years in the U.S. Senate -- will run for President is omnipresent. That he will eventually run, and win, is assumed by almost everyone who comes to watch him speak." Asked if he will think about running for President in 2008 after the 2006 election is over, Obama said, "When the election is over and my book tour is done, I will think about how I can be most useful to the country and how I can reconcile that with being a good dad and a good husband," adding, "I haven't completely decided or unraveled that puzzle yet."

Kerry Says He Deserves Another Chance At Presidency. The AP (10/15) reports Sen. John Kerry "says he deserves a second chance if he decides to take another crack at becoming president." He pointed out that John McCain got "kicked around South Carolina by the same president because he wasn't patriotic enough as a prisoner of war" during the 2000 GOP primaries, and "he's now their leading candidate for president. Richard Nixon seemed to get kicked around pretty badly both running for president and governor, turned around and came back and got elected president."

Berkeley Scholar Urges "Progressives" To Run Positive Campaigns In 2008. In a New York Times (10/16, 1.21M) op-ed, Kevin Sweeney of the University of California Berkeley's Haas School of Business writes, "At this point in the fall campaign, unabashed negativity clogs every media outlet. The stench of foul political advertising is everywhere, and one senses that little will change: Americans once again will hold their noses and vote. For this round, there really isn't much to be done. But looking to the 2008 presidential race, there is still time to find a new way of campaigning -- specifically, for progressive candidates to consider a fresh approach to running for office. Why progressives? Because it's in their interest: pervasive negativity takes a far greater toll on progressive causes than on conservative ones. ... To level the playing field, and restore clarity to progressive values, I propose 'the forward-looking campaign.' The rules are simple. Never mention the opponent. Don't talk about the opponent's policies. Don't question the opponent's character. ... Rather than engaging the opposition, the forward-looking candidate will engage the American people in a conversation about our future."

Mallaby Accuses Bayh Of "Sellout" To Steel Lobby. In his Washington Post (10/16, A21, 748K) column, Sebastian Mallaby writes, "With Mark Warner out of the 2008 Demstakes, the chief anti-Hillary centrist is Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana. This is a depressing commentary on the state of the Democratic Party. Bayh may have cleared his schedule to woo Warner supporters on Thursday. But he has yet to prove himself a real contender -- and he may not be a real centrist, either. Two weeks ago Bayh circulated a preposterous letter to his Senate colleagues. It urged them to oppose what Bayh called 'documented unfair trade' in a type of steel that's used in vehicles. It noted the Commerce Department's finding that lifting the tariff on this steel would lead to dumping by foreign producers. That would hurt U.S. steelmakers, the letter continued; so when the fate of the tariff is considered at a sunset review tomorrow, it should on no account be lifted. This is not a policy that protects workers, as Bayh's letter pretended. It's a sellout to a self-serving lobby. It would help the steel guys at the expense of the car guys, even though the car guys are hurting more and they employ more workers."

"Top Bushies" Like Gingrich For President In 2008. U.S. News and World Report (10/23, Bedard, 2.03M) reports in its "Washington Whispers" column, "Top Bushies tell us that they think" former House Speaker Newt Gingrich "would make a great president. Gingrich thinks big, they say, and represents the old Reagan-style of smaller-government conservatism. As for his past marital infidelity, they think it's a nothing-burger, especially if he faces Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, whose hubby had his own problems she'd rather forget."

Decline Of Election Day Festivities Seen As One Reason For Lower Turnout. The Wall Street Journal (10/16, B1, Crossen, 2.03M) writes that "in the past few decades, less than 40% of eligible voters in the U.S. have bothered to cast ballots in midterm elections. Your forebears would be ashamed. In late-19th-century midterm elections, turnout ranged from 65% to 78%. For presidential elections, almost 80% of the nation's eligible -- rich and poor, educated and illiterate -- voted." In the "early 20th century, turnout began falling precipitously. ... A century ago, a raft of new state laws, supported by leaders across the political spectrum from conservatives to progressives, transformed the idea and act of voting so radically that hundreds of thousands of people dropped out of the political system." A 19th-century voter "could decide to vote on the spur of the moment, pick up a simple ballot from party headquarters and drop it at the poll on Election Day, where his like-minded neighbors would give him a cheer and perhaps a beer. No preregistration was required, no taxes, no proof of residency, literacy or even citizenship. If, like most people then, he was a party man, his vote might earn him a reward. ... Election day was rowdy and festive, a thrilling climax to a political campaign that featured bonfires, barbecues, parades, torchlight rallies and passionate oratory. Politics were social and recreational at a time when there wasn't much other public entertainment."

Strassel Sees Lessons For GOP In Florida And Ohio. In her Wall Street Journal (10/16, A15, 2.03M) column, Kimberly Strassel writes that in Ohio, "Ken Blackwell is trailing his Democratic competitor, Ted Strickland, by double digits," while in Florida, "Charlie Crist is leading his Democratic competitor, Jim Davis, by double digits. ... Their respective failure and success is not ideological: Messrs. Blackwell and Crist are both running on the same agenda of tax cuts, fiscal responsibility and broad government reform. This, instead, is a story of the state parties behind them. In Florida, Republicans have spent the past eight years keeping their promises to voters; in Ohio the GOP forgot what 'promise' meant somewhere in the '90s. The tale of these two GOPs offers broader lessons for congressional Republicans, who are facing a rout this fall." If voters "are unhappy with Republicans, it's because the party hasn't lived up to its own principles. In the Capitol, in Ohio, and in plenty of places between and beyond, the party that promised to reform government has become the party of government."

Administration Says Study Of Iraqi Civilian Deaths Was Timed To Hurt GOP. Newsweek (10/23, 3.12M) reports in its "Periscope" column, "Iraqi doctors who helped compile the latest survey on civilian fatalities since 2003 came close to becoming statistics themselves. The survey, conducted jointly by Johns Hopkins, MIT and Baghdad's Al Mustansiriya University, said 600,000 Iraqis have died violently since just before the U.S. invasion (31 percent killed by Coalition troops; the rest in sectarian violence). President George W. Bush recently put the figure at 30,000; other estimates have ranged up to 300,000." The survey figure, "disputed by some researchers as too high (the Iraqi Health Ministry itself cites 150,000 dead), represents about 2.5 percent of Iraq's population -- more than 15,000 fatalities a month. … Administration officials said the study, published in the medical journal The Lancet, was timed to hurt the GOP in the midterm election."

NYTimes Criticizes Candidate For Refusing Debates. The New York Times (10/16, 1.21M) writes in an editorial, "This year in New York, when it comes to debates, the magic number seems to be two. Senator Hillary Clinton, who refused to debate her primary opponent at all, has agreed to two debates with John Spencer, the Republican former mayor of Yonkers. The Democratic front-runner for governor, Eliot Spitzer, agreed to two debates with the Republican candidate, John Faso. The Democratic candidate to succeed Mr. Spitzer as attorney general, Andrew Cuomo, agreed to appear at two debates with Jeanine Pirro, the Republican former Westchester County district attorney, but seems likely to sit out a third already agreed to by Ms. Pirro. We'd like to see more." The Times adds, "The real disappointment this year, however, is the Democratic state comptroller, Alan Hevesi, who is refusing debates altogether."

NYTimes Says Discretion Of Religious Institutions Has Gone Too Far. The New York Times (10/16, 1.21M) editorializes, "Religious institutions should be protected from excessive intrusion by government. Judges should not tell churches who they have to hire as ministers, or meddle in doctrinal disputes. But under pressure from politically influential religious groups, Congress, the White House, and federal and state courts have expanded this principle beyond all reason. It is increasingly being applied to people, buildings and programs only tangentially related to religion. In its expanded form, this principle amounts to an enormous subsidy for religion, in some cases violating the establishment clause of the First Amendment."

Bush Declares Emergency In Snow-Hit New York. NBC Nightly News (10/15, story 7, 0:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "The President late today issued a state of emergency for parts of New York following the record early snow storm there. The two feet of snow that fell in western New York still has officials scrambling to return power to some 300,000 residents. Schools will be closed tomorrow and it could take most of the week for electricity to be restored."

No Deaths Reported In Major Hawaii Earthquake. NBC Nightly News (10/15, lead story, 3:00, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) led with the "major earthquake that shook the Big Island. ... The epicenter was near the town of Kailua-Kona, damaging buildings, knocking out power, even trapping some people in elevators. Remarkably, authorities say no deaths have been reported." ABC World News (10/15, lead story, 2:00, Harris, 8.78M) also led with the earthquake.

Ex-President Ford Spends Fourth Night In Hospital. ABC World News (10/15, story 6, 0:20, Harris, 8.78M) reported ex-President Gerald Ford "is spending a fourth night in the hospital tonight. Mr. Ford, who is 93 years old, was admitted to a hospital near his home in California on Thursday for tests. It is his fourth time in the hospital this year."

Evidence Said To Suggest Administration Was Manipulating North Korea Intelligence. In its cover story, Newsweek (10/23, Hirsh, Liu, Wehrfritz, 3.12M) reports, "There is some evidence that the Bush administration was seeking to manipulate intelligence on North Korea. During a visit to Pyongyang by lead negotiator James Kelly in October 2002, he presented what U.S. officials described as 'proof' that the North had a secret uranium-enrichment program, undercutting Clintonite claims that Kim was adhering to a pledge not to advance his nuclear program. Bush officials later said the North Koreans had confessed. But diplomats now say that was a translation error. (Kelly could not be reached for comment.) While Kim was clearly violating the spirit of his '94 agreement by secretly importing centrifuge equipment, US intelligence sources tell NEWSWEEK that their monitors in the region have never detected telltale emissions from any centrifuges."

North Korean Nuke Test Pressures Neighbors To Consider Going Nuclear. U.S. News and World Report (10/23, Omestad, 2.03M) reports, "Last week's announced test explosion of an atomic bomb deep inside a North Korean mountain tunnel heralds an ominous new era in northeast Asia. … If the seismic event detected around the world is confirmed as a nuclear blast…the impoverished, hunger-ridden North will have managed to join the elite global club of declared nuclear powers. In the amoral logic of nuclear weapons, that may well confer more staying power to the hard-line regime. And it will put more pressure on its neighbors-especially Japan and South Korea-to eventually consider going nuclear."

Time (10/23, Powell, 4.03M) reports, "As crude as the North Korean blast was, it punctuated a scary fact: the rules that governed the nuclear road during the cold war and its immediate aftermath have become irrelevant, replaced by the law of the jungle -- every state, rogue or otherwise, for itself. The risk now, says former Clinton Administration Defense Department official Graham Allison, is the emergence of a more dangerous nuclear age. … What we have now is not a tight club of nuclear powers with interlocking interests and an appreciation for the brutal doctrine of 'mutually assured destruction' but an unpredictable host of potential Bomb throwers: a Stalinist Bomb out of unstable North Korea; a Shi'ite Bomb out of Iran; a Sunni Bomb out of Pakistan; and, down the road, possibly out of Egypt and Saudi Arabia as well; and, of course, an al-Qaeda Bomb out of nowhere. Israel is a nuclear power already. And Turkey may just decide it had better be too. Even Japan and South Korea could eventually move toward the Bomb, if they feel the US nuclear umbrella begins to fray in East Asia."

In its cover story, Newsweek (10/23, Hirsh, Liu, Wehrfritz, 3.12M) reports, "The gravest danger going forward is proliferation to like-minded regimes, especially to Iran. Despite the lack of any common goal…the two countries are closer to being an actual 'axis' than they were when Bush launched the phrase in January 2002. And if Pyongyang is seen as getting away with its nuclear test, some Iranian officials indicate they may raise their own demands for a nuclear program. That's partly why [Secretary of State Condoleezza] Rice is traveling to Asia and Russia in a new diplomatic offensive this week: she will link North Korea and Iran together once again, arguing that as nuclear offenders they should be made outcasts, the new slavers of the 21st century."

North Korean Test Could Unravel System Of Global Nuclear Controls. U.S. News and World Report (10/23, Omestad, 2.03M) reports, "If North Korea's regime can survive the forthcoming sanctions, the lesson for suspected nuclear wannabes like Iran could be that a breakout is manageable. North Korea could begin the unraveling of the entire system of global nuclear controls. Another worry: Will a cash-strapped North sell nuclear materials to another country or a terrorist group? With that in mind, the Bush administration wants to improve technical capabilities to recognize the 'fingerprint' of any bomb from North Korea."

Rice, Bolton Defend North Korea Sanctions Plan. NBC Nightly News (10/15, story 5, 2:15, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "The showdown with North Korea over nuclear weapons: With UN sanctions now in place, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will head to China looking for help in making those sanctions stick." NBC (Jordan) added, "The Bush Administration believes that those sanctions will be enforced but already it's getting some advice on how to make sure that does happen. Top White House officials took to the airwaves to tout the UN Security Council's vote punishing North Korea." John Bolton, US Ambassador to the UN (from "Meet The Press"): "The guts of the resolution are sweeping sanctions against North Korea's nuclear, chemical, and biological weapons programs and their ballistic missile program." Jordan: "But they also warned that the sanctions won't work unless China, North Korea's neighbor and ally, enforces them." Bolton (from "This Week"): "China itself now has an obligation to make sure that it complies with the resolution. And it has full national authority on its side of the border to conduct any inspections it wants." Jordan: "China says it won't inspect cargo entering or leaving North Korea for military contraband, a key part of the resolution, out of fear that destabilize the government of Kim Jong Il and send a tidal wave of refugees into China. But today, the Secretary of State was upbeat." Secretary Rice (from "Face The Nation"): "I think that you're going to find China carrying out its responsibilities, undoubtedly carrying it out in a way that it believes will not enhance conflict."

ABC World News (10/15, story 2, 2:20, Harris, 8.78M) reported, "The United Nations has put in place tough, unprecedented sanctions designed to punish North Korea for its apparent test of a nuclear weapon one week ago. Now, as North Korea remains defiant, the priority for the White House is to make sure those sanctions are actually enforced." ABC (Yang) added, "As President Bush returned to the White House from Camp David this afternoon, his top advisors were savoring this weekend's unanimous vote at the United Nations imposing tough economic sanctions on North Korea." And the "incoming UN Secretary-General told ABC News a meeting with North Korean leader Kim Jong-Il would be a 'good opportunity,' but only as part of regional talks including China, Russia, Japan and South Korea." The Washington Times (10/16, DeBose, 88K) reports Rice and Bolton "said they expected China to enforce sanctions unanimously passed by the U.N. Security Council to curtail North Korea's pursuit of nuclear weapons."

Bolton said on NBC's Meet the Press (10/15), "I think President Bush has made it very clear that he wants to have a peaceful and diplomatic solution to the problem posed by North Korea's continuing pursuit of nuclear weapons and delivery systems. That's part of the reason why we've pushed for these very strong sanctions in the Security Council, to deprive North Korea of the ability to continue its nuclear weapons and other programs of weapons of mass destruction." And on CNN's Late Edition (10/15), Bolton said, "When we introduced our text for the council to consider on Monday, it didn't include at that point authorization to use force. So that was never part of our plan for this resolution, which was to impose sanctions largely against North Korea's programs of weapons of mass destruction."

Rice was asked on CBS' Face the Nation (10/15) how the UN resolution will be enforced. Rice said, "It is a mandatory resolution under Chapter 7. And it is a 15-0 vote. And that is a remarkable evolution, particularly for China, which has had a very close relationship with North Korea. And I just think it shows how really angry the world is with North Korea for doing this and how concerned. It will be enforced because member states have an obligation to enforce it. I think there are some matters that will need to be worked out." Rice said on Fox News Sunday (10/15), "I understand that people are concerned about how it might work so that it doesn't enhance tensions in the region, and we're perfectly willing to have those conversations, but China signed on to this resolution. It voted for this resolution. It is a Chapter 7 mandatory resolution, and so I'm quite certain that China is going to live up to its responsibilities. But you cannot underestimate how big a blow it is to North Korea to have all of the neighbors now, including what has been its strongest supporter, China, fully united behind sanctions against its nuclear program."

The Wall Street Journal (10/16, King, Ramstad, 2.03M) reports Rice "will head to Asia tomorrow to try to enlist Chinese and South Korean help in further isolating the North, while reassuring Japan that its alliance with the U.S. is stronger than ever." A "fundamental disagreement remains between China, Russia and South Korea and other countries, such as the U.S. and Japan, over how tough to be on the North and its leader, Kim Jong Il. For one thing, neighbors such as South Korea and China worry they'll pay the price of a refugee crisis if the Kim regime collapses. Some are already resisting key terms of the U.N. sanction."

USA Today (10/16, 2.27M) reports Rice said the sanctions "might not be strong enough to persuade North Korea to return to negotiations on halting its nuclear program. 'There may be other steps that will be necessary, given North Korea's behavior,' she said. The U.N. sanctions were not tough enough for Japan. It imposed penalties of its own, including a ban on all North Korean imports. Prime Minister Shinzo Abe said Japan could take further action."

The Financial Times (10/16, Kirchgaessner, Fifield) reports the US "said on Sunday it expected China to play a decisive role in enforcing sanctions against North Korea, brushing aside suggestions that Beijing was not committed to a United Nations resolution against its reclusive ally."

The Washington Post (10/16, A15, Kessler, 748K) reports, "China's unwillingness to act against its longtime ally raises the stakes" for Rice's "diplomatic mission to Northeast Asia later this week. Ever since the current nuclear crisis with North Korea began in 2002, the Bush administration has relied heavily on China to use its influence with North Korea's leaders. But Beijing's caution has frequently disappointed U.S. officials."

The New York Times (10/16, Onishi, 1.21M) reports, "A day after the Council unanimously passed the resolution, following nearly a week of intensive diplomatic negotiations, the South Korean government said it would still pursue economic projects with North Korea, including an industrial zone and tourist resort in the North. Those projects are not explicitly covered by the Security Council resolution, but they are an important source of hard currency for the North."

Bolton Says China Is Obliged To Comply With UN Resolution. Bolton said on ABC's This Week (10/15) that China "has an obligation to make sure it complies with the resolution, and it has full national authority on its side of the border to conduct any inspections it wants. We'll see what actually comes out of Beijing, perhaps when Secretary Rice is there next week. But let's be clear, China voted in favor of that provision." Bolton added, "I think that China has got a heavy responsibility here, and I must say, you know, this test by the North Koreans had to have been humiliating to China. After all of the efforts they have made over the years to protect North Korea from international approbation, for the North Koreans in the face of all that to test had to get quite a reaction in Beijing, and I think we're still seeing that play out." Bolton said on NBC's Meet the Press (10/15) that China "voted in favor of this resolution, which is under Chapter 7 of the UN charter, and therefore binding on them. So I don't think there's any reason to believe that they're not going to abide by the terms of the resolution. And the guts of the resolution are sweeping sanctions against North Korea's nuclear, chemical and biological weapons programs and their ballistic missile program." The AP (10/15, Klug) reports on Bolton's comments on China.

UN's Ban Says North Korean Response "Very Worrisome." The Washington Post (10/16, Weymouth, 748K) discussed the North Korea situation with UN Secretary General-Designate Ban Ki Moon, who said "North Korea has declared very defiantly that if the Security Council adopts any sanctions, they will regard this as a declaration of war. This is very worrisome and shows total disrespect of the United Nations. ... I think that I would be in a much better position than any other previous secretary general -- as I come from Korea and have experience. I will try to coordinate with the concerned parties. If necessary, I will take my own initiative, which will include visiting North Korea and meeting with North Korean leaders." USA Today (10/16, Slavin, 2.27M) profiles Ban.

Warner Says Bush, Bolton, Rice Did A "Wonderful Job" On UN Resolution. Sen. John Warner said on CBS'

DOJ_NMG_0080612

Face the Nation (10/15) that President Bush "and his team of Rice and Bolton did a wonderful job here. First place, it's unanimous. All came together. That has enormous symbolism all through Asia that everybody came together on this and stood. Now, as to the provisions, she's going over to work them out. But that question you asked about China and its reluctance on the border, and here's my answer to it. China is seeking world recognition, trying to emerge as a power and a strong voice. This is their test. China supplies over 60 percent of the energy and food to North Korea. They have got tremendous leverage through that. South Korea itself has got a program called open sunshine and so forth. They're trading. Those two nations should be out in the lead, and I think the president and the secretary have struck a correct balance."

Kerry, Levin, Hagel Criticize UN Resolution. Sen. John Kerry said on Fox News Sunday (10/15), "These sanctions are not the bold, tough sanctions that the secretary talked about. China walked out of there and said we voted for it, but we're not going to enforce the cross-border mechanism, it's too dangerous for our region. So you have sanctions that are just, by statement of those involved, not going to do the job." Asked what he would do differently, Kerry said, "I would do precisely what I said for the last five years consistently, which is engage in bilateral, face-to-face negotiations with North Korea, make it absolutely clear to North Korea that we are not intending to invade and have a regime change, and work on the entire set of issues that are outstanding since the armistice with regard to the north."

Sen. Carl Levin said on CNN's Late Edition (10/15) that Bolton "thinks the UN resolution is a strong resolution. I'm afraid it's not. I wish it were. But the Chinese already said that they're not going to enforce inspections against goods going into North Korea without total Chinese support. There's no way a sanction regime can work. And then, near the end, he said that, well, we have no problem sitting down with the North Koreans, just one-on-one; well, we've done that. I really have got to tell you, I am utterly amazed to hear our UN ambassador say that, when just a few months ago, the President repeated what he has said over and over again. And here's the way the president the way put it. He said 'One thing I'm not going to let us do is get caught in the trap of sitting at a table alone with the North Koreans.' Now, it's incredible to me that our ambassador would make the representation that he did on your show."

Sen. Chuck Hagel said on CNN's Late Edition (10/15), "We do need to engage the North Koreans, as we need to engage the Iranians and the Syrians. A UN sanctions resolution is fine. It is limited. As Carl said, it is weak. We heard on your program about 15 minutes ago what the Chinese ambassador said. Essentially he said we're not interested in enforcing that resolution. And China is the most important country in dealing with the North Koreans, with that sanction, because they share a 900-mile border. But the United States must, now, find a resolution to this issue. We're not going to resolve the issue with North Korea through a sanction."

Nunn Says Sanctions Are "Timely" And "Substantive." Former Sen. Sam Nunn said on CBS' Face the Nation (10/15), "I think the sanctions are timely and I believe they're substantive. And I believe the fact that there was unanimous agreement here is enormously important. … I also think we ought to continue to have the goal of getting rid of all nuclear weapons on the Korean peninsula. I believe that China is the key, as has already been observed here. I think it would be a real breakthrough if the United States and China and South Korea all got on the same wavelength for a change. We have not been approaching this with any kind of unity for the last three or four years. And that has been, I think, a very detrimental aspect of trying to deal with North Korea."

US Uses North Korea Sanctions To Warn Iran. The AP (10/15, Klug) says the US "used new U.N. sanctions against North Korea to warn Iran, another country with nuclear ambitions." UN Ambassador John Bolton said Iran "should pay attention to Saturday's U.N. resolution against North Korea for its claimed nuclear test last week."

The New York Times (10/16, Weisman, 1.21M) reports the Bush Administration "appears to have made some headway in using new American legal tools to cut off both North Korea and Iran from the international financial system. The American campaign to use its own financial regulations to put pressure on North Korea and Iran has been a mix of implicit threats backed by explicit action, American officials and banking experts say." Over the past year, US officials "have met with many private banks overseas to warn them of the risk of doing business with certain Iranian and North Korean trading companies and businesses that the United States says have been tied to terrorist groups or to the spread of nuclear materials."

Chinese Public Reportedly Angered By North Korean Test. USA Today (10/16, MacLeod, 2.27M) reports that by "claiming to test a nuclear device, North Korea has set off a wave of anger among ordinary Chinese, who appear split about whether blame lies with North Korea or the United States. In the streets and online, Chinese responded to last week's announcement out of Pyongyang with fear. Many said a nuclear-armed North Korea meant less security for China and East Asia. They called into question China's historic role as North Korea's ally and patron. Others suggested North Korea is right to arm itself in response to U.S. and Japanese threats against it."

Princeton Scholar Says Cash Cutoff Only Way To Get Kim To Back Down. In a Washington Post (10/16, A21, 748K), op-ed, Aaron L. Friedberg of Princeton University's Woodrow Wilson School writes, "Though the hour is late and the odds long, there is still a chance that North Korean dictator Kim Jong Il can be persuaded to give up his nuclear arsenal." Kim "is a cynical realist and will not exchange his nuclear capabilities for empty acts of diplomatic deference or what he would doubtless regard as mere scraps of paper." Kim is a "cunning and rational strategist with one overriding objective: ensuring his own survival by maintaining an absolute grip on power. The only way to move him is by confronting him with a stark choice -- turn over existing nuclear weapons, dismantle production facilities and submit to rigorous international inspections, or face a steadily rising risk of overthrow and untimely death. This demand can be sweetened with promises of aid and peace pacts, but in the end Kim needs to be presented with an offer he cannot refuse. ... Choking off the flow of dollars to Pyongyang would do more than cramp Kim's lavish lifestyle; it would threaten his grip on power."

Olmert Says Prisoner Release Demand Preventing Talks With Abbas. The AP (10/16, Lavie) reports Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "said a planned summit with [Palestinian President] Mahmoud Abbas has been put on hold because of [his] insistence that Israel release large numbers of Palestinian prisoners." The AP calls that condition "the latest setback for U.S.-led efforts to restart peace talks." Tel Aviv "insists that before it frees any of the estimated 8,000 Palestinians it is holding, a soldier captured in June by Hamas-linked militants in a cross-border raid must be returned." However, one Palestinian lawmaker who is close to Abbas said preparations remain on track." The AP also notes, "disagreements over prisoners and a summit are not the main impediments to diplomatic progress. Internal Palestinian and Israeli political turmoil and control of the Palestinian government by the extremist Islamic group Hamas are larger obstacles in the way of US efforts toward peace talks, which have been stalled for six years."

Police Recommend Rape Charge Against Israeli President. The AP (10/16, Federman) reports, "Police recommended Sunday that Israeli President Moshe Katsav be charged with rape, sexual assault and fraud, the most serious charges ever to face an Israeli leader." The recommendation "came at a meeting between police investigators and Attorney General Meni Mazuz. The final decision on whether to put the president on trial is up to Mazuz." Katsav "has denied all wrongdoing."

The New York Times (10/16, Myre, 1.21M) reports, "Although the case has received widespread coverage in Israel, any charges against Mr. Katsav are not likely to have broader political ramifications. Israel's president is expected to serve as a unifying force and set a moral tone, but his position is more symbolic than substantive."

Darfur Refugees Say Peacekeepers Not Protecting Them. The Washington Post/AP (10/16, A15, De Montesquiou) reports, "Refugees living in camps scattered across this region of western Sudan say an African Union peacekeeping mission has done little to protect them, even as rising violence is driving away crucial humanitarian aid. … As they often must, the peacekeepers explained to camp delegates that they were in Darfur only to monitor the violence and had no mandate to fight it."

WPost Says Arab Deployment Could Have Positive Effect On Darfur Crisis. The Washington Post (10/16, A20, 748K) editorializes, "Americans, Europeans and Africans have all tried to bring about a political settlement between Sudan's government and Darfur's rebels. These various efforts have combined to slow the killing, though they have failed to halt it. But the Western and African efforts stand in stark contrast to the performance of Sudan's Arab neighbors, which have so far done next to nothing. Recently the Arab League asserted that this might change. … Depending on the details of its design, an Arab force could be an acceptable alternative." The Post adds, "It's hard to see how Sudan's government could resist an Arab and Muslim peacekeeping force by calling it a threat to Islam. Arab leaders have a good chance of deploying their proposed force if they press for it seriously. So the important question will be: Are the Arabs in fact serious?"

Ecuadorian Tycoon Leads Presidential Race Ahead Of Runoff. The Wall Street Journal (10/16, DeCordoba, 2.03M) reports wealthy banana magnate Alvaro Noboa "had 27% of the vote" in Ecuador's presidential election, while Rafael Correa, "an admirer of [Venezuelan President Hugo] Chavez," had 22%. Although the vote count was only half complete, exit polls predicted a Noboa victory of several points. "The results mark a setback for Mr. Chavez, who was hoping an outright win by his political ally would extend his influence in the Andean region." The Journal notes, "Analysts said the results could give the pro-U.S., pro-markets Mr. Noboa, who has run twice before and lost races for the presidency, the edge to win the second round of the vote, scheduled for Nov 26." The winner of that election will become Ecuador's eighth president since 1996.

The New York Times (10/16, Romero, 1.21M) adds Noboa's "strong showing came as something of a surprise. In the final days of the campaign, [he] said he would limit political ties to Venezuela and fiercely criticized Mr. Correa's positions. He has also said he is strongly in favor of negotiating a trade agreement with the United States." The Washington Post (10/16, A15, Forero, 748K) and Los Angeles Times (10/16, Kraul, 918K), among other newspapers, run similar reports this morning.

British Communities Minister Backs Firing Woman For Wearing Veil. The Washington Post/AP (10/16, A17, Wagner) reports British Minister of State for Communities and Local Government Phil Woolas "has joined an increasingly bitter debate about the rights of Muslim women to veil their faces, saying a teaching assistant should be fired for insisting on wearing one in school." Woolas "was quoted by the Sunday Mirror newspaper as demanding that Aishah Azmi, a Muslim, be fired for refusing to remove her veil at work. 'She should be sacked. She has put herself in a position where she can't do her job,' Woolas said." The AP notes, "The debate on the veils began this month when" House of Commons Leader Jack Straw "said Muslim women visiting his office should remove them," and later the Conservative Party "weighed in, with one of the party's top officials accusing Muslim leaders of encouraging a 'voluntary apartheid' that could help spawn homegrown terrorism." Recently, Prime Minister Tony Blair "praised Straw for raising the issue 'in a measured and considered way,' and he urged Britons to engage the topic without 'becoming hysterical.'"

Video Suggests Chinese Troops Were Not Threatened By Tibetan Refugees. The New York Times (10/16, Kahn, 1.21M) reports, "A Romanian videotape that appears to show Chinese security forces shooting two Tibetan refugees in the Himalayas contradicts Beijing's claim that the refugees were shot when soldiers acted in self-defense." While Beijing has "acknowledged" the shootings, state media claimed "the soldiers acted only after about 70 refugees seeking to enter Nepal illegally from China attacked border troops." The Times notes, "The Sept. 30 incident was first reported by mountaineers in Nepal and was circulated by human rights groups, including the International Campaign for Tibet and Human Rights in China." Human rights groups provided witnesses who claim "that those who had been fired upon included monks, women and children and that the person who had been killed was a 25-year-old Tibetan Buddhist nun." The Chinese Foreign Ministry has "vowed to investigate." The Times adds, "The video does not offer a comprehensive account. It was shot from a long distance — the narrator says the cameraman was more than half a mile away — and only a few faces are clearly identifiable. But it does suggest that the shootings were not in direct response to an attack on soldiers."

Prominent Chinese Human Rights Activist Charged With Subversion. The New York Times (10/16, Kahn, 1.21M) notes Chinese authorities "have charged a prominent human rights lawyer with inciting subversion, part of a crackdown on people who have sought to use China's nascent legal system to limit the power of the state." According to his lawyer, Gao Zhisheng "was taken into custody in mid-August and was formally arrested Sept. 21, but the police only recently made clear the nature of the charge." Gao's lawyer "said the police had not allowed him to visit [him] because they said his case involved state secrets." The Times says an eventual indictment of Gao "could be one of the highest-profile prosecutions of an internationally recognized dissident in recent years." Gao "represented displaced homeowners, victims of official corruption and religious rights advocates, including members of the Falun Gong sect," and recently "has become one of the most outspoken dissidents within China, writing frequent essays and polemics posted on the Internet that have sharply criticized the authorities and have predicted that the governing Communist Party will collapse because of corruption and abuse of power."

WSJournal Defends Trade With China. The Wall Street Journal (10/16, 2.03M) editorializes, "Everyone seems to agree that China's leverage will be crucial if the world is going to contain North Korea's nuclear threat. Which is one more reason to congratulate Treasury Secretary Hank Paulson, who recently prevented a U.S.-China blowup by persuading Chuck Schumer and Lindsey Graham to drop a Senate vote on their 27.5% tariff bill against China." Sens. Schumer and Graham are "so very wrong to consider the trade deficit with China a threat to U.S. prosperity," because the "$200 billion trade deficit with China is itself a meaningless hobgoblin, mattering far less than the volume of trade." Although imports of Chinese goods "have more than doubled (up 155%) since 2000," exports to China "have climbed even faster, tripling since 2000," proving, the Times says, that, "if China is adopting currency policies to repel U.S. goods, they aren't working too well." The United States has "gained" a "surge in low-priced, high quality consumer products," including "apparel, footwear, consumer electronics, computer equipment, and so on -- all of which Americans have bought voluntarily. Arguably the biggest beneficiary of China's emergence on the world trading stage has been America's poor, who have new access to bargain-priced consumer goods." Saying that China has not held "the yuan artificially low relative to the dollar," the Times says "this is not a 'manipulation' of its exchange rate so much as it is a contracting out of its monetary system to the U.S. Federal Reserve Board." The Times notes the "greatest Chinese danger to the U.S. economy" is China's "undeveloped and politically controlled financial system," and the Administration "should be urging Beijing to privatize its banking sector, capital markets and state owned enterprises." The Times concludes, "The U.S. wants and should expect Beijing's cooperation on nuclear proliferation and North Korea; it shouldn't waste its influence on such non-problems as expanding two-way trade."

Venezuela's Bid For Security Council Seat Generates Commentary. In his column in the Washington Post (10/16, A21, 748K), Jackson Diehl says of Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez's bid for a non-permanent seat on the UN Security Council, "There's a fair chance he'll lose." A failure by Venezuela or Guatemala to garner 122 votes in the General Assembly on the first ballot will likely lead to the election of a third candidate. "If so it will be a wounding rebuff for Chavez following his Bush-as-devil tirade before the assembly last month, and one that could hurt him in another vote, if it is free and fair: his bid for reelection as president in December." A loss in today's UN ballot "would save the Bush administration from embarrassment and spare the Security Council a nuisance factor. Still, there won't be much to celebrate." Diehl says the fact that Chavez "could even come close" to winning "is testimony to how low U.S. prestige has sunk around the world. More specifically, it's a measure of how twisted U.S. relations with Latin America have become -- and also, how fragile the appeal of democratic values is in that region." Several Latin American countries are making clear "that they value Venezuela's investment in their economies more than preventing nuclear proliferation…; that solidarity with a neighbor matters more than solidarity with other democracies (probably the only votes for Venezuela in the free world will come from Latin America and the Caribbean); that their governments prefer a weaker United States to a chastened Hugo Chavez." In addition, Diehl says, the vote "underlines the continuing fecklessness of the Bush administration's approach to Latin America. There is its overreliance on faithful but small allies in Central America and its inability to come to terms with the region's giant, Brazil. There is its heavy-handed lobbying, which prompted Guatemala's foreign minister to say that he wished Washington 'would not promote our cause so much.' Most disturbing, there is the inability to win support from a nominally close ally such as Chile, even against an autocratic demagogue. Chavez may lose the U.N. vote, but in the contest for Latin America, the United States isn't winning."

Meanwhile, the Wall Street Journal (10/16, 2.03M) editorializes, "To understand why so many Americans dislike the U.N., consider that Venezuela, of all countries, stands a chance today of being elected" to the Security Council today. "The world's democracies in North and Central America, Europe and Asia are lining up behind Guatemala. In Latin America, Colombia and Mexico are also backing Guatemala, while Argentina and Brazil are supporting Venezuela," and "the left-of-center government in Chile is on the fence, no doubt alarmed by Mr. Chávez but also fearful of crossing him." The Journal concludes, "If Mr. Chávez wins, we'll know that most U.N. members prefer anti-American posturing to a credible Security Council."

NYTimes Lauds Selection Of Pamuk For Literature Nobel. In an editorial, the New York Times (10/16, 1.21M) says Turkish novelist Orhan Pamuk's Nobel Prize in Literature "is richly deserved. It was awarded for a body of work, fiction and nonfiction, that is driven by the conscience of imagination as well as the conscience of memory." While "Islamists and Turkish nationalists tend to think of Mr. Pamuk as a literary provocateur, especially for his brief but candid remarks about the Armenian genocide quoted in a Swiss magazine last year," the Times says Pamuk "was speaking the truth. For the sake of art and conscience, he has resisted any effort to quiet his literary voice." The choice of Pamuk "will be a popular one," and "his prize is also a reminder of how often the Nobel has been given to a writer whose work exposes the tension between the state and the artist. We read Mr. Pamuk's books as they should be read — for the imaginative and linguistic pleasure in them — seldom remembering that every artist's freedom to speak is our freedom, too. This prize helps us remember that."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Lawyer Is Due For Sentencing In Terror Case (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

Lynne F. Stewart, the firebrand lawyer known for defending unsavory criminals, now faces the possibility of living out her life like many of them, in maximum-security lockdown in a federal prison.

Today, 20 months after she was convicted on terror charges, Ms. Stewart and two co-defendants who were convicted of conspiring with her will be sentenced in Federal District Court in Manhattan. Prosecutors, arguing that Ms. Stewart repeatedly flouted the law to aid the violent designs of an imprisoned terrorist client, have asked Judge John G. Koeltl to condemn her to 30 years in prison.

That would be a life sentence for Ms. Stewart, who turned 67 last week. Long an abrasive advocate of anti-government causes, these days she is not defiant. She is mournful about what she said were her failures as a lawyer.

Her dread of prison deepened unexpectedly, Ms. Stewart said, during the long period after a jury found her guilty on Feb. 10, 2005, of providing material aid to terrorism. She has recently recovered from breast cancer, but fears it will return in prison.

And if the judge comes down hard, she could be held in solitary confinement with limited visits, the same conditions as Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman, the terrorist she was convicted of aiding.

All three defendants have had to wait for sentencing while Ms. Stewart was treated for cancer. She has finished radiation treatments, she said, and her doctors have declared that she is cancer-free. But she worries about the medical care in prison.

"I feel very threatened by it," Ms. Stewart said. "I know too much about the way they deal with you in prison."

Ms. Stewart's sentencing will culminate a case the Bush administration cites as a major counter-terrorism achievement. Former Attorney General John Ashcroft, who brought the indictment, devoted a full chapter to the case in his new memoir.

Ms. Stewart still denies that she acted to further any violent goals of the sheik, a blind Islamic cleric from Egypt who is serving a life sentence for a thwarted 1993 plot to bomb New York City landmarks. Whatever the sentence, her lawyers have said they will appeal the case.

But in documents they submitted to persuade Judge Koeltl to be lenient and give her no prison time, Ms. Stewart is newly remorseful about "ill-advised" moves on behalf of her client.

"I still believe it was justifiable — but perhaps not in the way that I did it," Ms. Stewart said in a sober interview in a borrowed room in the Manhattan offices where she used to practice law. She was speaking of her actions in June 2000 to violate strict prison rules, known as special administrative measures, by publicizing a message from the sheik to his militant followers in Egypt.

The government's call for a 30-year sentence jolted her, she said, into deeper self-criticism.

"Stewart's criminal conduct, which lasted more than two years, was both extremely dangerous and devious," two assistant United States attorneys, Andrew Dember and Robin Baker, wrote in their sentencing motion. Her actions, they said, "should be offensive to those actually zealously defending criminal defendants within the bounds of the law."

There was never any question during the eight-month trial that Ms. Stewart had broken the rules by releasing the sheik's statement, which said he no longer supported a cease-fire by his followers in Egypt. Another defendant, Ahmed Abdel Sattar, 47, a Staten Island postal worker, was convicted of negotiating with the militants by telephone to promote an end to the cease-fire.

The government wants a life sentence for Mr. Sattar. It is seeking 20 years for Mohamed Yousry, the Arabic translator who was convicted of helping Ms. Stewart smuggle Mr. Abdel Rahman's messages out of prison.

These days, Ms. Stewart says, what stings is that she agrees with some of prosecutors' claims about her faulty legal work.

In her trial testimony, she said she believed that she could stretch the prison rules because she regarded them as unconstitutional. But the argument was weak because, as prosecutors noted, she never made a formal legal challenge.

DOJ_NMG_0080623

She said that she completely misjudged how prosecutors viewed the sheik and the leeway she could take in defending him, as terrorism became an increasing threat to the United States. "To me, the sheik was part of the demonized other," she said, "part of a continuum" with other violent radicals she had defended more successfully, including members of the Weather Underground and the Black Panthers.

She admits that she became too close to the sheik, insisting it was because of his deteriorating health and sanity after years in solitary confinement, not any affinity with his Islamic fundamentalism.

"I ignored any warning signs," Ms. Stewart said. "I led with my heart instead of my head and thought it would be all right."

While Ms. Stewart says she regrets some of her actions, one co-defendant, Mr. Yousry, is not offering any apologies to the judge.

"I wish to God I can say I'm sorry," he said in an interview. "But I'm not guilty and I'm not going to say I'm sorry for something that I didn't do."

In the past months, Mr. Yousry, 51, has gone from bewildered to angry, reliving the trial in his mind. He was fired from a teaching job at the City University of New York when he was indicted and can no longer find work as a translator. Out on bail, he spends his time at home in Bridgeport, Conn.

Mr. Yousry said he keeps coming back to the fact that he, unlike Ms. Stewart, never signed an agreement to uphold the rules that restricted communication with the sheik. The evidence confirmed that he acted on specific instructions from Ms. Stewart. Prosecutors acknowledge that Mr. Yousry, who is not a practicing Muslim, did not support the sheik's ideas or violence. They have called him the "least culpable" defendant.

In a letter to the judge, Michael Gasper, a history professor at Yale, said Mr. Yousry had long shown an "obvious and unconcealed distaste for any brand of Islamic activism."

Mr. Yousry has never broken rank with Ms. Stewart. But his voice rose when he discussed how she handled the sheik's case.

"My job wasn't to tell the lawyer what to do," he said. "Lynne is known as an in-your-face kind of lawyer. She lives for the moment when she can stand up to the government and challenge them on issues. That's her thing. That's Lynne Stewart, not Mohamed Yousry."

There was little sympathy for Ms. Stewart among mainstream lawyers during the trial. But more than 400 letters she submitted to Judge Koeltl about her sentence include many from law professors and criminal defense lawyers who said that her actions never caused actual harm and warned of a chilling effect on lawyers who defend terrorists if she receives a long sentence. Her lawyers cite her long service as a government-appointed lawyer for rebels, mobsters and murderers.

Jo Ann Harris, a former assistant attorney general who authorized the 1994 indictment of Mr. Abdel Rahman, wrote that the terrorism counts against Ms. Stewart were "unwarranted overkill."

Ms. Stewart's failing, she wrote, was that she "didn't have a clue that the stick she was poking in the government's eye was going to have consequences beyond her imagination."

The author Gore Vidal wrote to ask the judge to "side with our Bill of Rights" by not imprisoning Ms. Stewart.

Ms. Stewart said that while her radical leftist views have not changed, she will continue to fight within the system. "I really think that my patriotism — if you'll excuse the expression — and my love of this profession demand that I have to stay and fight."

Specter's Role In Passage Of Detainee Bill Disputed (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

The news reached Democrats working on the military commissions bill in the Senate cloakroom the morning of Sept. 27. Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), a sponsor of two amendments giving detainees a right to challenge their detention or treatment in federal court, had decided to bring the more extreme amendment to a vote.

Democrats had lined up behind Specter because the Judiciary Committee chairman told them he shared their antipathy to language in the bill stripping detainees of habeas corpus rights. But the amendment Specter put forward was defeated 51 to 48, allowing the bill to win congressional approval without change. It handed the White House an important pre-election victory.

The last-minute maneuvering before the Sept. 28 vote remains a hot topic of debate among lobbyists, lawmakers and staff members. They are wondering if Specter, as several Judiciary Committee staff members privately asserted at the time, was pressured into discarding a less extreme and more politically palatable amendment at the Bush administration's request, in favor of an alternative more likely to be defeated.

Specter says that he was not, and that he has no reason to believe the less extreme alternative he sponsored but withheld from a vote -- allowing detainees limited access to the courts -- might have won. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) backs Specter's account, but some other sources on Capitol Hill dispute it.

The stakes were considerable: The White House had been waging an intense three-month effort, set off by an adverse Supreme Court decision in June, to win explicit congressional support for the right to detain indefinitely, and without guaranteed recourse to the courts, people -- including U.S. citizens -- who are designated as "unlawful enemy combatants."

The White House was keen to secure the bill's speedy passage, because officials were worried that Congress would be more reluctant to strip detainees of their rights after the Nov. 7 midterm elections. Keeping the Senate bill free of amendments was key to avoiding a wrangle with the House, which had passed the administration-backed version and was set to leave for a recess Sept. 29.

Questions about Specter's role in the last-minute maneuvering arose in part because he had taken a maverick position before -- and then backed President Bush's policy on the floor or in his votes.

Specter said in December, for example, that he had "no doubt" the administration's warrantless surveillance program for terrorism suspects was inappropriate and should not be condoned. This summer, he sponsored a bill to legalize the program by providing for limited judicial review. Since 2001, Specter's support for Bush initiatives in Congress has fluctuated between 85 and 89 percent, according to Congressional Quarterly.

On the detainee bill, Frist had make clear his desire to ensure that no amendment passed, spokeswoman Amy Call said. She said "we were worried about both" of Specter's amendments.

The more extreme version would have deleted the bill's suspension of habeas corpus rights. The less extreme alternative, which Specter co-sponsored with Sens. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) and Gordon Smith (R.-N.H.), would have allowed detainees to file a single habeas corpus petition after a year of detention.

"The compromise looked like it had a strong chance of success," and it would have given detainees at least "a one-chance shot to appeal their innocence," said Jennifer Daskal, U.S. advocacy director for Human Rights Watch. "Rather than doing the right thing and allowing the amendment to go forward, the strategy seems to have been to put forward an amendment doomed to defeat," she said.

Frist was so determined to help the White House that on Sept. 26, he told a group of GOP lawmakers at a private meeting, in the presence of White House national security adviser Stephen Hadley, that no amendment that could pass would be allowed to come to a vote, according to one person present. Call declined to comment on a private meeting.

Although Frist did not say so then, staffers told others they were nervous that Maine's two Republican senators, Susan Collins and Olympia J. Snowe, and Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) might support Specter's less extreme amendment.

Around the time of the vote, several members of the Judiciary Committee staff circulated reports that Frist and the White House pressured Specter into doing the administration's bidding on the habeas corpus amendment. The staffers said Specter was told that no floor time would be available to debate the milder alternative, according to five legislative aides and lobbyists following the bill, who said in separate interviews that they heard this account directly from the staff.

In a telephone interview, Specter disputed that assertion and said he was unaware that more Republicans might have supported the less extreme amendment. Frist "wanted me to limit it to one amendment . . . he wanted to get the bill finished," Specter said. But "he did not tell me" which bill to bring to the floor.

Specter said the less extreme amendment he sponsored "doesn't appeal to me for many reasons." Some habeas corpus petitions succeed on the second try, he said, an option it would not have allowed. "I know they were very nervous about the one that I offered. . . . I could not have pressed an amendment any more strenuously than I did that one," he said. Call said Frist had not told Specter which amendment to offer.

DOJ_NMG_0080625

Would the alternative amendment have attracted more GOP support? A Republican aide directly familiar with Hagel's position confirmed that the senator supported the less extreme alternative.

Specter said he did not speak to Hagel before the vote but telephoned him in Vietnam after being interviewed by The Washington Post. He said Hagel told him otherwise. Asked to clarify the discrepancy, Hagel spokesman Mike Buttry said the senator was "not going to talk about hypotheticals."

Six legislative aides and lobbyists separately quoted an aide to Collins as saying at the time that the senator would have supported the alternative amendment, providing the second vote needed to ensure its success. Asked about the statements, Collins's spokeswoman, Jen Burita, said that "we don't know how she would have voted."

Spokesmen for two other senators who voted with the administration, Snowe and Ben Nelson (D-Neb.), also declined to say if they would have supported the less extreme alternative.

Four Democratic lawmakers put forward amendments of their own that they knew would not attract enough GOP support to win. They would have required periodic reports on detainees held in CIA custody, closed the special military court system in 2011, or required U.S. notification of other countries that their officials would be prosecuted for extreme detainee abuses.

"Sometimes you offer an amendment because that's what you believe in," said an aide to one Democrat.

But for at least some Democrats involved in lobbying on the bill, the defeat of these amendments -- plus Specter's -- was not entirely an unhappy result. Some lawyers representing detainees told lawmakers before the vote that they were convinced the Supreme Court would strike down Bush's version of the bill.

They argued against a compromise -- such as Specter's unoffered amendment -- on grounds that it could make the outcome more difficult for the court to reject, a senior Democratic aide said. "We were hearing from some of the constitutional experts that . . . it is better to leave the pig ugly than put lipstick on it," the aide said, explaining why Democrats did not propose a habeas corpus amendment that might have won.

Those interviewed said they doubt a challenge to the new law -- once it is signed by Bush -- could be decided by the Supreme Court in less than a year. That leaves hundreds of suspects now incarcerated without legal recourse during that period, and potentially far beyond it.

The Treason Puzzle (WP)

The Washington Post, October 16, 2006

WHEN THE Supreme Court considered the case of Yaser Esam Hamdi, an American citizen held as an enemy combatant, Justices Antonin Scalia and John Paul Stevens objected that U.S. citizens could not be held without charge unless Congress acted to permit it in an emergency. If the government wants to lock them up for supporting the enemy, the justices said, the Constitution specifies how it may do so: Charge them with treason or some similar crime.

That is what the Justice Department did last week to Adam Gadahn, an American-born operative who had been making videotapes for al-Qaeda. The first such charge in decades marks a significant change of course. Instead of causing him to disappear into military custody, as it did with Mr. Hamdi, the government is following a road explicitly laid out in the Constitution.

Broadly speaking, this is a constructive development. Unlike the murky terrain governing the holding of American citizens as enemy combatants, treason is defined in the Constitution. So there's no doubt as to the government's authority to pursue its case or the propriety of doing so. Mr. Gadahn, if he's ever captured, will have rights in court, and the government's standard of proof, also specified in the Constitution, is high. The videos cited in the indictment involve threats of terrorist violence made against this country on behalf of a belligerent foreign power. The indictment quotes Mr. Gadahn declaring that he has "joined a movement waging war on America and killing large numbers of Americans."

Yet treason charges could come to pose civil liberties concerns of their own. The Constitution cannot, by definition, be unconstitutional -- yet its definition of treason is so broad and vague that, were it merely written in statute, it would probably be so. It consists of "levying war" against the United States or "adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort" -- language that has been used to convict people of propagandizing on behalf of enemy powers. Where exactly that bleeds into protected speech is no easy question.

The (UK) Sun, October 16, 2006

AN al-Qaeda general believed to be plotting dirty bomb attacks on seven US cities could be in Britain, FBI sources said yesterday.

Adnan El Shukrijumah, who has a £2.5million bounty on his head, is suspected of planning a spectacular attack using bombs that spread radioactive waste.

The FBI are investigating the 31-year-old Saudi-born scientist's UK links, including connections to the Midlands and Birmingham.

A US source said: "He has travelled extensively in the last seven years, and we believe this includes the UK."

U.S. Firing Plans For Great Lakes Raise Concerns (NYT)

By Monica Davey

The New York Times, October 16, 2006

GRAND HAVEN, Mich., Oct. 10 — Even in autumn, the cold, silent expanse of Lake Michigan defines this town, where pleasure boats glide into harbor, fishermen wait patiently for salmon and tourists peer up at the lighthouse.

But the United States Coast Guard has a new mission for the waters off of these quiet shores. For the first time, Coast Guard officials want to mount machine guns routinely on their cutters and small boats here and around all five of the Great Lakes as part of a program addressing the threats of terrorism after Sept. 11.

And, for the first time in memory, Coast Guard members plan to use a stretch of water at least five miles off this Michigan shore — and 33 other offshore spots near cities like Cleveland; Rochester; Milwaukee; Duluth, Minn.; and Gary, Ind. — as permanent, live fire shooting zones for training on their new 7.62 mm weapons, which can blast as many as 650 rounds a minute and send fire more than 4,000 yards.

The notion is so unusual that it prompted United States diplomats to negotiate with Canadian authorities in order to agree that it would not violate a 189-year-old treaty, signed after the War of 1812, limiting arms on the Great Lakes.

Many here in Grand Haven, a town whose history is so lovingly intertwined with the Coast Guard that it holds an annual festival celebrating the service branch, say they think of Coast Guard members mainly as the rugged sailors who race off to search for and save troubled boaters. But even here, in a town that calls itself "Coast Guard City U.S.A.," some say the thought of members firing machine guns anywhere near these waters strikes them as dangerous to ordinary boaters, potentially damaging to the Great Lakes' ecosystem and, frankly, a somewhat surprising place to be bracing for terrorists.

"You know exactly what's going to happen with this," said Bob Foster, 58, who said he spends every chance he gets on the waters here. "Some boater is going to inadvertently drive through the live fire zone and get blown out of the water."

Carole Loftis, the owner of Snug Harbor, a popular restaurant with windows on the water, said that although she certainly carried concerns, like most Americans, about terrorism, drunken boating seemed a more frequent threat around here. "This seems a little like overkill," Ms. Loftis said of the shooting plans.
